But according to interviews, Kiley, his successive commanders at Walter Reed and various top noncommissioned officers in charge of soldiers' lives have heard a stream of complaints about outpatient treatment over the past several years. The complaints have surfaced at town hall meetings for staff and soldiers, at commanders' "sensing sessions" in which soldiers or officers are encouraged to speak freely, and in several inspector general's reports detailing building conditions, safety issues and other matters.

DOJ_NMG_0138378

Retired Maj. Gen. Kenneth L. Farmer Jr., who commanded Walter Reed for two years until last August, said that he was aware of outpatient problems and that there were "ongoing reviews and discussions" about how to fix them when he left. He said he shared many of those issues with Kiley, his immediate commander. Last summer when he turned over command to Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, Farmer said, "there were a variety of things we identified as opportunities for continued improvement."

In 2004, Rep. C.W. Bill Young (R-Fla.) and his wife stopped visiting the wounded at Walter Reed out of frustration. Young said he voiced concerns to commanders over troubling incidents he witnessed but was rebuffed or ignored. "When Bev or I would bring problems to the attention of authorities of Walter Reed, we were made to feel very uncomfortable," said Young, who began visiting the wounded recuperating at other facilities.

Beverly Young said she complained to Kiley several times. She once visited a soldier who was lying in urine on his mattress pad in the hospital. When a nurse ignored her, Young said, "I went flying down to Kevin Kiley's office again, and got nowhere. He has skirted this stuff for five years and blamed everyone else."

Young said that even after Kiley left Walter Reed to become the Army's surgeon general, "if anything could have been done to correct problems, he could have done it."

Soldiers and family members say their complaints have been ignored by commanders at many levels.

More than a year ago, Chief Warrant Officer Jayson Kendrick, an outpatient, attended a sensing session, the Army's version of a town hall meeting where concerns are raised in front of the chain of command. Kendrick spoke about the deterioration and crowded conditions of the outpatient administrative building, which had secondhand computers and office furniture shoved into cubicles, creating chaos for family members. An inspector general attending the meeting "chuckled and said, 'What do you want, pool tables and Ping-Pong tables in there?' " Kendrick recalled.

Army officials have been at other meetings in which outpatient problems were detailed.

On Feb. 17, 2005, Kiley sat in a congressional hearing room as Sgt. 1st Class John Allen, injured in Afghanistan in 2002, described what he called a "dysfunctional system" at Walter Reed in which "soldiers go months without pay, nowhere to live, their medical appointments canceled." Allen added: "The result is a massive stress and mental pain causing further harm. It would be very easy to correct the situation if the command element climate supported it. The command staff at Walter Reed needs to show their care."

In 2006, Joe Wilson, a clinical social worker in the department of psychiatry, briefed several colonels at Walter Reed about problems and steps that could be taken to improve living conditions at Building 18. Last March, he also shared the findings of a survey his department had conducted.

It found that 75 percent of outpatients said their experience at Walter Reed had been "stressful" and that there was a "significant population of unsatisfied, frustrated, disenfranchised patients." Military commanders played down the findings.

"These people knew about it," Wilson said. "The bottom line is, people knew about it but the culture of the Army didn't allow it to be addressed."

Last October, Joyce Rumsfeld, the wife of then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, was taken to Walter Reed by a friend concerned about outpatient treatment. She attended a weekly meeting, called Girls Time Out, at which wives, girlfriends and mothers of soldiers exchange stories and offer support.

According to three people who attended the gathering, Rumsfeld listened quietly. Some of the women did not know who she was. At the end of the meeting, Rumsfeld asked one of the staff members whether she thought that the soldiers her husband was meeting on his visits had been handpicked to paint a rosy picture of their time there. The answer was yes.

When Walter Reed officials found out that Rumsfeld had visited, they told the friend who brought her -- a woman who had volunteered there many times -- that she was no longer welcome on the grounds.

Last week, the Army relieved of duty several low-ranking soldiers who managed outpatients. This week, in a move that some soldiers viewed as reprisal for speaking to the media, the wounded troops were told that early-morning room inspections would be held and that further contact with reporters is prohibited.

Yesterday, Walter Reed received an unscheduled inspection by a hospital accreditation agency. Members of the Joint Commission, formerly the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations, began a two-day visit "for cause" to examine discharge practices that have allowed soldiers to go missing or unaccounted for after they are released from the hospital.

'Senior Administration Official' Sounds A Lot Like Dick Cheney (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - Ever wonder about the identities of those "senior administration officials" who always seem to get quoted talking about President Bush's policies?

It wasn't hard to figure out who was doing the talking when the White House released a transcript of a question-and-answer session this week aboard Air Force 2, Vice President Dick Cheney's plane. One big clue: The unnamed official used the pronoun "I" when discussing Cheney's visit to Afghanistan and Pakistan.

"I would describe my sessions both in Pakistan and Afghanistan as very productive," the official said.

"I have spoken with the vice president's office, and the ground rules that were laid out are going to remain in effect," Snow told reporters Wednesday.

The exchange during Cheney's flight to Oman on Wednesday highlighted the absurdity of a practice that's damaged the credibility of journalists and government officials alike. It's much easier to believe what people say when their names are attached to their words. Statements from unidentified people invite readers to doubt that the speakers exist outside of the reporter's imagination. If anonymity is designed to promote candor, it's difficult to find in the anonymous official's quote.

The Bush administration's use of anonymous sources has become a sore spot for reporters in the wake of a series of journalistic scandals involving fabricated quotes. Yet sometimes the need for anonymity is obvious: Some sources could lose their jobs or even their lives if their identities were disclosed.

So there may be a good reason to protect sources in Iraq, but in Washington, anonymity is too often a cloak for cheap shots and self-serving comments. Some officials insist on anonymity to minimize damage if they misspeak or say something that might be embarrassing. Reporters play along to maintain good relations or out of fear that they might miss something if they refuse to participate.

The Air Force 2 transcript was unusual only because it was so easy to identify the unnamed official.

"This has definitely achieved absurdity," said Lucy Dalglish, executive director of The Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, an organization that helps journalists protect their sources. "I don't look at this as anonymous sourcing. I look at this as big-time game playing. The only way to describe it is stupid."

The White House has cut back on anonymous briefings in recent years in response to reporters' objections, but some officials still insist on anonymity, especially when discussing foreign policy. Snow defended the practice, saying that anonymity allows administration officials to be more open with reporters.

Cheney is particularly press-shy when traveling overseas. Mark Silva of The Chicago Tribune reported that he and other journalists on the vice president's nine-day, seven-country tour got a total of 18 minutes to speak with Cheney on the record. (Cheney did offer two exclusive interviews to ABC during the trip.)

In a blog about the trip, Silva adhered to the Air Force 2 ground rules even as he vented his frustration over "facing someone important with something meaningful to talk about, but insisting on anonymity as the condition for a conversation."

Cheney seemed to have some frustrations of his own. He objected to press reports that suggested he'd demanded more action from Pakistani officials against terrorism. Some of the press accounts relied on unnamed officials.

"I've seen some reporting that says, 'Cheney went in to beat up on them, threaten them.' That's not the way I work," the "senior administration official" said. "I don't know who writes that, or maybe somebody gets it from some source who doesn't know what I'm doing or isn't involved in it. But the idea that I'd go in and threaten someone is an invalid reading of the way I do business."

But don't quote him on that.

Cheney's Trip Renews Debate Over Attribution In News Accounts (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

The reporters traveling with Vice President Cheney as he flew from Afghanistan to Oman yesterday were granted an interview with someone who would be identified only as a "senior administration official." But the official's identity would not remain a state secret for long.

"Let me just make one editorial comment here," the SAO said about the vice president's talks with Pakistan's leader. "I've seen some press reporting says, 'Cheney went in to beat up on them, threaten them.' That's not the way I work. I don't know who writes that, or maybe somebody gets it from some source who doesn't know what I'm doing, or isn't involved in it. But the idea that I'd go in and threaten someone is an invalid misreading of the way I do business."

The SAO also said that "I was very careful" in choosing words to criticize House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) on Iraq strategy.

The first-person pronoun gave away the game. But it also raised the question: Why did Cheney feel the need to speak on a not-for-attribution basis, and why did the seven journalists on the trip go along?

Lee Anne McBride, Cheney's press secretary, could not, under the ground rules, confirm the obvious. But, she said, "it was important to provide the press and public with briefings on these meetings, and it was determined that a more comprehensive readout could be provided on a background basis."

Mark Silva, a Chicago Tribune reporter who made the trip, was among those pressing Cheney's staff for an on-the-record briefing, saying the vice president has been elected twice.

"At the start of our meeting with a senior administration official, in which he advised us that he insisted this talk be on background, we asked him, too, to go on the record," Silva said. Cheney agreed to be identified only while discussing the suicide bombing at Bagram air base in Afghanistan that occurred while he was there.

Silva credited the White House with releasing an accurate transcript despite numerous "I" references. "But it's also a measure of how absurd the entire business of speaking as an SAO is."

Holly Bailey, a Newsweek correspondent, said she was "very surprised at how quickly the SAO laid out the ground rules," adding that "it was done so quickly that we didn't have a lot of chance to object." She said the trip was frustrating because reporters had no more than 20 minutes' access to the vice president on the nine-day trip.

Cheney's backgrounder took place as a federal jury is weighing perjury charges against his former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, related to his role in telling reporters about covert CIA operative Valerie Plame without being identified. Libby testified that the vice president directed him to conduct the background discussions with Judith Miller, then a New York Times reporter.

Senior U.S. officials have been briefing reporters without their names attached since Henry A. Kissinger was engaged in Middle East shuttle diplomacy. Sometimes these officials appear in the White House briefing room. President Bush and several of his predecessors have conducted such background sessions with, for example, network anchors and friendly columnists.

Journalists have occasionally objected to the ground rules in these sessions, but for the most part they have become an accepted ritual.

Time magazine blogger Ana Marie Cox called the senior official's Air Force Two transcript "as blatant as birdshot in the face," adding: "The willingness of the press corps to go along with this not-even-trying level of deception is especially embarrassing."

McConnell Fighting Bush's Battles In Senate (WT)

By Jon Ward

DOJ_NMG_0138381

President Bush tomorrow will raise money for his political field general, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, who has stymied Democrats at almost every turn of the Iraq war debate.

"We think Mitch McConnell is a terrific and able minority leader," said White House spokesman Tony Snow, who declined to comment on how Democrats have fared in their attempts to halt the president's surge of troops to Iraq.

"You say Democrats are in disarray?" Mr. Snow said, feigning ignorance.

With the congressional debate over the war at fever pitch, Democratic leaders who rode to victory last fall on the promise of bringing the troops home are under fire from virtually every direction. The far left is growing impatient with the lack of progress, while more conservative Democrats are unhappy with the ideas proposed so far.

Mr. McConnell, 65, who looks more like a bookkeeper than a power broker, is "savagely political," according to one high-placed Democratic source. The Kentucky Republican has twice defeated Majority Leader Harry Reid's attempts to push through an anti-war measure that would have shut out Republican amendments.

"I don't think there's anybody in the Senate who is better than he is at managing the Senate and using the Senate rules," said Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican.

"I think that's what Senator McConnell principally has been trying to do, to make sure that all sides get a hearing," Mr. Snow said.

But Mr. McConnell's effectiveness has drawn attention from far-left Web loggers, as well as calls for the four-term senator to be targeted for defeat in 2008.

"When Reid can't get anything through the Senate, like ... the minimum wage or a vote on Iraq, the reason is Mitch McConnell," Matt Stoller wrote at MyDD.com this week. "It's time to do to Mitch McConnell what the GOP did to [former Majority Leader] Tom Daschle -- make him the symbol of everything that is wrong and get rid of him in a presidential year."

The latest polls show that more Kentucky voters approve of Mr. McConnell's performance than disapprove. However, a poll by the Louisville Courier-Journal last month showed that while 54 percent approved of Mr. McConnell, 52 percent said he should oppose Mr. Bush's surge plan.

Kentucky Democratic Party Chairman Jerry Lundergan said it would be hard to unseat Mr. McConnell, "but I do believe that if he has ever been vulnerable, it is now."

Mr. McConnell has more than $3 million in his campaign war chest, spokesman Don Stewart said. He would not comment on how much the campaign expects to raise at the fundraiser Mr. Bush will headline tomorrow in Louisville to kick off the senator's 2008 re-election campaign.

The most prominent likely challenger to Mr. McConnell is wealthy Louisville businessman Charlie Owen, who ran for the Senate in 2002 but lost in the primary.

"I just don't see anything materializing as a serious challenge to him. He's just done too good of a job," said Darrell Brock, chairman of the Kentucky Republican Party.

This Year's Toughest Balancing Act (WP)

By Paul Kane

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Rep. John Spratt's wife grew angry with him. He repeatedly fumbled a simple question in the spate of interviews he's given since becoming the new House Budget Committee chairman: What are his hobbies?

The self-described bookworm has no other hobbies. His idea of fun at the beach is burrowing into the latest 10-year estimates from a Congressional Budget Office report. After a dozen years on the sidelines in the minority, Spratt has been thrust into the role he's longed for, as committee chairman. But now comes the hard part.

Spratt is in charge of drafting a budget plan that will close a deficit of more than $200 billion within five years. And, as Spratt explained, he has to "squirrel away a little money" for up to a dozen key Democratic priorities, including big increases for education and children's health care. And he's not supposed to raise taxes to cover the additional spending and eliminate the deficit.

"We want to do it [eliminate the deficit], and be able to meet our priorities," Spratt said in a recent interview.

Unlike his colleagues, Spratt cut short his congressional recess to return to Washington last week to work on trial runs of various budget proposals. Spratt will unveil his first budget the week of March 12 and submit it for passage by his committee. It's a prospect he's looking forward to with some trepidation: "Beware the ides of March," he warned, half joking.

But Democrats say he's the perfect fit for such a delicate task. A lawyer by training -- Yale Law School -- Spratt, 64, became a small-town banker in South Carolina's northernmost county before winning election to Congress in 1982. A Southern gentleman, Spratt has engendered some of the most loyal staff members on Capitol Hill. Thomas S. Kahn, his committee staff director, has worked for him for 21 years, and a handful of staffers in his personal office have worked with Spratt even longer.

By virtue of his state's prominent presidential primary placement, Spratt and Rep. Jim Clyburn (D-S.C.) are two of the most sought-after endorsements in the nonstop White House race. He's tried to push off the campaigners with a neutrality pledge, but that hasn't stopped the calls. The morning she announced her campaign via a Web video, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) caught a surprised Spratt on the phone.

"I didn't even know she had announced," he said.

Despite the respect Spratt has engendered on both sides of the aisle, Republicans relish the chance to pounce on anything Spratt produces remotely resembling a tax increase to help reduce the deficit. "They'll call it revenue-enhancement measures. We'll call it tax increases," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), the former party campaign operative who otherwise praises Spratt for the "certain consistency" in his legislative dealings.

Democrats are adamant that won't happen. "We are not talking about tax increases," Kahn said.

To help with the heavy lifting, Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) has sat in on meetings with top committee chairmen and leaders of the key coalitions within the Democratic caucus. It's part of an effort to measure which programs are most essential, trying to build consensus in advance and send a warning that some constituencies won't necessarily like what they see in two weeks.

Regardless of the assist from leadership, Spratt said he expects some credit or all of the blame to fall on his shoulders, depending on how things work out.

"I know what my marching orders are," he said.

Hard Recovery For Failed US Schools (CSM)

By Stacy A. Teicher And Ben Arnoldy

BOSTON AND OAKLAND, CALIF.

Something had to change at Sobrante Park. Year after year, the elementary school in the poor flatlands of Oakland failed to meet test-score targets that, under state and federal laws, have consequences attached.

Sobrante Park overhauled the curriculum, turned over staff, moved the school schedule later, and rolled back bilingual education. After a difficult five years, the school now tests above Oakland's average and has freed itself from government intervention.

Yet Sobrante Park is a rare bright spot in a new and cautionary assessment of how challenging it is to reform public schools under the most sweeping national school reform in decades. A new study of California's public schools found that the number identified as chronically struggling has risen 75 percent in one year. Those schools now account for nearly 8 percent of the state's public schools. Just as noteworthy, most schools who fall into that category have not yet found a way to get out again.

California is a harbinger of the magnified problems that public schools around the country will face as the last phase of the reform timeline outlined by No Child Left Behind (NCLB) kicks in this year.

That is why experts are studying schools like Sobrante Park to understand which reforms work.

Under the mandates of the five-year-old NCLB, low-performing schools undergo a series of interventions. The last phase is "restructuring." After five years of not meeting targets for adequate yearly progress (AYP) on test scores, schools must plan for significant reform and implement it the following year.

But a few states, such as California, put accountability measures into place prior to NCLB. Out of 245 California schools that restructured in 2005-06, just 11 percent met AYP targets, said the new report, released Wednesday by the Center on Education Policy (CEP) in Washington. The center has also studied Michigan, another early adopter of accountability reforms.

"What we're finding is that school districts that implement a variety of changes are more likely to improve their test scores than those that implement only one change, such as changing [a school's] staff," says CEP's president and CEO Jack Jennings. It's good that NCLB is no longer allowing officials to turn a blind eye to low-performing schools, he says, but improving schools "is a very challenging task ... and we should have a little bit of humility when it comes to telling schools how to bring about changes."

NCLB allows several restructuring options: turning the school over to the state or a management company, reopening as a charter, replacing much of the staff, or any other major action that will significantly change school governance.

In California, that last option – "any other" major action – is what 89 percent of schools in restructuring have opted for. The first options are a way for Congress to "sound tough" about reform, Mr. Jennings says, "but when you're running a school, they don't make a lot of sense."

But some others say the "any other" option is too often used as a loophole to avoid significant reforms. As NCLB reauthorization is debated this year, various proposals are on the table for how to make restructuring requirements more effective.

The Department of Education (DOE) proposes taking the "any other" option off the table. They would also give superintendents the opportunity to suspend collective-bargaining agreements in order to bring highly qualified staff to troubled schools to target students' needs.

At Sobrante Park, Principal Marco Franco opted for the "any other" option and changed four out of 14 staff members – a smaller percentage than the district wanted. "I knew the staff and I knew I wanted to keep them," Mr. Franco says. "If I lost the proportion the district wanted me to lose, I don't know if we would be in the same place."

Staff changes in Oakland's restructuring efforts are mostly a matter of moving teachers between schools in the district, with principals' hiring options limited by teacher contracts.

CEP found that 30 percent of schools in restructuring in California opted to change their staff, but only 5 percent of these schools went on to meet AYP.

Jennings acknowledges that the research is still too new to draw broad conclusions about what works.

Giving superintendents flexibility to bring better teachers into schools with the highest needs is a good proposal on the part of the DOE, says Amy Wilkins of The Education Trust, a group in Washington, D.C., which advocates for closing achievement gaps. But such moves need to go hand in hand with measuring teachers' effectiveness, she says. "Just getting different faces in the classroom is not the point."

After a year of hearings in communities around the United States, the nonpartisan Commission on No Child Left Behind came out last month with a set of recommendations. On the subject of restructuring, there was agreement that "when a school is struggling consistently, they need to take more aggressive action," says Gary Huggins, the commission's director.

The commission suggests, as does the CEP report, that schools be required to choose a comprehensive set of actions rather than a single intervention. But it also says they should have more time to show results once changes are made.

But it's unfair to mandate restructuring options when "none has any track record of success," says Bob Schaeffer of the National Center for Fair & Open Testing in Cambridge, Mass., which opposes NCLB.

The Oakland Unified School District, run by a state-appointed administrator since 2003 due to financial difficulties, decides case by case how much latitude to give schools in choosing restructuring plans. This year it says it might intervene in 14 schools, possibly closing four.

The plan drawn up by Franco and his staff had many components, but he sums up the philosophy this way: "If something is not working, toss it, man."

That got Franco, a Latino, into hot water with parents when he ended the bilingual program in the upper grades. The complaints tapered off after parents saw test scores improve, he says.

DOJ_NMG_0138384

The teachers adopted a more scripted and uniform curriculum, making it easier for them to collaborate and for the principal to evaluate them. The school day was changed to allow teachers time to work with individual students. Franco hired a writing coach and used some money to reopen the school library, which had been converted to storage.

California school update

401 – The number of schools required to plan or implement NCLB restructuring in 2005-06.

701 – The number of such schools in 2006-07.

207 – The number of schools in restructuring that have failed to make adequate yearly progress on tests for seven consecutive years.

10 – The number in restructuring that improved enough between 2005-06 and 2006-07 to have that label removed.

Poor Education Found In States (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

U.S. Chamber of Commerce leaders yesterday said states are doing a poor job educating America's children for the future, citing a new report by the chamber that graded each state in areas from academic achievement and teacher quality to how wisely a state is spending its education dollars.

"This is an effort to do what is responsible for America's youth," said chamber President Thomas J. Donohue. "Our study has found that when it comes to education, the states aren't making the grade."

The study, conducted with help from the Center for American Progress (CAP) and the American Enterprise Institute, compiled and analyzed data from other research, the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP) and a national survey of teachers. States received letter grades in nine categories but no overall rankings.

Arthur Rothkopf, senior vice president of the chamber, said the report identifies "leaders and laggards."

Massachusetts, Minnesota and New Hampshire topped the list of 10 states that received A's for academic achievement. New Mexico, Mississippi and the District took the three lowest slots among the 10 that received F's. Grades were based on an analysis of the 2005 NAEP, a test given to a sampling of students nationwide.

John Podesta, president and chief executive officer of CAP, pointed out variations. He said Massachusetts, the top state for academic achievement, showed only 44 percent of fourth-graders proficient in reading and 49 percent proficient in math -- numbers he called "unconscionable."

The study also examined whether states presented accurate information or overstated student performance. Massachusetts, Maine, South Carolina, Wyoming and Missouri received A's for honesty. Oklahoma and Tennessee received F's, and 15 other states that were deemed to be sugarcoating performance got D's.

Most states received A's or B's on teacher quality. Six received D's, and Rhode Island got an F. The scores were based largely on whether states test teachers in both basic and subject-specific areas, and whether they recruit and test non-teaching professionals.

In a comparison of education spending with student performance, 10 states -- including Utah, North Carolina and Washington -- received A's. The District and nine states -- including Hawaii and New Mexico -- failed.

The report was issued as the National Governors Association ended its winter meeting. Governors considered a federal framework to help states, institutions of higher learning and the private sector work together on innovations to improve proficiency in math and science, increase the number of science and engineering students, among other goals.

The chamber yesterday suggested higher starting salaries for teachers, removing ineffective educators and giving principals more control over budget and personnel. Chamber officials said the business community can give schools examples of management improvements, data collection and innovation.

A Critique Of Pure Reason (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0138385

By David Brooks

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

All the presidential candidates this year will talk about education. The conventional ones will talk about improving the schools. The creative ones will talk about improving the lives of students.

The conventional ones, though they don't know it, are prisoners of the dead husk of behaviorism. They will speak of education as if children were blank slates waiting to have ideas inputted into their brains with some efficient delivery mechanism.

The creative ones will finally absorb the truth found in decades of research: the relationships children have outside school shape their performance inside the school.

The conventional candidates will give the same old education reform speeches, trumpeting this or that bureaucratic reshuffle. The creative ones will give speeches like the one David Cameron, who is reviving the British Tory party, gave last month. They will talk, as Cameron did, about the mushy things, like love and attachment, and will say, as Cameron did, "Family relationships matter more than anything else."

They will understand that schools filled with students who can't control their impulses, who can't focus their attention and who can't regulate their emotions will not succeed, no matter how many reforms are made by governors, superintendents or presidents.

These candidates will emphasize that education is a cumulative process that begins at the dawn of life and builds early in life as children learn how to learn. These candidates will point out that powerful social trends — the doubling of single-parent families over the past generation, the rise of divorce rates — mean that government has to rethink its role. They'll note that if we want to have successful human capital policies, we have to get over the definition of education as something that takes place in schools between the hours of 8 and 3, between the months of September and June, and between the ages of 5 and 18.

As Bob Marvin of the University of Virginia points out, there is a mountain of evidence demonstrating that early childhood attachments shape lifelong learning competence.

Children do have inborn temperaments and intelligence. Nevertheless, students make the most of their natural dispositions when they have a secure emotional base from which to explore, and even the brightest children stumble when there is chaos inside.

Research over the past few decades impressively shows that children who emerge from attentive, attuned parental relationships do better in school and beyond. They tend to choose friends wisely. They handle frustration better. They're more resilient in the face of setbacks. They grow up to become more productive workers.

On the other hand, as Martha Farah of the University of Pennsylvania has found, students who do not feel emotionally safe tend not to develop good memories (which is consistent with cortisol experiments in animals). Students from less stimulating environments have worse language skills.

The question, of course, is, What can government do about any of this? The answer is that there are programs that do work to help young and stressed mothers establish healthier attachments. These programs usually involve having nurses or mature women make a series of home visits to give young mothers the sort of cajoling and practical wisdom that in other times would have been delivered by grandmothers or elders.

The Circle of Security program has measurably improved attachments and enhanced social skills. The Nurse-Family Partnerships program, founded by David Olds, has produced rigorously examined, impressive results. Children who have been in this program had 59 percent fewer arrests at age 15. (Presidential candidates are commanded to read Katherine Boo's Feb. 6, 2006, New Yorker article to get a feel for how these programs work.)

It's important not to get carried away. "Enhancing Early Attachments," a review of the literature edited by Lisa Berlin and others, is filled with phrases like "marginal success" and "modest but significant benefits." But these programs can be expanded.

And one thing is clear: It's crazy to have educational policies that, in effect, chop up children's brains into the rational cortex, which the government ministers to in schools, and the emotional limbic system, which the government ignores. In nature there is no neat division. Emotional engagement is the essence of information processing and learning.

In Britain, where both David Cameron and Gordon Brown have grappled with this reality, policy is catching up with the research. In the United States, we are forever behind. But that won't last. This year, some smart presidential candidate will help us catch up.

Consumer Groups Call For More Oversight Of Energy Regulation (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, March 1, 2007

Consumer advocacy groups are pushing Democrats to step up oversight of a federal energy panel that oversees electricity markets and to take a fresh look at electricity-deregulation policies that they argue have raised consumer prices.

Deregulation critics sponsored a Washington conference Monday on the health of wholesale power markets that included officials in deregulated states where prices have jumped significantly.

On Capitol Hill, these critics have asked the new Democratic chairmen of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources and the House Energy and Commerce committees, Sen. Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico and Rep. John Dingell of Michigan, to hold hearings on how effective the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) is in overseeing wholesale power markets.

Tyson Slocum, who directs Public Citizen's energy program, said deregulation has not led to competition in wholesale markets and that FERC has done a poor job of ensuring consumer rates are "just and reasonable."

Utilities, large commercial energy users and financial giants have formed their own coalition, called Compete, to counter anti-deregulation arguments.

Compete has hired the Nickles Group, founded by former Sen. Don Nickles (R-Okla.), Wexler Walker Public Policy Advocates, and Covington & Burling to lobby Congress and federal agencies on energy policy.

Electricity deregulation is not a hot topic in Congress. But in states that deregulated only to see prices rise and at FERC, which regulates wholesale power markets, the issue is a subject of significant debate; hence the formation of the lobby groups.

FERC itself waded again into the mix with its own conference Tuesday. Panel Chairman Joseph Kelliher acknowledged that competitive markets "face challenges." But he said the policy of a mix of competition and government oversight was made national by the Energy Policy Act of 2005.

"The fact that we are holding this conference shows that we have heard the criticism of stakeholders and market participants, and that we take these concerns seriously," Kelliher said.

Utilities say higher rates are the result of high natural-gas prices, not deregulation. They generally offer technical changes to the structure of the markets themselves rather than a return to the old days where regulators set rates based on the cost of generation plus a set fee.

Advocates once hoped that by bringing the same competitive pressures that reduced telephone rates and airline ticket prices, power prices would fall too. Under deregulation, vertically integrated utilities that produced the power and then transmitted it and sold it to consumers were broken up. Generation was separated from transmission and distribution.

Twelve states have fully deregulated their electricity markets, Slocum said. Those states pay higher electricity prices than the others. One reason these states embraced deregulation, however, was their power prices were higher than other regions to begin with. But rates have increased nearly 9 percent over the past four years in the 12 states, versus a 5 percent growth rate in the other 38 states, according to information Slocum cites from the Energy Information Administration, which collects a variety of energy data.

Joel Malina, a Wexler Walker lobbyist representing Compete, said rates in states that remain regulated have seen some of the sharpest increases in power prices in recent years. That means, he said, that rising price of fuels is to blame, not deregulation.

But he added that "no market is perfect." Deregulated markets are "evolving," he said.

Consumer groups seem split on the issue, based on whether they represent residential electricity users or large companies. The Electricity Consumers Resource Council, which represents large industrial users, says the current deregulation attempts have fallen short of promises.

But the group issued a paper in December rejecting calls to return to the old system because utilities had “little incentive to seek more efficient, lower-priced generation options or pursue innovative product offerings.” The group said less regulation of so-called competitive markets was needed, not more.

The powerful senior lobby, AARP, meanwhile, has “serious concerns” about the rising electricity rates in markets that have been deregulated, said Debra Berlyn, a senior legislative representative for the group who attended the Monday conference.

“We’ve been active on the state level and now we are looking at what we can do to complement [that activity] on the federal level.”

House Bill Boosts Scrutiny Of Foreign Deals (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The House approved legislation that would strengthen U.S. scrutiny of overseas-led business deals, underscoring lawmakers' angst over the frictions caused by the international-investment boom.

The measure, approved yesterday on a vote of 423-0, would require the administration to conduct an extended, 45-day investigation of most deals involving foreign governments, give intelligence agencies a formal role in the review process and increase disclosure to Congress, among other things.

The bipartisan legislation was written in consultation with the White House, which has tried to balance the dual goals of protecting national security and ensuring an open investment environment. While raising concern about some details of the bill, the White House moved ahead of the vote to welcome the House efforts to "strengthen" the investment-review process.

The depth of the vote underscores the broader difficulties ahead for the White House, which is striving to put the president's trade and economic agenda back on track. Voted in on a tide of antiglobalization sentiment, many lawmakers are concerned that U.S. workers and companies aren't getting a fair shake in the global marketplace.

The vote is sure to increase pressure on the Senate to take up the issue, and Senate Banking Chairman Chris Dodd of Connecticut said he intends to act "in the coming weeks." Mr. Dodd vowed to embrace a "balanced approach" that carves a greater role for the intelligence community in investment reviews and gives Congress "a far greater oversight role to prevent the recurrence of Dubai Ports World episodes."

DP World -- which is owned by the government of Dubai, a Persian Gulf emirate -- touched off a political furor on Capitol Hill last year after moving to acquire control of several U.S. ports operations as part of a broader deal. The Bush administration approved the ports deal following a standard, 30-day review, but lawmakers alleged administration officials had failed to grasp the post-Sept. 11 danger of giving an Arab firm access to American ports, where lax security is a concern. Amid the uproar, DP World agreed to sell off its U.S. holdings.

House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank of Massachusetts said yesterday's measure would reassure investors that the U.S. remains a secure place to do business by making clear the rules controlling U.S. scrutiny of foreign deals.

At the center of the issue is the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., or CFIUS, a secretive panel that reviews the national-security implications of overseas deals. Twelve government agencies are represented on CFIUS, which is led by the Treasury Department.

The House bill would require greater disclosure to Congress of CFIUS actions and senior-level sign-off within the government on certain deals. It would also codify the administration's authority to reopen, and even unwind, deals after they have been cleared by the U.S. government. Moving on its own, the administration recently began to using such a limit as a way to enforce other conditions that the government has imposed on transactions.

The U.S. business community, by and large, has swung behind the House bill. This week, a broad business coalition, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, circulated a letter on Capitol Hill urging passage, saying the bill would "enhance confidence" in the CFIUS process.

Bill On Foreign Investment Advances (WP/AP)

By Jim Abrams

DOJ_NMG_0138388

The House agreed yesterday to give the government broader powers to review foreign investments in U.S. power plants, ports and other facilities that could be vulnerable to terrorist attacks.

The legislation, passed 423 to 0, would give legal muscle to a once-obscure federal office that gained attention a year ago when a Dubai company planned to manage six large U.S. ports.

The deal fell through after lawmakers from both parties said the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, or CFIUS, ignored serious national security concerns in signing off on the transaction.

The legislation, which moves to the Senate, would expand the definition of transactions that require CFIUS review to include those involving homeland security and critical infrastructures, and would take steps to ensure that high-level officials would be involved in decisions by the multi-agency group.

"This bill contains very tough provisions to protect national security, including the ability for CFIUS to reopen reviews when companies don't comply with mitigation agreements designed to reduce security risks," said Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-N.Y.), a sponsor.

The legislation would ensure that Congress is notified when investigations are complete. Lawmakers' complaints that they were left out of the process were a major factor in the anger engendered by the proposed Dubai Ports World deal.

It would require a 45-day investigation, after the initial 30-day review, of any deal involving companies controlled by foreign governments.

Last year, with Congress under Republican control, the House and Senate approved legislation to revamp the CFIUS process, but the two chambers were unable to compromise on a common bill.

The Bush administration said in a statement that it supported the House bill but expressed some reservations, including that extending the investigations to 45 days "may discourage foreign investment by generating uncertainty and delay."

Todd Malan, president of the Organization for International Investment, an association representing U.S. subsidiaries of foreign companies, said he was pleased.

"From a business standpoint, it doesn't screw anything up," Malan said. "It maintains CFIUS's role as a screening process, not as a barrier to foreign investment."

Federal Diary: Looking For A Route To Better Government (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, March 1, 2007

It's apparently not too early to start thinking up ideas for how the next administration can improve the government's management practices.

With the presidential campaign field taking shape, think tanks and public-service and business groups are preparing to develop policy proposals and ideas for the winning candidate.

The IBM Center for the Business of Government, for example, plans to launch an "interactive conversation" today to help find ideas for the next White House.

To start the conversation, the District-based IBM Center hopes to prompt an online discussion on issues raised in a new report, "Reflections on 21st Century Management," written by professors Donald F. Kettl of the University of Pennsylvania and Steven Kelman of Harvard University. The Web address is http://www.businessofgovernment.org/transition2008.

The Government Performance Coalition, a group of organizations interested in management issues, is sponsoring a Transitions in Governance 2008 Web site, in hopes of helping shape the agenda for 2008 and beyond.

The group's steering committee envisions the Web site (http://www. http://transitionsingov http://.org) as a way to get political campaigns, federal managers and the public involved in defining management issues for the next administration. A "transitions blog" is scheduled to go live today.

Jonathan D. Breul, a former Office of Management and Budget executive, will be heading up the Performance Coalition. In a bit of a coincidence, he takes over the position of executive director at the IBM Center today, replacing Mark. A. Abramson, who will continue as a consultant to the center and reopen his own company.

Other organizations, such as the Council for Excellence in Government, also are making plans for the next presidential transition. Patricia McGinnis, that group's president, said the council plans to take its "Prune Book," an analysis of the plum jobs in government that require experienced leadership, and move it to the Internet. "We want to push out and reach a lot of people across the country," she said.

The council plans to sponsor a series of discussions for career managers to prepare them for what to expect during a transition, when a crop of new political appointees arrive in Washington.

Thinking up new ideas for improving government could be challenge, after almost 16 years of "reinventing government" by the Clinton-Gore administration and the Bush-Cheney team's "president's management agenda." Those initiatives were met with some resistance from Congress and were greeted skeptically by many federal employees who perceived them as efforts to downsize and outsource government operations.

In recent months, the government's efforts to improve the performance of programs and the delivery of services has been overshadowed by the controversy over the Iraq war, allegations of contract waste and fraud, and the sluggish response by federal officials to Hurricane Katrina.

Still, the federal government has taken what Kelman calls a "performance turn," driven by a 1993 law, the Government Performance and Results Act, that has prodded agencies to show the public what it is getting for its tax dollars. Efforts to link budgets to program performance measures also have become more common, Kelman says.

The next president, Kelman suggests, will take steps to increase the use of performance management techniques, improve management of federal contracts, and look at public-private partnerships and interagency collaborations as ways of improving service to taxpayers.

But Kelman says more research is needed to show that some of these efforts are more than just a management fad and can make a difference in how agencies and programs perform.

Kettl believes the next president will face pressure to reshape the government so that it can more quickly respond to what he calls "non-routine problems," such as terrorism, natural disasters and health emergencies.

The government's most important problems "refuse to stay within the boundaries of the government agencies established to solve them," Kettl writes.

"New agencies created to tackle the new generation of problems, like the federal Department of Homeland Security, have struggled to find their footing." he argues. "Even more important, they tend to be backward looking, focused on solving the last set of problems rather than scanning the environment for the next set of problems that must be solved."

Amid the mad jumble that makes the news in our time, the White House on Monday held a ceremony for a Medal of Honor recipient. His name is Bruce Crandall. Mr. Crandall is 74 now, and earned his medal as a major, flying a Huey helicopter in 1965 in the Vietnam War.

The Medal of Honor is conferred only for bravery in combat. It is a military medal, and it is still generally regarded as the highest public tribute this nation can bestow. It is also very rare.

Still, the Medal of Honor does not occupy the place in the nation's cultural life that it once did. This has much to do with the ambivalent place of the military in our angry politics.

The Medal of Honor

In the House debate just ended on a "non-binding" resolution to thwart the sending of more troops to Iraq, its most noted element was the Democratic formulation to "support the troops" but oppose the war. We will hear more of this when the members of the Senate debate their own symbolic resolution.

In last November's congressional election, the Democrats picked several military veterans as candidates to mitigate the notion, a burden since Vietnam, that an endemic hostility toward things military runs through the party's veins. Those Democratic veterans won. Notwithstanding the bitter divide over Iraq, the presence of these veterans in Congress should be a good thing, if one thinks that the oft-publicized "divide" between the professional military and American civilians is not in this country's interest. It surely cannot be in the country's interest if over time more Americans come to regard the life of U.S. soldiers at war and in combat as an abstraction -- as say, mainly Oscar nominees or as newspaper photographs of scenes of utter loss at arms.

Two men have received the Medal of Honor for service in Iraq: Army Sgt. First Class Paul R. Smith, who died defending some 100 fellow soldiers, allowing their withdrawal; and Marine Cpl. Jason L. Dunham, who died after he dove atop a live grenade to protect his squad. (Cpl. Dunham's act was the subject of a 2004 Wall Street Journal story by reporter Michael M. Phillips and later a book, "The Gift of Valor.")

Bruce Crandall's Medal of Honor, at an emotional remove of 42 years, offers a chance to ponder just where the military stands now in the nation's life. The particulars of Lt. Col. Crandall's act of heroism, and what others said of it at the awarding of the medal on Monday, offers we civilians a chance to understand not merely the risks of combat but what animates those who embrace those risks.

Mr. Crandall, then a major, commanded a company with the 229th Assault Helicopter Battalion, carrying soldiers to a landing zone, called X-ray, in the Ia Drang Valley. An assault from the North Vietnamese army erupted, as described at the White House ceremony Monday. Three soldiers on Maj. Crandall's helicopter were killed. He kept it on the ground while four wounded were taken aboard. Back at base, he asked for a volunteer to return with him to X-ray. Capt. Ed Freeman came forward. Through smoke and bullets, they flew in and out 14 times, spent 14 hours in the air and used three helicopters. They evacuated 70 wounded. The battalion survived.

A Medal of Honor requires eyewitness accounts, and an officer there attested, "Maj. Crandall's actions were without question the most valorous I've observed of any helicopter pilot in Vietnam."

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, spoke at the ceremony of what he called "the warrior ethos." Look at his words and consider whether they still stand today, or whether as a matter of the nation's broader ethos of commonly accepted beliefs, they are under challenge. Gen. Schoomaker said: "The words of the warrior ethos that we have today -- I will always place the mission first; I will never accept defeat; I will never quit; and I will never leave a fallen comrade -- were made real that day in the Ia Drang Valley."

At issue today is the question: Is that ethos worth it, worth the inevitable sacrifice? And not only in Iraq but in whatever may lie beyond Iraq?

The secretary of the Army, Francis Harvey, went on in this vein: "The courage and fortitude of America's soldiers in combat exemplified by these individuals is, without question, the highest level of human behavior. It demonstrates the basic goodness of mankind as well as the inherent kindness and patriotism of American soldiers."

An American soldier in combat demonstrates "the basic goodness of mankind"? And the highest level of human behavior? This was not thought to be true at the moment Maj. Crandall was flying those choppers in Vietnam. Nor is it now.

To embrace the thoughts of Gen. Schoomaker and of Secretary Harvey is to risk being accused of defending notions of American triumphalism and an overly strong martial spirit thought inappropriate to the realities of a multilateral world. This is a debate worth having. But we are not having it. We are hiding from it.

Most school children once knew the names of the nation's heroes in war -- Ethan Allen, John Paul Jones, Stephen Decatur, the Swamp Fox Francis Marion, Ulysses S. Grant, Clara Barton, Billy Mitchell, Alvin York, Lee Ann Hester. Lee Ann who? She's the first woman to win a Silver Star for direct combat with the enemy. Did it in a trench in Iraq. Her story should be in schools, but it won't be.

All nations celebrate personal icons, and ours now tend to be doers of good. That's fine. But if we suppress the martial feats of a Bruce Crandall, we distance ourselves further from our military. And in time, we will change. At some risk.

"MR. SMALL is not going to talk about his own compensation," says the spokeswoman for Smithsonian head Lawrence M. Small. Who can blame him, seeing how he doesn't seem to have to answer to anyone for his spending, no matter how extravagant? The Smithsonian board, which is supposed to oversee the wise use of public dollars, instead defends questionable expenditures by Mr. Small and even changes its rules to excuse his conduct after the fact.

A report by the Smithsonian inspector general questioned nearly $90,000 in unauthorized spending by Mr. Small from 2000 to 2005. Included were charges for private planes, the tab for his wife to go to Cambodia, catered meals and gifts. There was no evidence of fraud or abuse and no denying that many expenditures were related to Smithsonian business. Yet, as The Post's James V. Grimaldi reported, many transactions lacked documentation, violated Smithsonian policies and, in the words of the inspector general, "might be considered lavish or extravagant." The 17-member Board of Regents brushed the findings aside; in instances where the spending ran afoul of policy, the board just changed its rules. It's also disturbing that there were efforts to keep the report secret.

Mr. Small is handsomely compensated (this year's package will be $915,698), so it's both inexplicable and offensive that he found it necessary to push the boundaries of what is allowed. Was it really necessary, for instance, to pay $14,509 to rent a jet for a round trip to San Antonio when commercial flights were available? Most striking was the way Mr. Small interpreted terms of a housing allowance, dispensing with filing monthly documentation and using a "hypothetical" calculation to collect $1.15 million over seven years. Never mind that Mr. Small owns his home free and clear.

As distressing as Mr. Small's actions were, the real problem lies with a board that opted to be more lap dog than watchdog. The Smithsonian receives 70 percent of its budget from taxpayers and also relies on tax-exempt donations. It's the board's job to ensure that those resources are not wasted or misused. Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), who has been attacking the practices of tax-exempt organizations, is asking whether the Smithsonian's governance system, established in 1846, is outdated. Mr. Grassley might have a point, given that his concerns were directed to a Smithsonian chancellor who also happens to be chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court and presumably has other issues occupying his time.

At least the Smithsonian board knows that it has its work cut out for it in restoring public trust. Roger Sant, chairman of the regents' executive committee, put the word out to Smithsonian staff members that the regents take seriously the issues that have been raised and are determining how best to proceed.

DOJ_NMG_0138392

By Tim Paradis

Chicago Tribune, March 1, 2007

NEW YORK -- Wall Street rebounded fitfully Wednesday from the previous session's 416-point plunge in the Dow industrials as investors took comfort from comments by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke but still showed signs of unease about the economy.

Bernanke's remarks to Congress that he still expects moderate economic growth gave some investors confidence to look for bargains. A recovery in some overseas markets following a worldwide selloff Tuesday also lent some support to U.S stocks, but the advance lacked some conviction -- the major indexes fluctuated throughout the day, with the Dow rising as much as 137 points before pulling back and advancing again several times.

The market's broader indicators also managed gains. The Standard & Poor's 500 index climbed 7.78, or 0.56 percent, to 1,406.82, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 8.29, or 0.34 percent, to 2,416.15.

Bernanke allayed some of the fears about a slowdown in the U.S. and Chinese economies that fed Tuesday's drop; remarks earlier in the week from former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan warning that a U.S. recession could take hold later this year contributed to Tuesday's declines.

Investors parsed a series of economic reports out Wednesday, hoping to glean a sense of where stocks were headed. Bernanke's comments and a gross domestic product reading that mostly met expectations helped bring out some buyers. Nevertheless, investors remained cautious and didn't rush headlong into stocks and discount the possibility of a further shakeout.

"It's typical that you get a bounceback the next day," said Joseph V. Battipaglia, chief investment officer at Ryan Beck & Co. "Now we're essentially flat on the year. Can we go up from here or down? That sorting-out process will continue now."

A recovery in China's Shanghai Composite Index, which had fallen nearly 9 percent Tuesday, also helped boost U.S. stocks, although other Asian markets and European exchanges saw declines of more than 1 percent.

Tuesday's decline, which was the largest point drop in the Dow industrials in more than five years, made February an unwelcome month for the 30-stock index. The Dow had its worst monthly percentage drop since April 2005 and the worst monthly point decline since December of 2002.

For the S&P, February was the worst percentage and point decline since May last year. And for Nasdaq, the month marked the worst percentage and point decline since July.

Bonds fell Wednesday as stocks tried to recoup some losses. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose to 4.57 percent from its low for the year of 4.47 percent late Tuesday.

The market took some solace from the Commerce Department report that the U.S. economy grew at an annual rate of 2.2 percent in the fourth quarter. The gross domestic product reading was slightly below expectations, but wasn't as weak as some investors had feared. The figure was more than a percentage point below the initial estimate of 3.5 percent made a month ago.

In other economic news, the National Association of Purchasing Management-Chicago index of business conditions in the Midwest showed a weaker-than-expected reading. The February figure fell to 47.9 from 48.8 in January. The report is often viewed as a bellwether for the Institute for Supply Management's index of manufacturing activity for February, which is due Thursday.

Also, a Commerce Department report found new-home sales fell by 16.6 percent in January from the previous month, the largest drop in 13 years.

"People are still more worried than they were two days ago but at the same time they seemed to take a little bit of comfort about today's comments," said Drew Matus, senior economist at Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. "What we saw was about right," he said, referring to Wednesday's trading.

"It showed that Bernanke has come into his own as a central banker. He passed his first crisis-management exam."

While some observers had warned that stocks had grown overvalued after the strong gains logged in 2006, Tuesday's pullback nonetheless came as a surprise on Wall Street, which had gone 45 months without a decline of more than 2 percent in single session.

In the bumpy trading that occurred Wednesday, particularly as fresh economic data emerged, investors appeared to be still calculating the ramifications of Tuesday's losses, which erased $632 billion in shareholder equity, according to Standard & Poor's.

Amid another heavy volume day Wednesday, the New York Stock Exchange instructed specialists, who match buyers and sellers, to keep their stock posts open longer than normal to catch any trades that might still be filtering through the system. The enormous volume of orders Tuesday led to a bottleneck in the Big Board's trading system.

In corporate news, Merck & Co. regained some ground after the drugmaker issued a first-quarter profit forecast that surpassed estimates of Wall Street analysts and raised its profit target for the year. The company rose 97 cents, or 2.3 perc ent, to $44.15.

Sprint Nextel Corp. rose 85 cents, or 4.6 percent, to $19.30 after the nation's third largest wireless carrier said fourth-quarter profit rose 33 percent on stronger revenue.

While many sectors saw buyers sniffing for deals, homebuilders saw additional selling, due in large part to the Commerce Department report that new-home sales plunged in January by the largest amount in 13 years.

Toll Brothers Inc. fell 72 cents, or 2.4 percent, to $29.86, while KB Home fell 56 cents to $49.53.

Advancing issues outpaced decliners by about 2 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange, where consolidated volume came to a heavy 3.93 billion. Volume was lighter than the enormous 4.56 billion seen Tuesday, however.

The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies rose 0.64, or 0.08 percent, to 793.30.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average fell 2.85 percent, while Hong Kong's Heng Seng index ended down 2.46 percent. The benchmark Shanghai Composite Index rose 3.94 percent. Britain's FTSE 100 closed down 1.82 percent, Germany's DAX index finished down 1.53 percent, and France's CAC-40 was down 1.29 percent.

Fed Chief Seeks To Reassure Markets (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

Ben Bernanke moved to calm the markets on Wednesday, one day after reports of bearish comments by his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, helped fuel a global sell-off in equities.

The Federal Reserve chairman told the House Budget committee: “Taking all the new data into account, there is really no material change in our expectations for the US economy since I last reported to Congress a couple of weeks ago in the Humphrey-Hawkins hearings.”

At those earlier hearings, Mr Bernanke presented new Fed forecasts showing that policymakers expect the US economy to grow at a rate of 2.5 per cent – 3 per cent this year.

Since then, US durable goods orders and monthly new home sales figures have come in sharply lower than expected and fourth-quarter growth has been revised down.

The Fed chairman’s remarks suggest he believes this new information will have little impact on the forward-looking forecasts that form the basis of the Fed’s interest rate decisions. Mr Bernanke made no reference to the comments by Mr Greenspan, who told investors in Hong Kong early on Monday morning that it was “possible” the US would end the year in recession.

“There did not seem to be any single trigger of the market correction we saw yesterday,” Mr Bernanke said, adding: “I do not think it would be useful for me to try to parse the movement into the components associated with different pieces of news or pieces of information.”

It is not the first time that market participants have cited comments by Mr Greenspan to help explain sudden market moves.

However, under Mr Bernanke, the Fed has consistently taken the position that it is not Mr Greenspan’s fault if investors pay excessive attention to what he has to say.

In any event, the former Fed chairman's actual remarks were more measured than early market reports suggested, and the timing of their release makes it difficult to attribute a direct causal connection to the sell-off on Tuesday.

Rather than try to explain why the markets fell yesterday, Mr Bernanke focused on the broad economic outlook, painting a reassuring picture. "We expect moderate growth going forward," the Fed chairman said.

Mr Bernanke dismissed the suggestion that the downward revision to fourth-quarter growth estimates challenged the Fed's relatively benign outlook.

He told the House committee that the revision was "actually more consistent with our overall view of the economy than were the original numbers". By this, he probably meant the Fed no longer had to worry quite as much that the economy was in danger of overheating, while it also had to worry less about payback from unduly high inventory accumulation in the last quarter of 2006.

Mr Bernanke also repeated the Fed view that growth was likely to pick up in the second half of this year as the drag from housing and manufacturing fades.

He said: "If the housing sector begins to stabilise and if some of the inventory corrections that are still going on in manufacturing begin to be completed, there is a reasonable possibility that we will see some strengthening of the economy sometime during the middle of the year."

Mr Bernanke played down fears of a spillover from the crisis in the high-risk subprime mortgage market, adding that the mainstream mortgage market "still seems to be healthy and the lending side of that still seems to be healthy".

Bernanke Helps Investors Chill Out (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke reassured shaky investors Wednesday, saying there didn't seem to be a single "trigger" for the previous day's stock market plunge and reaffirming the central bank's earlier forecast for "moderate" economic growth this year.

Bernanke told the House Budget Committee the Fed and other regulators are closely monitoring financial markets, which "seem to be working well."

The Dow Jones industrial average, after plunging 416.02 points Tuesday, the largest point decline in more than five years, closed up 52 points Wednesday to 12,269.

"There is really no material change in our expectations for the U.S. economy," Bernanke told lawmakers.

"If the housing sector begins to stabilize and if some of the inventory corrections that are still going on in manufacturing begin to be completed … there's a reasonable possibility that we'll see strengthening of the economy sometime during the middle of the year," he said.

The Fed's semiannual forecast, issued in mid-February, predicts that the economy will grow at a muted 2.5% to 3% rate in 2007, with unemployment near the current, low 4.6% rate. The slower growth — the economy grew 3.3% in 2006 — should reduce inflation.

Economic data in recent days, however, have tended to the weak side. The Commerce Department on Wednesday said the economy grew at a 2.2% annual rate in the fourth quarter, down from an earlier 3.5% estimate. New-home sales and housing starts plunged in January, and orders for long-lasting durable goods had the sharpest fall in three years, reflecting factory weakness.

Bernanke told lawmakers the lower estimates for fourth-quarter growth were in line with the Fed outlook.

Bernanke has called the housing market a big question mark in Fed forecasts. The central bank is closely watching escalating defaults in the subprime mortgage sector. Spreading weakness among subprime lenders, who make higher-priced loans to borrowers with poor credit, was a factor in the market fall.

The central banker said the Fed would soon issue tighter guidelines for mortgage loans, adding that while the subprime sector is a worry, "At this point, we don't see it as being a broad financial concern."

Over the longer term, Bernanke warned lawmakers that a sharp rise in Social Security and Medicare spending threatened growth and living standards. Without action, the economy could be "seriously weakened."

Fed Chief Calms Markets, Saying The Economy Is Sound (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke tried to sooth jittery financial markets on Wednesday, saying the fundamentals of the U.S. economy remain strong and that he expects growth to pick up by midyear rather than sink toward recession.

Testifying before the House Budget Committee the morning after a global stock sell-off, Bernanke downplayed chances of a financial meltdown. He said financial markets "seem to be working well," and said revised economic growth numbers published Wednesday confirmed consensus expectations among economists.

"My view is, taking all the new data into account, there is really no material change in our expectations for the U.S. economy," said Bernanke, painting a largely positive economic picture, including an expected rebound in housing.

Bernanke's testimony gave Wall Street a temporary shot in the arm. The Dow Jones industrial average had gained back nearly 200 points in early morning trading, but by midday slumped anew and was up by only 56 points, or about half of one percent. The trend was similar on the tech-heavy Nasdaq and the S&P 500.

Wall Street was attempting to claw back after Tuesday's unusual and unexpected drop. The Dow closed down more than 416 points Tuesday, and the Nasdaq and S&P 500 also plunged precipitously.

Bernanke also addressed to two of the major concerns that have contributed to market anxieties _ a rise in defaults on risky sub-prime adjustable-rate mortgages, and a nearly 8 percent drop in the purchase of business equipment by major manufacturers and industries.

"We believe that if the housing sector begins to stabilize, and if some of the inventory corrections that are still going on in manufacturing begin to be completed, that there is a reasonable possibility that we'll see some strengthening in the economy sometime during the middle of the year," the chairman said.

That positive view stood in sharp contrast to his predecessor Alan Greenspan, whose Monday comments that a recession could loom late this year or early next year contributed to Tuesday's global stock-market slide.

There didn't appear to be "any single trigger" to Tuesday's global stock sell-off, Bernanke said, pointing to a number of lingering concerns that all contributed to panic selling. Tuesday's global sell-off began in China, where the Shanghai Composite Index fell nearly 9 percent. Stock exchanges of important emerging markets like Brazil and Mexico were also hammered, as investors everywhere took money off the table following a year of strong gains.

But fears of a global crash eased Wednesday morning. China's benchmark index, the Shanghai, rebounded by nearly 4 percent, gaining back almost half of Tuesday's losses.

The picture wasn't nearly as bright for the rest of Asia, where economies are very dependent on China for their own economic health, and where worries remain about a potential slowdown in China's booming economy.

Asian stock exchanges slumped again Wednesday. Australia, Japan, Hong Kong and South Korea all closed down, with losses in a range of 2-3 percent. Smaller economies like the Philippines and Malaysia closed down nearly 8 percent and 7 percent, respectively. India, an important emerging economy that's helped drive global growth, saw its exchange close down 4 percent.

"We've seen the increasing rates of default, we've seen the financial distress on the part of lenders and this is a concern," he said. "Our assessment though … is that there is not much indication at this point that the sub-prime mortgage issues have spread into the broader mortgage market, which still seems to be healthy and the lending side still seems to be healthy. It's a concern, but at this point we don't see it as a broad financial concern."

The Commerce Department on Wednesday revised economic growth numbers for the fourth quarter of 2006, showing the economy grew by 2.2 percent in that three-month period instead of 3.5 percent, as first reported. Because the revised figure came in around the consensus expectation, it served to calm markets. Bernanke called the revised growth numbers "more consistent of our overall view of the economy than were the original numbers."

The Fed for months has held off on raising interest rates, despite the nagging presence of higher-than-desired inflation, because it believes the economy is slowing enough to eventually bring inflation down without further rate hikes that could further slow the economy. The new GDP number confirmed that trend and eased market concerns that the Fed might hike rates again soon, helping to steady investor nerves. The higher growth numbers first reported for the last quarter of 2006, taken at face value, would have argued for further rate hikes, since strong growth eventually fuels inflation.

Bernanke Not Worried About Market Drop (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27 — Ben S. Bernanke, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, said on Wednesday that he saw little cause for alarm in either the previous day's stock market plunge or new evidence of slowing economic growth.

Mr. Bernanke's soothing comments helped lift share prices and recapture some of the ground they lost on Tuesday. His remarks contrasted with the more pessimistic tone of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, who cautioned on Monday that a recession was a possibility.

"We are looking for moderate growth in the U.S. economy going forward," Mr. Bernanke told a Congressional hearing, adding that "there's a reasonable possibility that we'll see some strengthening of the economy" toward the middle of the year.

Though Mr. Greenspan did not go so far as to predict a recession, the mere fact that he mentioned the word was enough to aggravate a global market downswing that began in Shanghai.

Mr. Bernanke expressed little alarm about the plunge, telling lawmakers that "there didn't seem to be any single trigger" for Tuesday's market rout and that markets "seem to be working well, normally."

Nor did Mr. Bernanke betray any worry about a new report by the Commerce Department, which sharply lowered its estimate of growth during the final quarter of 2006 to 2.2 percent from its earlier estimate of 3.5 percent.

The downward revision, which stemmed in part from new changes in estimates of inventory-building activities by businesses, were roughly in line with predictions by Wall Street analysts.

But Mr. Bernanke went further, saying the downward revision had actually bolstered the Federal Reserve's view that the economy was poised for mildly slower growth as well as a slight decline in inflationary pressures.

"My view is that — taking all the new data into account — that there is really no material change in our expectations about the U.S. economy," he said. "I would add parenthetically that the downward revision of the fourth-quarter G.D.P. numbers we got this morning is actually more consistent with our overall view of the economy than were the original numbers."

The Federal Reserve's forecast calls for the economy to expand by 2.5 to 3 percent in 2007, down from about 3 percent last year, and for the unemployment rate to remain below 5 percent — a level that many economists say is roughly equal to full employment.

Fed officials are hoping to achieve a soft landing for the economy, with the underlying pace of inflation slowing to about 2 percent over the next year from about 2.6 percent over the last 12 months.

Mr. Bernanke's sanguine comments on Wednesday seemed at odds with those of Mr. Greenspan, who spoke by satellite on Monday to a conference in Hong Kong. Though he stepped down as Fed chairman more than a year ago, Mr. Greenspan's remarks can still move markets.

"When you get this far away from a recession, invariably forces build up for the next recession, and indeed we are beginning to see that sign," he said, according to The Associated Press.

But Mr. Greenspan stopped short of predicting a recession, saying that he could not rule out the possibility even though forecasters were not predicting one. His point seemed to be to caution investors against being too complacent, a theme he stressed in the months before he stepped down last year.

Timothy Geithner, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, echoed Mr. Bernanke's calm about the economy. "The U.S. economy has demonstrated and continues to demonstrate remarkable resilience," Mr. Geithner said in a speech at a conference on risk management.

Many economists agree with Mr. Bernanke that the economy is likely to keep expanding, though probably at a pace of less than 3 percent for at least the first half of this year.

In general, the government's sharp downward revision of growth in the final months of last year came as little surprise. Almost half of the revision reflected data showing that companies increased their inventories less than had been assumed. But that can actually spur growth in subsequent quarters, as manufacturers increase production to restock.

More disturbing was a bigger-than-expected drop in spending on capital goods, which declined 3.2 percent rather than the 1.8 percent originally estimated. Lower capital spending could be an indicator of a slowdown in business investment, at a time when Fed officials are counting on business investment to offset the sharp drop in home building.

In a separate report, the Commerce Department reported that sales of new homes fell 16.6 percent in January — the biggest drop since 1994.

Fed officials have expressed cautious optimism that the housing market is beginning to stabilize after a big decline. But the central bank is steering through a delicate transition, with inventories of unsold houses at high levels and rising anxiety about the volume of subprime mortgages granted to people with comparatively low incomes and weak credit ratings.

Mr. Bernanke acknowledged concern about the subprime market, where several lenders have closed and others have been forced to increase reserves for bad loans.

But the Fed chairman said he saw no sign yet that problems with subprime mortgages were leading to problems in the broader economy.

Nariman Behravesh, chief economist for Global Insight in Lexington, Mass., said that Mr. Bernanke appeared to have had a calming effect on investors.

"The measure of Bernanke's effect was that on a day when the economic news was not particularly good, the market was up," Mr. Behravesh said. "His message was that we seem to be on track, don't overreact and don't panic."

Markets 'Working Well,' Says Fed Chief (WP)

By Nell Henderson And David Cho

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke told Congress yesterday that the markets were "working well" and the outlook for the U.S. economy was upbeat a day after Wall Street suffered its steepest decline in nearly four years.

Bernanke said his view of the economy was unchanged. "We are looking for moderate growth in the economy going forward," he said at a previously scheduled hearing on the budget. His comments helped the Dow Jones industrial average recover 52 of the 416 points it lost on Tuesday.

Two days earlier, Alan Greenspan, the man Bernanke replaced a year ago, had expressed a strikingly different view about the economy. The former Fed chairman said signs were emerging that a recession was possible later this year.

The dueling viewpoints of both men, perhaps the two most influential voices on the markets, reflected the broader uncertainty over where the U.S. economy is heading and left some investors debating which oracle of Wall Street has the greater insight.

Greenspan's remarks were not welcomed by some inside the Fed who viewed them as possibly contributing to the market turmoil.

"It's not right to expect the former Fed chairman to take an oath of silence after he leaves office, but I bet his successors wish he'd stick to writing his memoirs," said Thomas Schlesinger, executive director of the nonprofit Financial Markets Center, which monitors the Fed.

The U.S. economy expanded at a sluggish annual rate of 2.2 percent in the last three months of 2006, the Commerce Department said, far below its original estimate of 3.5 percent.

The department also said new-home sales fell by 16.6 percent in January from the previous month, the steepest drop in 13 years.

A regional economic report showed a weaker-than-expected reading on business purchases in the Midwest. The data are viewed as a bellwether of manufacturing activity nationwide.

Bernanke, who spent his career in academia before joining the government, has attributed the slowdown primarily to the housing slump and welcomed slower growth as a way to dampen price pressures. The Fed believes inflation is too high and worries it may quicken if the economy grows faster.

Greenspan's perspective draws on his years as a business consultant before joining the Fed in 1987. At a business conference in Hong Kong on Monday, he said he saw signs that the current expansion, which began in 2001, was aging.

"When you get this far away from a recession, invariably forces build up for the next recession, and indeed we are beginning to see that sign," Greenspan said. "For example, in the U.S., profit margins . . . have begun to stabilize, which is an early sign we are in the later stages of a cycle.

"Yes, it is possible we can get a recession in the latter months of 2007," Greenspan said. He added, however, that most analysts were not forecasting a recession.

Greenspan's comments elicited no significant reaction in financial markets when they were reported Monday morning. But his words loomed larger in many traders' minds during Tuesday's stock sell-off and after the latest weak economic data was released yesterday.

Robert Barbera, chief economist of ITG, a financial advisory firm, said it is hard to ignore what Greenspan says.

"Bernanke speaks as a top-elite economist," he said. "But . . . Greenspan is a creature of the markets, and as a fellow creature of the markets, I tend to agree with him."

Alfred E. Goldman, a senior market strategist for A.G. Edwards, said he's learned to trust Bernanke.

"Who is the better forecaster? If you held a vote people would say Greenspan because he was an icon for so long," he said. "But remember he doesn't have access to as much information as Bernanke has now."

Some observers questioned Greenspan's judgment in commenting on a possible recession, knowing well that his views are still closely followed.

"I do think it was somewhat inappropriate," said Kenneth H. Thomas, a finance professor at the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania, who has written extensively on the Fed and Greenspan. "Bernanke is still relatively new. Greenspan had 18 years as Fed chairman and is an icon of sort. . . . He still has a tremendous impact on the markets. It makes life harder for Bernanke."

Beyond concerns about a possible recession in the United States, analysts saw other troubling signs in Tuesday's frenzied sell-off. They said they were less worried about stock prices, which seemed ripe for a correction after a breathless run-up, than that the global economy showed signs of vulnerability.

Tuesday's stock-market fall was triggered by a 9 percent sell-off in China. Some economists were alarmed that China's markets, which are prone to rampant speculation and wild swings, could have such an impact on the world stage.

"It is interesting to note that all of this started in China," said Charles M. Jones, a finance professor at Columbia Business School. "If you went back 10 years . . . China was just not on the global economic map. This time when China sneezed, everybody else took notice."

A slowdown in the West could have a severe impact on China's economy since it relies heavily on exports to the United States, other economists said.

"Over the longer term there is a question of how long the United States can run massive foreign-account deficits that are funded by the willingness of the Chinese to produce a lot and not consume as much as they produce," said Richard F. Syron, chairman and chief executive of Freddie Mac.

Others said they are monitoring whether the U.S. housing slump cools consumer spending. Of particular concern is whether the easy availability of "cheap debt," which has fueled record-topping leveraged buyouts on Wall Street and riskier mortgage lending, is coming to an end.

The new-home sales report also fed fears of more market turbulence. Investors have grown jittery in recent weeks as the rate of delinquencies and defaults on high-risk mortgage loans have climbed, raising the prospect that lenders will tighten credit.

But Bernanke said that the central bank sees "no indication" that the turmoil in the market for riskier loans to home buyers with poor credit histories is spreading into other financial markets or affecting the housing market yet.

He said the Fed is "monitoring that situation closely," and added, "I don't see it as a broad financial concern."

To some analysts, the home-sales report boosted the odds that the housing downturn would be a bigger drag on the economy this year than the Fed expects, possibly raising unemployment and rippling through other industries.

More optimistic analysts noted that the report followed one on Tuesday that showed sales of previously owned homes, which account for 85 percent of the market, rose 3 percent in January, possibly signaling a stabilizing of the housing market.

Bernanke said that if housing does stabilize and manufacturers such as automakers work off their excess inventories, "there's a reasonable possibility that we'll see some strengthening of the economy sometime during the middle of the year."

Bernanke Coaxes Market Rebound (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

Stocks rallied moderately yesterday, helped by assurances from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke that the economy remains solid and could strengthen later this year despite a warning from his predecessor about the possibility of recession.

Mr. Bernanke, calmly and deliberately confronting his first major market test since taking office a year ago, appeared to pass as Wall Street regained composure from the drubbing Tuesday that sent the Dow Jones Industrial Average plummeting 416 points.

The Dow, in posting a 52-point gain yesterday, also shrugged off fresh evidence of weak economic growth and the biggest plunge in new-home sales in 13 years. Major markets in Europe and Asia did not fare as well and posted further losses yesterday.

"We are looking for moderate growth in the U.S. economy going forward," Mr. Bernanke told the House Budget Committee. "There has been no material change in our expectations for the U.S. economy since I last reported to Congress" in an optimistic assessment two weeks ago.

Mr. Bernanke added that the markets continue to function well. While he is "concerned" about a meltdown in the subprime mortgage market, and the Fed is monitoring the situation "very carefully," he said he doesn't see any impact yet on the broader credit markets or the economy. He said he thinks interest rates overall remain low and credit conditions remain liquid for both consumers and investors.

"It's a concern, but at this point we don't see it as being a broad financial concern or a major factor in assessing the course of the economy."

Assuming the subprime credit crunch stays contained and the housing market stabilizes, Mr. Bernanke said he expects growth to rebound from subpar levels by the end of the year. The Commerce Department reported yesterday that growth clocked in at a subdued 2.2 percent pace in the final quarter of 2006 -- far below the 3.5 percent originally estimated -- and most economists expect it to stay that low or fall further in the first half of this year.

Mr. Bernanke said the report of sluggish growth is "consistent with our overall view of the economy," but "there's a reasonable possibility that we'll see some strengthening of the economy sometime during the middle of the year."

By contrast, former Fed chairman Alan Greenspan had contributed to the sell-off in the markets on Tuesday by telling Hong Kong investors that U.S. profits have peaked in a sign that the business cycle is winding down and could end in recession by year-end.

"When you get this far away from a recession, invariably forces build up for the next recession, and indeed we are beginning to see that sign," Mr. Greenspan said in response to a question. "While, yes, it is possible we can get a recession in the latter months of 2007, most forecasters are not making that judgment."

Mr. Bernanke appeared to exonerate Mr. Greenspan by noting "there didn't seem to be any single trigger" of the market rout, which reverberated worldwide after starting in China on Tuesday.

New York Fed President Timothy Geithner also sought to soothe the markets yesterday, noting the "remarkable resilience" of the U.S. economy and the "exceptional liquidity" that continues to fuel growth.

A second Commerce Department report yesterday that new-home sales plunged by 16.6 percent to a 937,000 annual rate -- the lowest in four years -- did not shake the Fed's official posture of confidence that the economy will skirt recession despite a marked slowdown in growth since the summer.

Some economists are not as optimistic and predict that further evidence of a deep downturn in housing and anemic growth in other sectors such as capital spending will force the Fed to reconsider and cut rates later this year.

Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group, an economic advisory firm in Princeton Junction, N.J., agreed with Mr. Bernanke that the economy is fundamentally sound and worries about recession are overblown.

"The chance of a recession this year is no higher than 20 percent," he said. "What triggered the drop in equity prices had little to do with economic fundamentals and more to do with what happens when investors get complacent about financial risk."

The loose lending practices that led to record defaults on subprime mortgages and the crunch in that market are an example of the misjudgment of risks by investors who provided funding for such loans, he said. Other investors are taking risks by borrowing heavily to invest in stocks -- driving margin debt levels to $285.6 billion in January -- the highest level since the dot-com boom in March 2000.

"It was the classic 'don't worry, be happy' market environment," Mr. Baumohl said. "Clearly, the market was ripe for a correction."

Bernanke Says Markets Working Well, Reiterates Growth Forecasts For Year (WSJ)

By Brian Blackstone And Benton Ives-halperin

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- U.S. Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Wednesday his outlook for "moderate growth" in the U.S. hasn't changed despite Tuesday's steep decline in global stock markets, calming fears about the sustainability of the U.S. expansion.

"There didn't seem to be any single trigger" for the sharp drop in equity prices Tuesday, Mr. Bernanke said in response to questions from the House Budget Committee, where he testified about the long-term budget outlook. He added that the Fed is closely monitoring U.S. financial markets, and they seem to be "working well."

"My view is that ... there is really no material change in our expectations for the economy" since he last testified before Congress in mid-February, Mr. Bernanke added.

"We are looking for moderate growth in the economy going forward," he said, repeating the Fed's assessment in its semiannual monetary report to Congress released earlier this month. Equity markets climbed following Mr. Bernanke's remarks, recouping some of Tuesday's 416-point drop in the Dow Jones Industrial average.

Earlier Wednesday, the government revised down its estimate of fourth quarter gross domestic product growth to 2.2% from 3.5%. Mr. Bernanke said that downward revision "is more consistent with our view of the economy than the original numbers."

Earlier this week, Mr. Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, caused a stir when he told a conference in Hong Kong, "Yes, it is possible we can get a recession in the latter months of 2007." He added, though, that "most forecasters are not making that judgment and indeed are projecting forward into 2008 ... with some slowdown."

Mr. Greenspan's remarks, coupled with a 7.8% slump in durable goods orders and the steep global equity sell-off Tuesday reignited concerns over the U.S. economy and boosted investor odds that Mr. Bernanke and the Fed will cut rates by midyear.

Yet in contrast to Mr. Greenspan's remarks about the possibility of recession or slowdown in the latter months of the year, Mr. Bernanke said "there is a reasonable chance we will see some strengthening in the economy by the middle of the year," especially if housing and inventories stabilize.

The Fed has kept the federal funds rate unchanged at 5.25% since last summer, a stretch covering five Federal Open Market Committee meetings. Mr. Bernanke said Wednesday that there don't appear to be any liquidity problems in financial markets and real interest rates remain fairly low globally.

Mr. Bernanke also said the Fed is closely monitoring the subprime mortgage market, where delinquencies have risen, and while trends in that sector are a concern, there doesn't appear to be any spillover to broader financial markets.

"We are concerned about the subprime mortgage sector, there has been some bad underwriting. We have attempted to provide some guidance to lenders about proper procedures for underwriting," he said.

However, "our assessment is that there's not much indication that subprime issues have spread into the broader mortgage market," and there's little evidence that overall housing demand has been affected, Mr. Bernanke added.

Asked whether traditional economic gauges like the Phillips Curve and noninflationary rate of unemployment, or NAIRU -- which suggest a tradeoff between economic growth, joblessness and inflation -- still apply, Mr. Bernanke said "it is true that the critical evidence suggests the link is looser" between unemployment and inflation than in past decades. (See related article5.)

He also said it is difficult to pinpoint what the NAIRU rate is at any given time. The U.S. jobless rate currently sits at 4.6%, which is quite low by historical standards and below many economists' NAIRU estimates. "My own view is that we should take a very eclectic approach" in assessing the economy, Mr. Bernanke said, including whether overall demand appears to be exceeding supply.

In his prepared remarks, Mr. Bernanke said that while the U.S. budget deficit may "stabilize or moderate further" in the next few years, the long-term picture is worrisome due to steeply climbing entitlement obligations. "Unfortunately, we are experiencing what seems likely to be the calm before the storm," Mr. Bernanke said. "In particular, spending on entitlement programs will begin to climb quickly during the next decade." (Read the prepared testimony6)

Mr. Bernanke's comments mirrored those he made last month to the Senate Budget Committee, when he said that unless "early and meaningful" action is taken on entitlement programs like Social Security and Medicare, "the U.S. economy could be seriously weakened, with future generations bearing much of the cost."

From The Fed Chairman, Red Flags And Brown Socks (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke could not have sounded the alarm any clearer if he had carried a bullhorn and a gong. "This expansion of debt would spark a fiscal crisis. . . . The U.S. economy could be seriously weakened. . . . This is sort of like a snowball rolling down the hill. . . . This can really get out of control."

Before Bernanke began his testimony to the House Budget Committee yesterday, the Dow Jones Industrials stood at 12,200. In the half-hour it took him to issue those dire warnings, the index climbed 150 points.

Investors, of course, weren't reacting to Bernanke's wailing and gnashing of teeth about a looming fiscal crisis; the projected collapse of Medicare and Social Security is still a few years away. After Tuesday's worldwide stock sell-off, the markets -- and the lawmakers -- wanted Bernanke's short-term forecasts for the economy, which were mostly sunny.

Chairman John Spratt (D-S.C.) fretted about the "severe disruption in the stock markets." The ranking Republican, Paul Ryan (Wis.), also wanted to hear about the "precipitous drop."

Bernanke, who said nothing about the stock market in his opening testimony, obliged. "There is really no material change in our expectations for the U.S. economy," he assured the lawmakers. "We are looking for moderate growth in the U.S. economy going forward."

The hearing had been billed as a discussion about "Fiscal Challenges and the Economy in the Long Term." But then came Tuesday's stock swoon -- caused in part by Bernanke's famous predecessor at the Fed, Alan Greenspan, who said on Monday that he saw signs of recession coming late this year. That forced Bernanke into the role of market soother.

"Do you believe or agree that there is a liquidity problem in the world today?" Ryan asked him.

"No, I don't think so," Bernanke answered.

"We don't see it as being a broad financial concern."

The wires rushed out bulletins:

DOJ_NMG_0138402

"Fed Economic View Unfazed by Stocks Drop"

"Wall St Rebounds as Bernanke Calms Nerves"

The requisite calming accomplished, Bernanke relaxed, stretching out his legs under the witness table.

Showmanship is not something that comes naturally to the white-bearded academic. He testified yesterday with a large band-aid on the tip of his index finger, and his suit jacket was bunched up around his neck like a life vest, causing one sleeve to hike up on his forearm. Though his suit was gray and his shoes were black, his socks were brown (President Bush once ridiculed him for wearing tan hosiery).

Bernanke had come not to prop up markets but to scold lawmakers about the need to do head off the coming fiscal crisis. Lawmakers, however, reacted like addicts, either denying their problem or promising to give up the spending habit another day.

"I beg to disagree," said Rep. Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio). While Bernanke may believe "we've got too many people getting older," Kaptur informed him that "what's happening is that capital investors have figured out how to make egregious profit by outsourcing."

Rep. Lloyd Doggett (D-Tex.), likewise, quarreled with the view that "all we need to be concerned about is that Grandma's Social Security check is too big."

Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) identified the problem: Medicare's electric wheelchairs. "Going back a long way, I think 1965," he said, "I could have bought absolutely the best car on the lot for $4,000. And today we have a system that's spending that much or more for medical devices, motorized wheelchairs or whatever."

Other lawmakers struggled to wrap their arms around the crisis Bernanke was describing. "We're just, kind of, whistling past the graveyard?" asked Rep. Marion Berry (D-Ark).

"Yes, sir," said the chairman.

"And hoping that the tooth fairy comes and bails us out of this deal?"

"I don't know about the metaphors there, Mr. Congressman," Bernanke replied.

Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Tex.) had a different metaphor to run by the chairman. He asked if "we are debating how to mop up six inches of water in the stateroom of the captain of the Titanic when we should be focused upon the gaping hole in the hull of the ship."

"The heart of the problem are the entitlement programs," Bernanke affirmed.

Rep. Darlene Hooley (D-Ore.) had an idea. "If you were in a class of fifthgraders, how would you explain to them the consequences of our national debt and deficit?" she asked.

"I would say that our economy needs machines and new factories and new buildings and so on in order for us to have a strong and growing economy," he answered patiently. "If the government doesn't cover all its expenses, it has to take out the money that would otherwise be used to build those."

Bernanke reflected. "That probably wouldn't work for a fifth-grader," he said. Nor, apparently, for members of Congress.

Calm Returns To Market, But Worries Persist Over Subprime Loans (NYT)

By Jenny Anderson And Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

Calm returned to Wall Street yesterday.

Encouraged by comments from Ben S. Bernanke, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, and a bounce-back in the Chinese markets where Tuesday's global sell-off began, stocks rose modestly in the United States.

The Dow Jones industrial average, which tumbled as much 545 points on Tuesday, closed yesterday up 52.39 points, or 0.4 percent. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index closed up 0.56 percent, and the Nasdaq, 0.34 percent. Asian and European markets ended the day lower, but the Shanghai market climbed 3.9 percent. Shanghai opened slightly lower today. [C4]

Yet one important concern — that Wall Street's bet on home loans to people with weak, or subprime, credit is souring quickly as defaults rise and home prices weaken — has not gone away.

Wall Street executives and analysts acknowledged that the subprime segment of the mortgage business has faltered because of the performance of loans issued in 2006, but many contend that the problems are well contained and do not yet pose a significant threat to investment banks or the broader global financial system.

Cracks have become more visible lately, however. Insurance premiums on the potential default of Wall Street bonds have risen sharply, indicating possible concern among bond traders about potential exposure.

"It is impossible to get a number" on big investment bank's exposure to subprime loans, said Richard X. Bove, an analyst with Punk Ziegel & Company. "And I don't think they even know."

The cost of insurance against potential bond default on Bear Stearns's debt, for example, increased 40 percent recently, from about 22 basis points in mid-January to more than 31 on Tuesday, according to Lehman Brothers data.

Insurance costs for major firms with exposure to the subprime market, like Lehman Brothers, Morgan Stanley, Goldman Sachs and Merrill Lynch increased similarly. Brad Hintz, an analyst with Sanford Bernstein, said investors are increasingly concerned about Wall Street's exposure to that market.

Investors, while heartened yesterday by Mr. Bernanke's prediction of moderate economic growth, have had a revolving list of concerns: a slowing economy, oil prices and accelerating inflation. But now a major concern is whether the problems of subprime lending will spill over into the broader mortgage market, which at $6.5 trillion at the end of 2006 is the biggest bond market.

During the housing boom, Wall Street developed a series of profitable connections to the subprime market that included providing financing to companies that made loans to homeowners, buying finished mortgages, packaging them into bonds and then trading them. Last year, the subprime business generated $600 billion in loans, about 20 percent of all mortgages written, according to Inside Mortgage Finance. While down slightly from 2005, that is up from $120 billion in 2001.

Wall Street now faces risks on two fronts. First, it stands to earn less from originating, packaging and trading mortgage-backed securities. Second, it will have to absorb more of the losses from loans when borrowers are no longer making payments.

In the past, it could demand that mortgage companies buy back defaulted loans, but such large "put back" requests have driven many lenders out of business, and big investment banks are making many more loans through subsidiaries they own. As a result, the banks retain more of the risk in the form of "residual" interest in the loans they bundle into negotiable securities, a process known as securitization.

"The brokerage firms have done something curious: they are not abandoning subprime mortgage origination; they are taking positions," Mr. Hintz said.

In December, Merrill Lynch completed a $1.3 billion acquisition of First Franklin, which was among the 10 biggest subprime lenders last year, and Morgan Stanley bought Saxon Capital for $706 million.

Bank executives say they anticipated the problems in subprime and they have been buying lenders because they want to better control lending standards in the industry.

"Saxon was a long-term strategic decision," said Anthony Tufariello, who heads the securitized product group at Morgan Stanley. "And we are happy we made that decision because we bought it as a servicing platform with the expectation that the market would undergo dislocation."

And the deal-making continues. Citigroup said that it would provide working capital and a credit line to ACC Capital Holdings, which owns Ameriquest and Argent Mortgage. Although the terms were not disclosed, it includes an option for Citigroup to acquire Argent, which lends through mortgage brokers.

By some estimates, the potential risks to the big banks are relatively modest. Mr. Hintz, of Sanford Bernstein, calculates that Lehman Brothers had $7.3 billion in residual risks at the end of 2006, $2 billion of it in noninvestment grade mortgages. If the noninvestment grade residuals decline by 20 percent, Lehman's earnings would decline 3.2 percent after taking into account compensation costs and taxes; Bear Stearns's income would fall about 4.1 percent.

Not all analysts are as sanguine.

Guy Moszkowski, an analyst with Merrill Lynch, downgraded Goldman Sachs, Bear Stearns and Lehman based on the erosion of risk appetite among its customers and because he believes the problems of subprime lending are spreading to "Alt-A" mortgages, which fall between subprime and prime and accounted for about 13 percent of loans written last year.

Investment banks entered the subprime market because the loans generated high yields, making them popular among pension funds, insurance companies, hedge funds and foreign investors. On the other side of the food chain, small mortgage companies and brokers stood ready to feed Wall Street with loans. The banks supplied the cash for the loans, and agreed to buy the loans from them.

The business generated multiple lines of income for Wall Street, including underwriting and trading. By 2005, the residential mortgage-backed securities market was generating 15 percent of fixed income revenues, and the subprime sector was bringing in 3 percent to 4 percent of fixed income revenues, Mr. Hintz said.

Lehman, RBS Greenwich Capital Markets, Morgan Stanley and Merrill Lynch were the biggest underwriters of mortgage-backed securities in 2006, with Lehman controlling 10.7 percent of the market and underwriting $51.8 billion worth of mortgage-backed securities, according to Inside Mortgage Finance.

For some analysts, the bigger risk to Wall Street is simply that the spigot has been turned off.

"Does the flow of mortgages to the securitization machine slow?" asked Jeffrey Harte, an analyst with Sandler O'Neill. "That's what I'm most worried about."

Volume is falling. Production of nonagency mortgage securities fell almost 50 percent between January and February, according to preliminary numbers compiled by Inside Mortgage Finance. The data indicate that new subprime and Alt-A loans fell significantly in February.

But Wall Street seems to believe it will come out on top, surviving where smaller players lacked the resources. "The economics of the business are moving in favor of well-capitalized entities who don't have to go outside" for other services, said Gyan Sinha, who heads asset-backed securities research at Bear Stearns.

One gauge of the subprime business is an index that tracks bonds backed by subprime loans, the ABX.HE. The index for loans issued in 2006 has fallen sharply in two months. Its price is used to calculate the cost of insuring the bonds from losses.

On Tuesday, the cost to insure a low-rated, "BBB-" portion of the bonds jumped to nearly $1,983 for $10,000 of bonds, from $1,641 on Monday and $410 at the end of December, according to the Markit and CDS IndexCo. The index, which was little changed yesterday, tracks the performance of 20 mortgage bonds, or pools, and provides a snapshot of complex market.

Each mortgage pool is broken into a number of tranches, which carry different risks and rewards for investors. Portions rated "AAA," for instance, carry the least risk and provide the smallest return; investors in these pools also get paid off first when borrowers repay their loans. The riskiest portions of the debt, or the residuals, are often held by the mortgage companies that issued the loans or the Wall Street firms that underwrote the bond.

The big banks' optimism is based in large part on the structure of these bonds. For one thing, most bonds collect more in interest payments than they are obligated to pay out. They also include a cash reserve, or residual, that can be dipped into if interest payments fall short because of defaulting borrowers.

"You can have a pretty long period of stress before you start to see actual write-downs," said Anthony V. Thompson, who heads research of asset-backed securities at Deutsche Bank Securities.

Much depends on the strength of these bonds' structure, which is determined largely by agencies like Moody's Investors Service, Standard & Poor's and Fitch Ratings.

Skeptics say that Wall Street's faith in complexity has proved wrong before, most recently in the meltdown of the manufactured housing, or trailer home, market. The business boomed in the early and mid-1990s before collapsing in the late '90s when many buyers of the homes defaulted.

"These credit corrections are not unexpected," Mr. Thomson said. "What's harder to predict is the precise moment when the market decides to reprice the risk."

USA Today, March 1, 2007

Stocks recovered a bit Wednesday from Tuesday's bloodbath, giving investors hope that the two-day selling panic that rattled global markets finally calmed by the time it reached U.S. shores.

After a tumultuous day complete with a 167-point swing, the Dow Jones industrial average closed 52 points higher, erasing an eighth of Tuesday's 416-point loss.

The Standard & Poor's 500 and Nasdaq composite indexes also bounced back slightly, posting 0.6% and 0.3% gains, respectively.

Giving investors' the biggest dose of relief was the fact that the Chinese stock market, which triggered the whole mess with its 9% plunge Tuesday, bounced back strongly with a 4% gain Wednesday.

Even so, investors now have a brutal reminder that corrections are severe and can come with little warning. Markets in Europe and Asia outside of China were still reeling from the selling, posting losses of 1% to 3%.

Domestic markets weren't unscathed. The S&P 500's 2.2% fall in February broke the market's streak of eight-straight months of gains.

Despite the recovery, the worst one-day point loss since Sept. 11 delivered several lasting lessons to investors, including:

•Chinese stocks don't predict economic activity. Investors look to U.S. stocks as a gauge of economic activity. But doing the same with Chinese stocks is almost laughable, says Donald Straszheim of Roth Capital Partners. Individuals who buy stocks practically for sport dominate the Chinese stock market.

Instead, investors should watch movements of commodity prices and money supply in China, says Edmund Harriss, portfolio manager at Guinness Atkinson. So far, none of those measures show the Chinese economy is slowing, he says.

•Emerging markets are risky. Investors had been piling into emerging markets for years, figuring they're the source of the best returns in a bull market, says Russ Koesterich of Barclays Global Investors.

But they forgot that emerging markets are very risky, says Joseph Quinlan of Bank of America. "That was a tip-off something was going to happen," he says.

•Big U.S. stocks have been ignored. It's time to pick up cheap shares of U.S. large-company stocks that international-crazy investors have ignored, says Robert Maltbie of Millennium Asset Management. Chinese stocks have price-earnings ratios of 18, making them expensive given their risk compared with leading U.S. companies with P-Es of 17 or less, Maltbie says. "If you're overallocated on emerging markets, take a little off the table."

Stocks Recover, But Experts Warn Of Volatility Ahead (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - The U.S. and Chinese stock exchanges returned to a semblance of normalcy Wednesday, but concerns about both economies linger following the worst global sell-off of stocks in more than five years.

Wall Street's rebound Wednesday was quickly dubbed the Bernanke Rally, after Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke. His relaxed, almost professorial, testimony before the House Budget Committee calmed jittery markets.

Bernanke told lawmakers that he expects a mid-year return to solid economic growth, despite new data showing that the U.S. economy has entered slow-growth mode. The Commerce Department on Wednesday revised economic growth for the fourth quarter of 2006 to a 2.2 percent annual rate, much slower than the 3.5 percent rate initially estimated last month.

"My view is, taking all the new data into account, there is really no material change in our expectations for the U.S. economy," Bernanke said. He painted a largely positive economic picture, including an expected rebound in housing.

That sparked a morning rally on Wall Street before investors backed off later Wednesday, as the Dow Jones industrial average closed up 52.07 points, or 0.43 percent. The tech-heavy Nasdaq and S&P 500 also finished the day up, but none gained significant ground after the markets' worst single day since trading after the 9/11 terrorist attacks resumed on Sept. 17, 2001.

U.S. investor sentiment was aided by a rebound in China's Shanghai Composite Index. On Wednesday it clawed back nearly half of its 8.8 percent drop of a day earlier.

However, one day doesn't a trend make on Wall Street

"Even when the earthquake is over, you see some aftershocks. So I think we can expect some volatility for a while now," said David A. Wyss, chief economist for the rating agency Standard & Poors. "We're coming off of a period of exceptionally low volatility, so you shouldn't be shocked. It had only one way to go."

Bernanke brought a temporary reprieve, telling lawmakers that financial markets "seem to be working well." He added that the fundamentals of the U.S. economy remain strong and that he expected a pickup in growth by midyear.

The Fed chairman acknowledged but didn't fret over a rise in defaults on risky sub-prime adjustable-rate mortgages and January's nearly 8 percent drop in the purchase of business equipment by major manufacturers and industries.

"We believe that if the housing sector begins to stabilize, and if some of the inventory corrections that are still going on in manufacturing begin to be completed, that there is a reasonable possibility that we'll see some strengthening in the economy sometime during the middle of the year," Bernanke said.

That positive view stood in sharp contrast to that of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, whose Monday comments that a recession could loom late this year or early next contributed to Tuesday's global stock-market slide.

Adding to the uncertainty, the Commerce Department reported Wednesday a 16.6 percent drop in new-home sales for January, compared with December. That was the worst single-month showing in about 13 years. But that sour news was partially offset by a National Association of Realtors report Tuesday showing an unexpectedly strong 3 percent jump in existing home sales for the same month.

"What triggered the drop in equity prices had little to do with economic fundamentals and more to do with what happens when investors get complacent about financial risk," independent analyst Bernard Baumohl wrote in a note to investors.

By early February, he said, analysts had begun noting that the Dow hadn't seen a correction of 2 percent or greater since May 2003, the longest such streak in half a century. That made investors nervous. Many were on hair-trigger alerts to pull money out of stocks at the first sign of bad news in order to take profits.

"We'd been expecting a correction in the market. But when it happens it's obviously a surprise," added Wyss of Standard & Poors.

So what did the stock slide signal about the U.S. economy?

"Frankly, not much," insisted Baumohl. "The economy itself is sound and growing, and we still believe the chance of a recession this year is no higher than 20 percent."

But the economy clearly isn't growing as fast as first thought, and that ushers in market volatility.

Financial markets welcomed the fourth-quarter GDP revision as evidence that the slowing economy would likely reduce inflation so the Fed won't have to raise interest rates again to do so.

Bernanke also sought to ease fears of rising foreclosures on homes sold to riskier borrowers.

"We've seen the increasing rates of default, we've seen the financial distress on the part of lenders and this is a concern," he said. "Our assessment though ... is that there is not much indication at this point that the sub-prime mortgage issues have spread into the broader mortgage market, which still seems to be healthy, and the lending side still seems to be healthy. It's a concern, but at this point we don't see it as a broad financial concern."

While U.S. and Chinese exchanges rebounded Wednesday, emerging markets didn't, particularly in Asia. Exchanges in Australia, Japan, Hong Kong and South Korea all closed down Wednesday in a range of 2 percent to 3 percent. Smaller economies such as the Philippines and Malaysia closed down nearly 8 percent and 7 percent, respectively. And India, an important emerging economy that's helped drive global growth, saw its exchange close down 4 percent.

Investors Tiptoe Back To Markets (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

Investors crept cautiously back into the stock market, but the mild recovery didn't calm the market's jitters or come close to recovering Tuesday's 416-point plunge in the Dow Jones Industrial Average.

Following reassuring remarks by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke in testimony to Congress, investors nibbled cautiously. They sought out larger, safer-seeming stocks such as those that populate the 30-stock Dow industrials.

The Dow finished the day ahead 52.39 points, or 0.43%, at 12268.63, still more than 500 points down from the record 12786.64 hit last week.

Procter & Gamble and Walt Disney both gained more than 3%, and American Express, Merck and Verizon rose more than 2%.

The industrials are down 1.6% since the year began. They fell 2.8% in February -- the first monthly decline in eight months and the Dow's biggest monthly decline in almost two years.

In Asia, where this week's market rout began with a tumble in Shanghai, Japan's Nikkei Stock Average fell nearly 3% yesterday, and in Hong Kong, the Hang Seng slid 2.5%. The Shanghai Composite Index rebounded 3.9%. In Europe, London's FTSE 100 slipped 1.8%, the Frankfurt Xetra DAX fell 1.5% and the CAC-40 in Paris was down 1.3%.

Analysts and traders in the U.S. spent the day debating whether the modest recovery was the first, cautious step in a rebuilding process, or a temporary, technical recovery that presages more declines.

"We expected a little bit of a recovery. The bulls would have liked to see a little bit more," said stock trader Larry Peruzzi at Boston CompanyAsset Management.

It is a truism on Wall Street that stocks never go straight up or straight down. Regardless of whether the market is headed for another record or for more pain, the short-term outlook is likely to feature more up-and-down swings as traders "test" the market's limits.

Some nervous investors are booking profits by selling winners that they think could suffer in the coming weeks. Others, with more confidence, are buying some of those same stocks on the grounds that the economy, corporate profits and interest rates all are just fine, believing that Tuesday's decline was overdone.

Until it becomes clearer which side is in the driver's seat, the swings could be sharp.

Typically, a bull market doesn't end quite as abruptly as this, said Phil Roth, chief technical market analyst at New York brokerage firm Miller Tabak. Mr. Roth himself is in the bearish camp, viewing recent market moves as a "topping" process that will lead to a longer-running decline. But he doesn't see the decline happening just yet.

Before Tuesday's collapse, he notes, just about every major index had been at or near a long-term high. The Dow industrials, transports and utilities all had recently hit records, as had indexes of small stocks and middle-sized stocks. Stocks don't typically just collapse after showing that kind of broad strength. Instead, they bounce up and down. He expects to see them bounce back up before the bull market ends.

"We may not have seen the final high for some of the averages," Mr. Roth said, although "we may have seen the final high for lots of individual stocks."

Several analysts including Mr. Roth pointed out that a 3.3% decline, such as the Dow industrials recorded Tuesday, isn't as rare an event as it might seem. It hadn't happened to the Dow in nearly four years, but since 1926 it has happened 131 times -- an average of more than once a year, according to research by quantitative analyst Marc Reinganum of OppenheimerFunds.

It is perfectly normal for an index like the Dow occasionally to fall 4% over a five-day period, even during a bull market, as it has just done, added Tim Hayes, chief investment strategist at Ned Davis Research, in a report to clients.

"The bottom line is that it would be premature to conclude that a bear market has started," Mr. Hayes wrote.

Mr. Bernanke's comments to Congress yesterday helped soothe investors' jitters. In previously scheduled testimony to the House Budget Committee, the Fed chief said financial markets "seem to be working well." He reiterated his view that the economy could pick up steam later this year, and said he saw no reason for China or Japan to "dump" U.S. Treasury bonds. Stocks, which had been down before he began speaking, rose as he delivered his testimony.

Given that Mr. Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, had helped roil markets with a remark early this week about the possibility of a recession, Mr. Bernanke's remarks were seen as reassuring.

At the same time, there were clear signs that the economy is weaker than it appeared just two weeks ago. Government economists revised sharply down their estimate of fourth-quarter economic growth, to 2.2% from 3.5%. A report on manufacturing activity in the Chicago region came in weak, as did the latest home-sales figures. None of that was reassuring.

In addition, oil futures kept climbing, up 33 cents to $61.79 a barrel on the day, and up 6.3% for February.

The prices of Treasury bonds and of gold, both of which had risen sharply on Tuesday as investors fled to their relative safety, pulled back as markets calmed.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.56%, or 7.78 points, to 1406.82. It was down 2.2% for February, and is off almost 1% for 2007.

Outside the U.S., stocks declined in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, fell 2.01%, or 5.04 points, to 246.30.

Stocks advanced1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 3.80 billion shares, as 2,099 stocks rose and 1,245 fell.

Bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 10/32, or $3.13 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.552%. The 30-year bond was down 20/32 to yield 4.669%.

The dollar strengthened3. Late in New York, it traded at 118.41 yen, up from 117.98, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.3234 from $1.3236.

Market's Fall May Augur A Waning Appetite For Risk (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

This week's plunge in stocks and the prices of risky debt raises the possibility that investors, who had been displaying an unusual appetite for risk, are becoming risk-averse. Such a development could have big consequences for the U.S. and world economies.

In recent years, investors have poured money into risky investments from subprime mortgages and emerging-market debt to Chinese stocks. In the process, they have accepted ever-narrower returns, or "risk premiums." That has helped distressed companies avoid bankruptcy, financed a record leveraged-buyout spree, fueled surging profits on Wall Street, enabled poor countries to finance domestic spending and even made insurance easier for consumers to obtain.

INVESTOR SHIFT?

• The Issue: This week's gyrations in financial markets suggest that investors might be losing their appetite for risk.

• What's at Stake: In recent years, investors' willingness to buy risky stocks, bonds and derivatives has made it easy and cheap for people and companies to borrow money, fueling economic growth.

• The Bottom Line: A sharp pullback from risky investments could have significant knock-on effects for the broader economy.

Recent events, primarily Tuesday's plunge in Chinese stocks and a continuing collapse in the demand for subprime mortgages in the U.S., suggest that could be changing. "If you see a widespread change in investor risk appetites, it does make a big difference for the economy," said Stephen Stanley, chief economist for RBS Greenwich Capital. "It becomes more expensive for businesses and households to get money."

So far, the reversal has been tiny and may prove to be a hiccup. Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke told Congress yesterday: "There is really no material change in our expectations for the U.S. economy." The Dow finished the day ahead 52.39 points. (See related article on page C1.)

Yet some economists see a turning point. "This is a wake-up call," said John Lonski, chief economist at Moody's Investors Service. "Unfortunately, if there is an increase in risk aversion, it's taking place exactly when business-investment spending has been much lower than anticipated."

One of the first places this is showing up is in the market for subprime mortgage loans, those made to less-creditworthy borrowers. As defaults on such loans have risen sharply, investment banks and other financial firms have sharply reduced the creation of new collateralized debt obligations backed by subprime loans. Such CDOs have become a popular way to pool baskets of loans, then redistribute slices with varying degrees of risk and return to a spectrum of investors.

"It affects everyone up the chain," said Greg Miller, a portfolio manager at hedge fund Saye Capital, which is active in the subprime market. "It's certainly harder to get a loan today than it was a month or two months ago for certain borrowers." Still, he said the lenders' pullback is likely to affect only a small slice of homeowners.

Corporate debt may feel the pain, too. As the gap between corporate bonds, including those with junk-rated status, and those of safe Treasury bills has fallen to near-record lows, global issuance of junk-rated bonds rose to $354 billion last year from $145 billion in 2002, according to Dealogic.

Money also has poured into exotic forms of corporate debt such as credit default swaps and collateralized debt obligations. Among other things, that money helped fuel a surge in U.S. leveraged-buyout deals to $418 billion in 2006, more than triple the level of 2005. The total this year is $84 billion, according to data provider Thomson Financial.

Louise Purtle, a strategist at research firm CreditSights, said waning investor risk appetites will make it more difficult for buyout firms and companies of all kinds to borrow money.

"All of the LBO deals, particularly the big deals, have been highly dependent on the excessive level of risk appetite," she said, in particular this week's proposed private-equity takeover of Texas utility TXU Corp. Less appetite for risk could mean constraints in how much new equipment such companies can buy and how many new employees they can hire.

Another ripple could be felt on companies carrying large debt loads or in distress. Such companies have found it easier to obtain new financing in recent years. More recently, the percentage of companies that renege on their debts has held at extremely low levels, despite predictions that it will rise eventually. According to Standard & Poor's, the corporate-default rate stood at only 1.4% at the end of January, below the 25-year average of 4.5%. 1

Many companies, though, have managed to avoid trouble largely because investors have been so willing to make fresh loans. "Investors' willingness to take on risk has allowed a lot of companies to stay afloat that would otherwise not have stayed afloat," said RayKennedy, a high-yield-portfolio manager at Pacific Investment Management Co. in Newport Beach, Calif.

Charter Communications Inc., one of the nation's largest cable companies, managed to get billions of dollars in new financing last year despite that it was losing money and was saddled with massive debts. "That has allowed it to buy itself time while it improves its operations," said Mr. Kennedy. "If that were 2002, they never would have been able to get that financing."

In the fall of 2005, money manager ForstmannLeff was plunged into crisis when its controlling shareholder, Refco Inc. Chief Executive Phillip Bennett, was arrested. Investors began to pull money out of the firm. Investment banker Miller Mathis & Co. talked to other money managers about investing in the company, but they weren't interested, and lenders were offering only short-term financing. Instead, Angelo Gordon & Co., a $10 billion alternative-investment manager specializing in distressed debt, decided to make an equity investment, buying control of the company and preserving its 120 jobs.

When a company is in financial straits, "the conventional sources of capital are not as interested in taking the risks," said Sean Mathis, managing director at Miller Mathis. The willingness of alternative investors to make risky investments has helped keep companies out of bankruptcy protection. "This definitely could change with greater risk aversion, and more defaults will lead to greater aversion."

Other beneficiaries of investors' appetite for risk have been emerging-market countries, which raised $319 billion on global bond markets last year, compared with $122 billion in 2002. NWI Management LP, a hedge fund specializing in emerging-market debt, has seen its assets triple since 2002 to about $5 billion. Chief Executive Hari Hariharan said the shrinking risk premiums are "well deserved." Yields on Brazilian three-year local-currency bonds, for instance, have fallen to 12% from 19% in the past few years because the central bank has reduced inflation to 4% from 5%.

Still, Raghuram Rajan, former chief International Monetary Fund economist, said many countries had begun to loosen their budgets thanks to the ease of borrowing from abroad. A rise in investor risk aversion could force a return to austerity. "The question," he said, "is at what pace will it force change?"

Many economists argue the recent decline in risk premiums reflects fundamental changes in the economy. That, they said, should limit the extent of any reversal, limiting the impact on the broad economy. Fluctuations in economic activity have become much less pronounced in the past few decades, one reason corporate defaults have decreased.

There also is the possibility that the decline in risk premiums was self-reinforcing, and so a reversal might be, as well. Before Tuesday, the price volatility of stocks, bonds and even currencies had fallen to unprecedented low levels. The lack of volatility, in turn, drastically reduces sophisticated investors' estimates of how much money they could lose on any given day. As a result, those investors -- largely banks and hedge funds -- often feel comfortable taking on still more risk by using borrowed money.

Markets Recover As Calm Prevails (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse And Kathleen Day

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

NEW YORK, Feb. 28 -- Just like the previous day, the opening of the U.S. markets Wednesday was preceded by disappointing economic news.

The markets did not blink, however, as the federal government reported that the economy was growing at a slower rate, and that sales of new homes plunged more than 16 percent in January, the biggest monthly percentage decline in 13 years.

Investors, analysts said, were instead more focused on Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's congressional testimony and signs of stabilization in global markets, as the benchmark stock indexes in Shanghai and Shenzhen rose about 4 percent after their dramatic 9 percent drop Tuesday.

The Dow Jones industrial average, which fell 3.3 percent Tuesday, regained ground in fits and starts before closing at 12,268.63, up 52.39, or 0.43 percent.

The Nasdaq composite index closed at 2416.15, up 8.29, or 0.34 percent. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index closed at 1406.82, up 7.78, or 0.56 percent.

Others monitored screens that were no longer flashing bright red as the did the day before, and took a wait-and-see approach as prices fluctuated.

"It seems to be okay. But things can change any minute," said Doreen Mogavero of the brokerage Mogavero, Lee & Co., who placed orders on a transportation stock for a client who wanted 25,000 shares. "When we open like this, I want to wait to see if they come back a little bit."

Outside, a cluster of traders taking cigarette breaks grumbled about the technological difficulties in making trades quickly. They said that for about a 20-minute span Tuesday, from 3:40 to 4 p.m., the orders they had placed for customers were stuck in a queue.

It was unclear Wednesday whether the delays were related to a technological glitch that caused the Dow to plummet 200 points in a matter of minutes shortly before 3 p.m. Tuesday. The drop was caused when the system that calculates the average recorded a backlog of trades after the process was switched to a backup computer.

Down the street, traders at the American Stock Exchange complained of similar problems, and large brokerage firms also said they had trouble executing trades.

Traders said that generally, when they send buy or sell requests via a handheld device, those orders are reflected almost instantly on trading-floor screens. That was not the case Tuesday.

"We were just sitting on our hands," said a trader who requested anonymity because he was not authorized by his firm to speak to the press. "I kept going back to the specialist, asking, 'Did you get it? Did you get it yet?' But nothing was showing up."

Because they could not see whether their orders had registered, some traders sent the same order twice, which meant they ended up buying or selling twice as many shares than they wanted.

Some of that frustration eased Wednesday after stocks got a noticeable bump before 11 a.m., as TV screens flashed images of Bernanke speaking before Congress. The Dow recovered more than 100 points after Bernanke said the U.S. economy remained stable and he addressed the growth of high-risk mortgage loans known as subprime mortgages, one of the biggest concerns in the market. Troubles in that part of the lending industry, he said, were unlikely to spill over to the larger lending industry.

"There is really no material change in our expectations for the U.S. economy since I last reported to Congress a couple weeks ago," Bernanke said.

Although investors seeking shelter in stable investments bid up the price of Treasury bonds Tuesday, those bonds fell Wednesday as stocks recovered some losses. The yield on the benchmark 10-year treasuries, which falls as prices rise, reversed more than half of Tuesday's declines.

The rally in stocks was led by health care, consumer staples and other defensive stocks that tend to fare better during a market downturn.

"I think that's what's putting a floor underneath the market today," said Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist at Bank of America.

Many analysts said it would take at least several days for the market to settle, and cautioned investors from making hasty decisions.

"There's been some improvement, but I wouldn't expect to have an immediate sense of clarity," said Steven Wieting, an economist with Citigroup.

For now, some money managers said their investment view remained unchanged from the day before the market dropped.

Chad Peterson, spokesman for TIAA-CREF, a financial company that manages more than $400 billion, said that portfolio mangers there were "sticking to existing stock-picking strategies."

M. Steve Yoakum, head of the Public School and Education Employee Retirement System of Missouri, said: "We think it was a technical correction. It won't cause us to change any of our strategies."

Yoakum said he and his staff were in constant contact with the several dozen money managers he parcels out control of the pension fund to, and they agree that "stocks continue to be relatively cheap to bonds" and promise a bigger return long-term.

John Linehan, portfolio manager for the T. Rowe Price Value Fund, said he entered the market late in the day, snapping up $40 million worth of large, blue-chip companies across the board, including some in the health-care, technology and industrial sectors.

"You have a lot of market participants including a few investment professionals who had never lived through something like this," Linehan said. "There were desperate sellers, and we went in and took advantage of that and got some good prices."

Shortly before markets closed Wednesday, Sal Morreale, a trader at Cantor Fitzgerald, said that the technological delays of the previous day seemed to be behind them and that market fears had been quelled, at least temporarily.

"You had a couple of times where you saw some sell pressure," he said. "I thought, 'jeez, now we're really on the tightrope' . . . but it sort of went right back up. It didn't cave. I think today is sort of the day when people take a deep breath."

By Aaron Lucchetti And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

The New York Stock Exchange's move into the electronic age happened almost overnight. Now the Securities and Exchange Commission is looking into whether it happened too fast and contributed to this week's trading troubles.

Over the past year or so, the Big Board has shifted much of its trading away from its floor and onto an electronic platform, a move that many investors have embraced because it promises faster execution times in a business where time is money. In November, the NYSE announced it would close one of its five trading rooms, citing the potential to cut costs and because electronic trading requires fewer floor traders.

The SEC is examining whether the NYSE's shrinking of the floor affected the NYSE's ability to handle a surge in trading volume such as occurred during Tuesday's market slide, according to a person familiar with the matter. The regulators are concerned that capacity issues may have exacerbated the Big Board's woes this week.

The NYSE doesn't believe floor consolidation played any role in the trading problems this week, and a spokesman said they have not received an inquiry from the SEC related to floor consolidation and this week's trading woes.

The NYSE's system for delivering trades to its so-called hybrid platform -- a combination of electronic and human-based trading -- overloaded and frantic traders couldn't process thousands of orders.

On Tuesday, the market experienced one of the biggest point drops in five years and record volume, with 4.07 billion shares trading in Big Board-listed stocks. Trading problems grew more serious after an error in the calculation in the Dow Jones Industrial Average caused a sudden point drop, which the NYSE says led to a 50% spike in orders.

"It was a mess," says Steve Swanson, head of Automated Trading Desk LLC, a large brokerage firm based in Mount Pleasant, S.C. "There was a lack of information. No one was telling us what was going on. The hybrid is new, and we're seeing record volumes, and it's not holding up well."

The stakes are high for the Big Board's parent, NYSE Group, which became a publicly traded for-profit company last year. The exchange, formerly a not-for-profit membership club, is counting on its new electronic system to boost trading revenue and profit, all while making trading easier for investors. The SEC is talking to a number of firms and exchanges to determine whether other structural problems contributed to the trading issues.

Tuesday's trading problems attracted attention on Capitol Hill yesterday, where two Republicans on the House Financial Services Committee, Rep. Spencer Bachus of Alabama and Rep. Deborah Pryce of Ohio, asked the chief executives of NYSE Group and Dow Jones & Co. -- publisher of The Wall Street Journal and of Dow Jones Industrial Average and other market indexes -- for a "full explanation of what caused the systems failure." (Read the Bachus-Pryce letter1.)

"We are conducting a detailed review of yesterday's events and do not believe the calculation delay nor the subsequent catch up in the calculation in the Dow Jones Industrial Average exacerbated the market decline, as the market was down sharply during the 70-minute period and rebounded strongly soon after the DJIA was brought current," Dow Jones said in a statement. An NYSE spokesman said it was also reviewing the situation. NYSE officials met with Rep. Bachus's staff yesterday and plan to respond to the letter, he added.

So far, investors are cutting the NYSE some slack. NYSE Group fell 6.2%, or $5.56, Tuesday to close at $84.45 in Big Board trading, but rallied yesterday with the broader market to close at $84.90 a share, up 0.5%, or 45 cents.

The NYSE blames the problem on its Designated Order Turnaround, or DOT, system. DOT is an electronic pipeline that routes certain orders to the exchange. NYSE said the system was working better yesterday, with the company's daily market share in NYSE listed trading rising to about 70%, behind increased usage of floor brokers and NYSE's Arca electronic platform. The exchange adjusted the capacity of its pipeline and is working on further improvements.

The NYSE wasn't the only exchange that experienced problems this week. Nasdaq Stock Market and others had problems keeping up with the flood of orders. Problems elsewhere weren't as severe as those at the Big Board.

Sam Lek, chief executive of Lek Securities, spent much of yesterday fielding calls from frustrated investors trying to sort garbled trades that got caught in Tuesday's market crunch. One investor sold 10,000 shares of a stock at a price that was 90 cents below the best bid available when he placed the order Tuesday, effectively shortchanging the investor $9,000.

On Tuesday, things got worse after the Dow suddenly dropped at about 3 p.m., when the delay in calculating the average was fixed -- and the index reflected the big drop that occurred during the previous hour or so.

"Within a nanosecond, people were flying blind," said Andy Brooks, head of equity trading at T. Rowe Price Group in Baltimore. "We were all asking each other, 'What just happened? Does anybody have any ideas of what could have happened?' " With no communication from the New York Stock Exchange, he says, "we scrambled to figure out what was causing this."

He says it didn't help matters that the Nasdaq also was having some reporting problems. Trades, he said, were appearing out of sequence, making it harder to make decisions. A Nasdaq official said the market saw some slowness, with delays of seconds in reporting some trades in NYSE-listed stocks.

Commerce Department Says U.S. Economy Is Weaker Than Expected (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

DOJ_NMG_0138413

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

Analysts have been stumped by the apparent resilience of the American economy, which seemed to be bounding ahead at a 3.5 percent pace in the final quarter of last year even as the housing market fell and the Federal Reserve raised interest rates.

The paradox has been solved: the economy was not bounding. The Commerce Department reported yesterday that economic growth inched ahead by 2.2 percent in the fourth quarter of last year, only slightly faster than the 2 percent growth recorded in the third quarter and substantially below the economy's long-term trend rate of growth

The downward revision, by 1.3 percentage points, in the preliminary estimate of gross domestic product was almost three times the average adjustment since the early 1980s, which is 0.5 percentage point.

Coupled with a 17 percent decline in new-home sales in January and a 7.8 percent drop last month in orders of durable goods like computers and washing machines, the new data indicated the economy was much weaker than it seemed.

"I think we are going to discover that the economy is softer than the Fed thinks," said Robert Barbera, chief economist at ITG Hoenig.

In Congressional testimony, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, Ben S. Bernanke, offered a sanguine view. He said the revised numbers were "more consistent with our view of the economy" than the prior estimates. He said the Fed expected "moderate growth" going forward, which could pick up by midyear if housing managed to break its fall.

But concerns over the prospects of a slowing economy were heightened by the steep declines in equity markets around the globe on Tuesday, which came after a near 9 percent drop in the Shanghai market. Investors were also given the jitters by comments made to a business conference in Hong Kong on Monday by the former Fed chairman, Alan Greenspan. Mr. Greenspan warned that the American economy could be in recession by the end of the year.

Not many economists agree that a recession is in sight. Still, the slowing economy, economists say, should eventually take its toll on jobs. "It virtually guarantees labor market deterioration in the form of a higher unemployment rate," said Jan Hatzius, chief United States economist at Goldman Sachs.

While the statement of the Fed's interest-rate-setting committee in January expressed more concern about inflation than about growth, warning "inflation risks remain," economists say evidence of slower growth is likely to refocus the Fed's attention. "They are going to discover in the next 90 days that they are leaning the wrong way," Mr. Barbera added.

Not all of the economic news was bad. Inflation appeared tamer in the revised G.D.P. report than earlier estimates indicated. The price index for consumer goods excluding food and energy, the inflation gauge most favored by the Fed, rose at an annual rate of only 1.9 percent in the last three months of 2006, less than the 2.1 percent originally reported.

Moreover, about half of the revision to gross domestic product was because of lower inventory accumulation than the government had previously estimated. This means that companies have lower stocks of unsold goods in their warehouses, which would force them to increase production quicker to respond to consumer demand.

Also, the consumer confidence index of the Conference Board reached a five-year high in January.

But there are more signs of economic weakness. Trade, which had been thought to add 1.64 percentage points to growth in the quarter, added only 1.5 percentage points, according to the revised data.

The growth in consumer spending in the fourth quarter of last year was brought down a notch in the revised report, to 4.2 percent from 4.4 percent. And much of this growth was merely because of a fall in prices. In nominal dollars, consumer spending slowed markedly.

Housing, it seems, still has a way to fall. The Commerce Department reported that builders faced a growing glut of unsold homes in January as the pace of new-home sales slowed 16.6 percent — the most in 13 years.

The seasonally adjusted annual sales rate fell to 937,000 last month from 1.1 million in December. Compared with a year earlier, January's rate was down 20.1 percent. Since the housing market hit its peak in the summer of 2005, new-home sales have fallen by nearly a third.

But perhaps the more troubling adjustment in the G.D.P. report was to investment by businesses. Capital investment growth had been one of the sunnier components of economic activity in the second half of last year, picking up some slack from the collapse in residential construction — which declined 19 percent in the final quarter of last year.

Yet according to the revised figures, nonresidential investment in things like factories and computers declined by 2.4 percent in the fourth quarter, much more than the original estimate of a 0.4 percent decline.

"Corporations have become a little more risk averse," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight in Lexington, Mass. The economic outlook could deteriorate further if Tuesday's financial turbulence intensifies. Yesterday, American equity markets recovered some of their Tuesday loss. But many markets in Asia and Europe fell for a second consecutive day. And there are weak points in the American financial system — mortgage-backed bonds, for instance.

Yet, barring a financial disaster, many economists say they believe that a recession will be averted. This is contingent on proper action by the Fed. "There is substantial downward pressure on growth," Mr. Hatzius said. "But with little to worry about inflation pressures, there is no reason that monetary policy couldn't provide enough support to stabilize things."

Fourth-quarter GDP Revised Down To 2.2% Annual Rate (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

WASHINGTON — The economy grew at a much slower pace in the fourth quarter than originally thought while inflation eased, the government said Wednesday, in a report that showed the economy was somewhat soft heading into 2007.

Gross Domestic Product, the broadest measure of U.S. economic activity, rose 2.2% at a seasonally adjusted annual rate in the October-December period. That was up slightly from 2% in the third quarter, but down from the initial estimate of a 3.5% gain, the Commerce Department said.

AUDIO: Bernanke sees "moderate growth."

The revision stemmed from new data that showed slower spending on the part of businesses, higher imports and slightly weaker consumer spending.

"Business hesitancy will likely keep growth slow in the first quarter as well," Wachovia financial economist Gina Martin said in a note to clients. But business spending will likely pick up later in the year as firms build inventories, she said.

With the latest revision, GDP rose 3.3% in 2006, up from 3.2% in 2005 but lower than the 3.9% in 2004.

"This would then mark the fourth quarter in a row of below-potential growth, and at this point it is only a matter of time before this begins to show through in the labor market," he told clients Wednesday morning.

There was some good news in the government's report. The Federal Reserve's favorite inflation gauge, based on actual spending excluding volatile food and energy costs, was 1.9% in the fourth quarter. That was down from 2.2% in the third quarter and lower than the initial estimate of 2.1%.

Fed officials, including chairman Ben Bernanke, have said they would like to see inflation below 2%.

"Inflation is receding," Moody's Economy.com economist Augustine Faucher says. "The moderation in energy prices and below-potential growth in the first half of this year should keep inflationary pressures in check."

Although the government said Americans spent a bit less than initially thought, consumers continued to pull the economy in the fourth quarter. Consumer spending, which accounts for 70% of U.S. economic activity, rose 4.2% at the end of 2006, up from a 2.8% gain in the third quarter and the biggest increase since the first quarter.

With spending strong, the U.S. personal saving rate remained in negative territory at the end of 2006. The personal saving rate was -1.2% in the fourth quarter, a bit better than the -1.4% seen in the second and third quarters, according to the Commerce Department.

The department's figure, however, does not include a number of popular saving vehicles, such as 401(k)s and stocks.

Economy Slowed, Not Stalled (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, March 1, 2007

NEW YORK

DOJ_NMG_0138415

The US economy is entering spring with less wind at its back than it has had for the past four years.

Although the slowdown is still not a big concern of most economists, they warn that an economy that is moving more like a tortoise than a hare is at greater risk of being overrun by some outside event – perhaps one that causes a recession or a period of very slow growth.

But a sustainable slow-growth economy does have a bright side: Inflationary pressure is likely to ease, keeping the Federal Reserve from raising interest rates for borrowers.

One sign of economic slowdown came Wednesday when the government revised downward – from 3.5 percent to 2.2 percent – its estimate for the fourth-quarter gross domestic product (GDP). The new number marks the largest revision in quarterly GDP in at least 15 years. That news followed a tumultuous Tuesday, when the Dow Jones Industrial Average plunged 416.02 points, one of its most volatile moves in years. As of midday Wednesday, the market seemed to have stabilized.

Most economic forecasters say the market's acrobatic moves aren't the kind of exogenous event that would trigger a downturn in the economy. Wednesday, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, appearing before Congress, said there is "no material change" in the outlook from the last time he testified two weeks ago. The downward revision in the GDP, he added, was consistent with the central bank's outlook for "moderate growth." If the economy can work through its current problems, especially in the housing market, it could strengthen later this year, said Mr. Bernanke.

Wednesday, however, the housing sector received another shot of bad news. Sales of new homes fell 16.6 percent in January over the same time last year, the steepest percentage drop in more than a decade, the US Commerce Department reported. The number of unsold new homes continued to rise, and the median price fell 2.1 percent as developers dropped prices to attract buyers.

Durable goods droop

Housing is not the only sector that's bogged down. Orders of durable goods fell 7.8 percent in January after rising 3.6 percent in December, the Commerce Department reported Tuesday. Durable goods are big-ticket items such as airplanes and construction equipment.

"It's a mystery, in a way. The fundamentals should be positive for capital expenditures. It should be booming," says Dan Meckstroth, chief economist for Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI in Arlington. Va. "Corporate profits are at an all-time high. Companies have so much cash they are buying back their shares because they say they can't find a better use of their money in their own business, and factories are running at a relatively high rate."

The negative economic reports come on the heels of some recession warnings. Former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan, speaking Monday in Hong Kong, noted that corporate profit margins were starting to shrink – a possible sign of the end of a business cycle. As the business cycle ends, he cautioned, the US economy could be moving closer to a recession, perhaps by year's end.

A recession by year's end or early in 2008 is a scenario that makes sense to Hugh Moore of Guerite Advisors in Greenville, S.C. He has been bearish on the economy and the stock market for some time, saying the determining factor will be the "popping asset bubble" in the real estate market. "It will take away a lot of the impetus for consumer spending," says Mr. Moore.

Only a 'soft spot' in business cycle?

Other Wall Street advisers, however, are more sanguine. Jeff Kleintop, chief investment strategist at PNC Wealth Management in Philadelphia, notes that Mr. Greenspan had also predicted a downturn in 1995. "We had another five years of economic expansion," says Mr. Kleintop.

Kleintop, who has been bullish on the markets and the economy, sees several years of life left to the current business cycle. "We are at the midpoint of the expansion," he asserts. "We are just having a soft spot."

Despite the downturn in housing and durable goods, some other sectors – such as information technology, telecommunications, and nonresidential construction – continue to perform well, says Richard DeKaser, chief economist at National City Corp. in Cleveland.

"Whenever you get this kind of moderate growth, you end up with a mixed bag, with some sectors performing well and others poorly," he says.

One thing on which many economists agree is that Tuesday's stock-market slide came at a time of investor complacency. That complacency was shaken when the Chinese stock markets plunged 9 percent amid rumors that Chinese authorities were planning to crack down on speculation in their markets. Some commentators termed it "the Shanghai surprise." Wednesday, the Chinese markets recouped about half their losses.

However, the selling in China spread quickly on Tuesday to the European markets and then to the United States. The Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 3.47 percent. In an indication of how stable the markets have been recently, it was the first time since May 2003 that the index had fallen by more than 2 percent in one day.

"We can expect in the next week or two [that] the markets will be jittery or unstable, as investors come to terms with what happened," says Bob Brusca of Fact and Opinion Economics in New York. But, he adds, "the Shanghai market is not a bellwether for the rest of the world."

Market volatility can be a good thing, says Axel Merk of Merk Investments in Palo Alto, Calif. "People are just too confident," he says. "With greater volatility they will have to pare down their bets."

Outlook For Growth Hinges On Inventories, Investment (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And Timothy Aeppel

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

The U.S. economy was considerably weaker than previously thought in the fourth quarter of 2006, and its growth may remain moderate until the manufacturing sector solves its inventory problems and businesses step up their capital spending.

Gross domestic product, or the value of goods and services produced, expanded at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of 2.2% in the fourth quarter, the Commerce Department said, well short of its initial estimate of 3.5%. It was the third consecutive quarter the economy has expanded at less than its optimal noninflationary rate of around 3%. The performance capped the slowest three-quarter stretch of economic growth in nearly four years.

Behind the unusually large downward revision to fourth-quarter growth was an overhang of unsold goods, which caused many manufacturers to slash their production, trimming inventory faster than the government had expected. The inventory problem has been particularly acute for the home-building and auto industries. Reduced home and auto construction shaved a combined 2.4 percentage points from GDP growth in the fourth quarter, the Commerce Department said.

But the GDP report also showed why the economy has been resilient despite the manufacturing crunch. Consumer spending and government outlays surged during the quarter, and rising exports also contributed to growth. Meanwhile, inflationary pressures receded somewhat late last year.

Testifying on Capitol Hill yesterday, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said the "downward revision to the fourth-quarter GDP number was more consistent with our overall view of the economy than" the prior estimate. Mr. Bernanke said recent events, such as Tuesday's stock-market selloff and weaker readings on durable-goods orders and home building in January, haven't altered his view that the economy is poised for a modest expansion this year. "We are looking for moderate growth in the U.S. economy going forward," he said.

In the near term, the outlook for economic growth hinges partly on the ailing manufacturing sector, which is struggling under the impact of inventory reductions, the slumping housing market and the strength of equipment buying by businesses, which has been sluggish lately. Most economists still expect the manufacturing sector to show growth for the year, but there are concerns that the slump at the nation's factories could be deeper and more prolonged than expected, and that it might even be a warning sign of recession.

"Manufacturing stopped growing in September and has been on a moderate downtrend since then," said Daniel Meckstroth, an economist at the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI, a public policy and research group in Arlington, Va.

David Hensley, an economist at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., says manufacturing production will register a small increase in the current quarter, but not by much. The bigger questions, he says, are why businesses seem so hesitant to invest in capital equipment -- and will that hesitancy extend to cutbacks in hiring? If it does, the factory sector could exert a stronger-than-expected drag on the economy.

Parker Hannifin Corp., which makes motion and control equipment used in everything from aircraft to amusement-park rides, illustrates why capital spending growth is decelerating at many companies. The Cleveland company's performance is often viewed as an indicator of the broader industrial economy.

In the past, Parker Hannifin typically spent 4.5% to 5.5% of sales on new plants and machinery. Like many companies, however, it has slashed spending through efficiency moves, such as buying smaller, more flexible machines and eliminating inventories, which has freed up factory space. The company now spends about 2% to 2.5% of sales on capital expenditures and doesn't anticipate returning to the higher levels of the past, says Chief Executive Donald Washkewicz.

Business Caution Slows US Growth (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

The US economy expanded at a much slower rate than expected last quarter as business caution grew and fresh weakness emerged in the housing market.

The economy grew at a rate of 2.2 per cent compared with an initial estimate of 3.5 per cent. Government figures released yesterday showed prices cooled as core inflation slowed from an estimate of 2.1 per cent to 1.9 per cent.

Ben Bernanke, Federal Reserve chairman, said the lower growth figures were in line with expectations as he reiterated a benign outlook.

The central bank is forecasting moderate economic expansion and stabilising prices this year. The risk to that forecast from a slowdown in the housing sector was underlined yesterday by a 17 per cent drop in sales of new homes last month.

Drew Matus, an economist at Lehman Brothers, said: "The figures suggest the eco-nomy is playing out largely as the Fed expected, with a little bit of worrisome weakness in the housing market."

The fall in home sales was the biggest in 13 years and left the backlog of new homes standing empty at an elevated level of 537,000.

Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital, said: "Builders will probably have to continue to work off bloated stocks of finished homes for most of 2007."

The median price of a new home fell 2.1 per cent in January to $239,800 (£122,130) from $244,900 a year earlier.

Shares in construction companies fell but US stocks largely regained their poise after panic selling earlier in the week.

Sharp Falls In Sales Of New US Homes (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

Americans bought far fewer new homes last month, according to government data released on Wednesday that showed sales fell at the fastest rate in 13 years.

Sales of newly built homes fell 17 per cent as the backlog of houses standing empty remained stubbornly high, figures from the Commerce Department showed.

The drop was greater than even the most pessimistic Wall Street economists predicted and sent shares in housebuilders tumbling. Home Depot shares also slipped as the DIY store said it expected anaemic sales and lower profits this year.

The slowdown prolongs uncertainty over the duration and depth of the construction sector slump and underlines the risk to economic growth from the weak housing market.

House prices also eased as the median cost of a new home fell 2.1 per cent from a year ago to $239,800. The pace of sales fell to 937,000 from a rate of 1.1m the previous month, while inventories of unsold homes stood at 537,000. The biggest drop was in the west, where sales fell 37 per cent to an annual rate of 166,000.

Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital, said: “Builders will probably have to continue to work off bloated stocks of finished homes for most of 2007.’’

The Federal Reserve views the overhang of unsold homes as cause for concern but remains cautiously optimistic the sector is stabilising and will not derail the economy. The central bank on Wednesday continued to forecast moderate economic expansion this year after fresh figures showed the economy grew at a much slower rate than previously thought last quarter.

Drew Matus, an economist at Lehman Brothers, said: “The figures suggest the eco-nomy is playing out largely as the Fed expected, with a little bit of worrisome weakness in the housing market.”

The economy grew at a rate of 2.2 per cent in the fourth quarter against an estimate of 3.5 per cent. Government figures released on Wednesday also showed prices cooled as core inflation slowed to 1.9 per cent from an estimate of 2.1 per cent.

Peter Kretzmer, an analyst at Bank of America, said Wednesday’s data pointed to growth “well below” trend this quarter.

Drag From Housing Could Persist (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And Mary Ellen Lloyd

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- New-home sales plummeted in January, an indication that turbulence in the housing market will continue weighing on the nation's economic growth and housing-related businesses in the months ahead.

Sales of new homes plunged 16.6% to an annual pace of 937,000 units, the Commerce Department said. That rate was 20% below a year earlier, and the median sales price of $239,800 was down 2.1%.

Monthly readings are volatile and prone to weather-related distortions, but the January decline adds to the uncertainty as to whether demand for housing is stabilizing. Home builders have been lowering prices or beefing up incentives in an effort to jump-start sales, but cancellation rates remain high. That has forced many builders to slash production, which has limited economic growth and damped earnings for building-material and home-furnishing suppliers. Home Depot Inc. warned yesterday1 that 2007 earnings will drop a sharper-than-expected 4% to 9% as it spends $2.2 billion on renovating its retail operations and grapples with a challenging business environment. The outlook is more cautious than that of smaller rival Lowe's Cos., which last week projected same-store sales would be flat to up 2% in 2007.

Lowe's forecast was based on the view that sales of new and existing homes will flatten as 2007 wears on. "I hope they're right about the market," Home Depot Chief Executive Frank Blake said. "I tend to the more cautious side on that."

Longer term, the Atlanta home-improvement chain said its per-share earnings should increase 10% or more annually as the investments in its core business boost productivity. That view assumes the housing and residential construction markets improve late in the second half of 2007 or early 2008.

"While the current home-improvement market remains challenging, the long-term fundamentals of our company are strong, and we believe we can improve our performance and grow at, or faster than, the market beyond 2007," Mr. Blake said.

Economists say the threat of further deterioration in the housing market is the biggest risk to economic growth this year. A recent rise in default rates for subprime mortgages has raised the prospect of a broader credit crunch, and the biggest fear is consumers will curtail their spending if the housing slump becomes prolonged. (See related article on auto sales.2)

On the other hand, a housing market at or near its bottom would pave the way for a resumption of home building this year. In January, though, the slower sales pace raised the inventory. The inventory of unsold new homes on the market rose to the equivalent of a 6.8-month supply, up from a 5.7-month supply in December.

The Prosperity Boom (WSJ)

By Lawrence Kudlow

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

The U.S. stock markets were looking for a correction for some time now and on Tuesday they found it: a 3.5% sell-off across the board. The plunge follows a 20% run-up that began last summer, and some analysts believe it was overdue. Indeed, 3% corrections are normal and healthy. Legendary financier J.P. Morgan knew this a hundred years ago when he told a congressional panel that prices fluctuate. But the trigger for Tuesday's drop undoubtedly came from China.

The Chinese have sent a Shanghai flu across the globe. There is talk in China's government circles of slowing its boom and the "speculative" stock rise that has taken place over the past 18 months. Higher reserve requirements for banks, tighter interest rates, stricter implementation of a capital-gains land tax, and perhaps some form of capital controls are all in the rumor mill. This sounds like root-canal advice from the U.S. Treasury and the IMF, which somehow are dissatisfied with 10% growth and 2% inflation in China. France, Germany, Japan or Latin America should have it so bad.

At home in the U.S., there are still housing-slump worries and concerns about an inventory correction in autos and factories. Former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan this week even predicted a recession, naming the budget deficit as the cause. Huh? The deficit is evaporating as record tax revenues are being generated by a solid economy, itself a function of the low marginal tax rates put in place by President Bush.

A quick tour of the data: Consumer incomes keep rising amidst low unemployment and record job creation. Ditto for business profits -- the mother's milk of the economy and rising stocks. Exports are strong. An inventory correction, which helped knock fourth-quarter GDP down to 2.2% from 3.5%, will pass. As yet there is no evidence that a sub-prime mortgage lending problem is spreading. There is no economy-wide credit crunch. And bond rates are a low 4.5%, adding more value to stocks. The prosperity boom is alive and well.

In fact, using a modest 8% growth estimate for 2007 earnings, and capitalizing that profits forecast with a 4.5% bond yield, shares appear to be anywhere from 15% to 25% undervalued today. Put another way, the 6.7% forward earnings yield of the S&P 500 compares very favorably to a 4.5% Treasury bond or a 5.7% A-rated corporate bond.

The high-tech, productivity-driven U.S. economy is more durable and flexible than its liberal-left critics will ever admit. It is a private-sector free-enterprise economy, not a government-planned one. Innovation is strong and entrepreneurial spirits are high. The four prosperity killers, a paradigm coined by Arthur Laffer many years ago, all look dormant: inflation, taxes and regulatory burdens are low, while free trade keeps expanding.

One of the most underrated aspects of this bull-market economy is the sharp drop in marginal tax rates on capital formation. After the levies on capital gains and dividends were reduced to a scant 15% in 2003, the supply of easy capital surged, holding down real interest rates and expanding internally generated liquidity. This, plus record profits, has been the major source of the new-liquidity generation that has fueled stock markets at home and abroad.

This is good noninflationary liquidity. It is not bad liquidity, such as occurred in the 1970s when the Federal Reserve and other central banks gunned the printing presses and created the excess money expansion that drove inflation and interest rates sky-high.

Although gold prices are a concern today, the bigger bond market is sending a noninflationary signal. Future inflation spreads are predicting price-level increases of only 2%. The Fed is targeting inflation even more than unemployment. The core consumer deflator increased only 1.9% at an annual rate in last year's fourth quarter, while year-on-year inflation is a low 2.2%. We must keep an eye on gold -- which has a long history as an inflation barometer -- but right now the bond message seems closer to the truth. Additionally, consumer survey expectations of future inflation have come down markedly.

As for stocks, we're back to the stalwart supply-side adage: tax something less, get more of it. The low tax cost of capital has helped create a boom in private-equity buyouts and share buybacks, which pay out to investors in cash, thus adding to abundant liquidity that recycles into higher prices for a shrinking supply of stocks.

All that said, there are threats to growth. For starters there is the union attack on business, where "card checks" would substitute for secret ballots. Jack Welch, the former CEO of General Electric, thinks the unions are aiming at Silicon Valley -- America's most innovative high-tech area -- in a misbegotten attempt to turn the clock back to the 1960s and 1970s when competitiveness and entrepreneurship were at a low ebb. Tax threats associated with fixing the alternative minimum tax also are problematic. But the president has pledged to use his veto pen to prevent higher tax rates and will, according to the vice president, veto any card-check legislation (a.k.a. the misnamed Employee Free Choice Act).

Overall, Washington politics have taken a decidedly anti-growth turn ever since the new Democratic Congress went into session. Carbon caps and protectionist trade threats are the new battle cries. But the leftward moves of the Democrats on both the war and the economy may doom them in 2008. Neither statism nor galloping McGovernism is a prescription for taking the White House, especially with investor-class stockowners casting two out of every three votes in recent elections.

This is why I continue to believe that the prosperity boom is not over, either in the U.S. or around the globe. The spread of free-market capitalism, and its record wealth creation for both the rich and the unrich, is unstoppable. Liberal seers have been predicting the downfall of U.S. stocks and the economy several times a year since the Bush boom began back in 2003. Yet at comparable points in the business cycle, wages and wealth have outperformed during the current expansion.

My advice to investors is to remain optimistic and stay in stocks for the long term, since economic freedom is the tried and true path to growth and prosperity. Isaiah Berlin wrote many years ago that hedgehogs always win the long-term race against foxes. Message to the investor class: Hold that thought.

EDITORIAL: After The Sell-Off (NYT)

In a way, the stock market's rebound yesterday was as troubling as Tuesday's rout.

Ben Bernanke, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, managed to calm the market, saying that one could reasonably hope for a stronger economy by midyear if housing stabilized soon, and if manufacturing strengthened. But those are big ifs.

The torrent of bad news on housing is only worsening, with a report yesterday that new home sales for January had their steepest slide in 13 years. And as David Leonhardt pointed out in yesterday's Times, manufacturing has already slipped into a recession, with activity contracting in two of the last three months. How is it then that investors took Mr. Bernanke's words as a "buy" signal?

The short answer is that investors have a proclivity to hear what they want to hear. On Tuesday, warning bells were simply too loud to ignore, including the steep sell-off in stocks in Shanghai, downbeat reports on the United States economy and an attempt in Afghanistan on the life of Vice President Dick Cheney. Yesterday, investors needed only the slightest prod to revert to "hear no evil" form.

The more complete answer is also more troubling. In recent years, as housing and stock markets surged, even highly speculative investors have been encouraged to an unusual degree by their bankers and regulators, who are supposed to restrain investors' more maniacal bents, but instead have done little to quell or question excessive risk-taking.

Just last week, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson Jr. and top financial regulators said the government need not — and should not — provide greater oversight for the $1.4 trillion hedge fund industry, or, by extension, the trillions of dollars more in complex derivative transactions spawned by the industry. That stance is mostly free-market ideology run amok. But it is also based on the unproven assumption that unregulated investing, which dispersed risk and reduced volatility as markets surged, will continue to do so when markets tank.

The upshot is a one-sided bet for investors. They have explicit assurances from regulators and policy makers that almost anything goes when the markets are hot, and implicit assurances — based on past experience — that the Fed would lower interest rates to contain a financial crisis should one erupt. Unfortunately, there is no guarantee that easing up on rates would have the same powerful effect in a future crisis as it had in the past.

The next crisis appears to be building around weakness in the United States, not in Russia or Asia or South America. That means money could flow out of the country if markets were rattled. That would weaken the dollar and require speedy and complex remedial action by the world's central banks — not just a rate cut by the Fed. Tuesday's stock market decline could turn out to have been a garden-variety correction. But major market participants would be wise to rethink their assumptions.

One benefit of Tuesday's rout in equities is that it is causing everyone to learn more about the Chinese financial system. To wit, despite all the talk of "contagion" emanating from China, that country's domestic stock markets don't have all that much to do with the rest of the world financial system. Welcome to the reality of a closed capital account.

Consider Tuesday's 8.8% Shanghai slide, which is said by many to have triggered the global stomp out of equities. Perhaps the fall spooked some investors in New York who are easily spooked, or were worried about other things too.

But the truth is that the causes of the Shanghai plunge were mainly local. Mainland investors woke up Saturday to headlines warning that Beijing would soon set up a task force to investigate illegal stock brokerage practices and bank loans to punters. Then on Monday morning, the Shanghai exchange crossed the psychologically important 3000 marker for the first time. So China's punters took profits, and when the market fell far enough, they bought back the cheap stocks. On Wednesday, the Shanghai bourse bounced back 3.9% even as other Asian markets kept falling.

A little perspective helps. Prior to last year, China's investors mostly stayed away from shares, preferring to stash their money in banks. Poor corporate governance, untransparent financial statements and rampant speculation made the market more of a roulette wheel than a proper exchange. And with no pension savings to speak of, why risk your hard-earned savings?

However, in 2005 Beijing started selling down its state-owned shareholdings. Part of that game included giving goodies such as cash and free shares to diluted investors. Around the same time, Beijing put the screws on property speculation, concerned about rapidly upward spiraling prices. This made a powerful case for playing the stock market, all the more so because mainland investors aren't allowed to invest abroad.

The lesson here is that the performance of the Shanghai index bears little correlation to China's underlying economic growth. HSBC even finds a negative correlation. China's economic engine has motored along officially at around 9% growth each year over the past few years, and unofficially at rates several percentage points higher than that. Yet Shanghai's A share market -- shares of Chinese companies only available to mainland investors -- sank 15% in 2004 and 8% in 2005. Only last year did it start to soar. So it doesn't make sense for world markets to fall merely because Shanghai has a bad day.

The far larger threat of "contagion" from China is from U.S. protectionism or lobbying for Beijing to revalue its currency. Either one of those could send the real Chinese economy -- not just the Shanghai stock casino -- into slower growth or deflation or both. And that surely would echo around the world, given the growing integration of the real Chinese economy with America's. What isn't integrated yet is the Chinese financial system.

China's markets won't act this way forever if Beijing manages to clean up the way mainland companies do business. Efforts to impose standardized accounting rules and crack down on corruption help. But the best way to develop China's stock markets is to impose market discipline -- and especially to let average Chinese put their $4 trillion of savings where they may. Then a Chinese stock selloff really would mean something to the world.

Can Landrieu Find Her Voters? (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, March 1, 2007

Hurricane Katrina may have decimated New Orleans, the political base of Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), but she and her advisers think they have a winning strategy for her 2008 re-election bid — even if the Big Easy never fully regains its population.

Republicans look at Landrieu's narrow victories, the state's displaced, mostly Democratic voters, and the relatively high popularity of President Bush compared with his standing in the rest of the country, and they see a chance to flip yet another Southern Democratic Senate seat in a presidential election year.

Metropolitan New Orleans had roughly 1.4 million residents before Katrina hit in late August 2005. More than 900,000 people have returned to the area but the city of New Orleans, which once boasted close to 500,000 inhabitants, remains only about half of its pre-Katrina size.

Landrieu recently released a poll she commissioned in January showing that she had a 64 percent job approval rating statewide. The survey also asked the more than 1,000 Louisiana residents polled if they thought Landrieu deserved re-election and pitted her against several Republicans who are considering challenging her. But a Landrieu spokesman declined to release those results.

Still, some Democratic operatives believe that Landrieu is in good shape as she begins her bid for a third term.

"Mary's actually doing the right thing now," said one knowledgeable Democratic strategist who did not want to be named. "She's voting center-right, pushing for hurricane relief funds" and reaching out to other parts of the state beyond New Orleans.

Landrieu's efforts to prove her commitment to the rest of the state are evident in her news releases.

Last week she announced that Louisiana will get $22.5 million in grants from the Housing and Urban Development Department. The release highlighted several projects, including one for a women's center in northwest Louisiana.

Undoubtedly Landrieu's biggest coup to date — her involvement in opening a huge swath of the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas production — should earn her plaudits across the state.

"Just bringing money to the state will have a ripple effect," the Democratic strategist said. "The state will benefit overall; there will be more employment."

The deal signed by Bush last year splits 37.5 percent of the new revenues among Texas, Mississippi, Alabama and Louisiana.

Ray Strother, a longtime Democratic consultant and Louisiana native whose firm has worked for Landrieu before, said the daughter of former New Orleans Mayor Moon Landrieu made in-roads with voters outside of the Big Easy even before hurricanes Katrina and Rita hit the state.

"Since she's been in the Senate almost 12 years, her base is growing," Strother said. In Shreveport in northwestern Louisiana, for example, "she's won their affection," he said.

Still, even loyal Democrats such as Strother concede that any legitimate Republican, including Rep. Richard Baker, who is contemplating running, will give her a tough race.

"She's a Southern Democrat — of course it's going to be close," Strother said.

Landrieu won a second term in 2002 with just 52 percent of the vote against a relatively unknown Republican opponent — and that was in a nonpresidential year. Outside of Orleans Parish, Suzanne Haik Terrell (R) earned 53 percent of the vote to Landrieu's 47 percent.

But the statistics are not as dire for Landrieu as they may seem, Landrieu spokesman Adam Sharp said.

New Orleans was emptied after Katrina and residents were bused to Houston, Atlanta and beyond. But a sizable number — some estimates say it was as much as 85,000 people — simply relocated within the state.

Former New Orleans residents already are flexing their political muscle in their new communities, Sharp said. For instance, Shreveport elected its first black mayor, a Democrat, last year.

And registered voters still living outside the state's borders will be allowed to vote absentee in this year's gubernatorial election as well as next year's federal elections. Some 43,000 Louisianans already informed state election officials that they are registered to vote in the Pelican State even though they are living elsewhere.

The New Orleans mayoral race last year, which featured Landrieu's brother, Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu (D), saw the candidates buying air time in Houston and Atlanta and holding "town hall" meetings beyond Louisiana's borders.

Sharp predicted that trend will continue.

"I think you're going to see a lot of that again in the gubernatorial race," he said. "We're watching that race closely to see what the new dynamic is going to be for statewide campaigns."

Only 20,000 displaced New Orleans residents voted absentee in the mayoral race, though no one knows how many returned to vote in person.

Sharp said Landrieu's campaign, once it's up and running, will devise a system for locating and targeting those eligible out-of-state voters. TV commercials airing in neighboring states, direct mail sent to households without Louisiana ZIP codes, e-mail newsletters and fundraising pleas sent far and wide likely will be an integral part of the 2008 Senate race.

"It's unprecedented," Sharp said.

Questions About The Draft May Cloud Giuliani's 2008 Hopes (WEX)

By Bill Sammon

Washington (DC) Examiner, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - If this presidential campaign is anything like the last, John McCain's Vietnam service will inevitably be contrasted with GOP rival Rudy Giuliani's avoidance of a war that he opposed.

"Any suggestion that he was dodging the draft is totally, factually inaccurate," said a senior Giuliani campaign adviser who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the topic. "He opposed the war on tactical and strategic grounds."

But as far back as 1993, when he successfully ran for mayor of New York, Giuliani has been dogged by accusations that he pulled strings to avoid the draft. By contrast, McCain has long been feted as a bona fide war hero for his harrowing stint in a Vietnamese prison.

Anyone who dismisses the significance of Vietnam as a potential issue in the 2008 campaign is forgetting how surprisingly potent it proved in 2004, when there was enormous interest in the military records of both President Bush and Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts. Four years later, with the nation still at war, Americans likely are to again scrutinize the military records of those who seek the job of commander in chief.

Giuliani, who once said of the Vietnam war, "I disagreed with it," obtained an occupational deferment in 1969, when he was a law clerk. Although critics say such deferments were rare, the Giuliani campaign disagrees.

"He wanted an occupational deferment, which was very common at the time, because he wanted to be a lawyer," the Giuliani adviser said.

When Giuliani's deferment expired in 1970, he drew draft number 308, which was never called. His campaign suggests this proves he was not a draft dodger.

"This is an important point: After his deferment, his name was entered into the lottery — at least once — and he had a high number," the adviser said.

Still, Giuliani has always been politically sensitive to the issue. During his 1993 mayoral campaign, he commissioned a "vulnerability study" that listed "draft dodger" as one of the epithets that might be hurled against him.

In blunt language, the consultants who prepared the study articulated how adversaries might frame the issue.

"Giuliani received special treatment from a friendly federal judge to avoid military service during the Vietnam war, when thousands of less fortunate people were dying," they wrote. "Then, as a member of the Justice Department, he hypocritically prosecuted draft dodgers."

Mark Salter, McCain's chief of staff, said he had "no idea" whether Giuliani's deferment would become a presidential campaign issue.

He added: "I don't think McCain would want it to be an issue. I know that sort of suggests a false modesty, but I really don't."

The "false modesty" remark was an allusion to the Arizona senator's extensive military background. The son and grandson of admirals, McCain graduated from the Naval Academy and served 22 years in the Navy, including five and a half as a prisoner of war in Hanoi.

Thus, if Vietnam becomes an issue in the 2008 campaign, McCain might find himself in the role that Kerry had hoped to play in 2004 — unassailable war hero. That status eluded Kerry when his combat record was challenged by Swift Boat Veterans for the Truth, who also denounced the Democrat for accusing fellow Vietnam veterans of war crimes.

Giuliani, on the other hand — who had a 2-to-1 advantage over McCain in an ABC poll of Republicans this week — could find his record subjected to the sort of intense scrutiny that Bush experienced in 2004. Some of that scrutiny came from Kerry himself, who questioned whether Bush had fulfilled his stateside duties in the National Guard.

CBS News raised similar questions in a "60 Minutes" broadcast that backfired because the network used documents that could not be authenticated. The ensuing scandal, known as "Memogate," ended up inoculating Bush against further attacks on his military record.

Swift Boats co-founder John O'Neill said the only reason Vietnam became a major issue in 2004 was that Kerry kept bringing it up.

"I do think Kerry was a special case," O'Neill said. "Whatever Rudy Giuliani or the rest of these people did or didn't do in terms of the Vietnam War, I don't think that's a legitimate issue in the presidential campaign of 2008."

During an interview with The Examiner last fall, when he was mounting a second bid for the White House, Kerry said of the Swift Boat Veterans: "I'm prepared to kick their ass from one end of America to the other." But the senator from Massachusetts later dropped out of the race.

Kerry spokeswoman Amy Brundage said this week that "2008 should be a choice between candidates' visions on ending the war in Iraq." She added: "That conversation must not be stolen by partisan front groups [that use] lying, despicable attack ads to smear the records of those who have served in uniform."

“A younger Mitt Romney became eligible for the draft in 1970, but his number was not called in the military draft,” Romney spokesman Kevin Madden said. “During that time, he did spend several years as a missionary for his church in France.”

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama was only 14 when the Vietnam War ended. New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, as a woman, was not subject to the draft that would complicate her future husband’s White House bid.

John Edwards, who is also running for president, didn’t get many questions about his military record when he was Kerry’s running mate in 2004, thanks to all the focus being on Kerry and Bush.

“I did not serve in the military,” Edwards said in an April 2004 interview with Katie Couric, who then asked if he had a high lottery number.

“I did, and I came after the time that they were actually drafting from the lottery,” he said. “And because [of] the time I came along and graduated from high school and then went to college, I was not drafted.”

Giuliani-Appointed Judges Tend To Lean To The Left (POL)

By Ben Smith

The Politico, March 1, 2007

When Rudy Giuliani faces Republicans concerned about his support of gay rights and legal abortion, he reassures them that he is a conservative on the decisions that matter most.

"I would want judges who are strict constructionists because I am," he told South Carolina Republicans last month. "Those are the kinds of justices I would appoint -- Scalia, Alito and Roberts."

But most of Giuliani's judicial appointments during his eight years as mayor of New York were hardly in the model of Chief Justice John Roberts or Samuel Alito -- much less aggressive conservatives in the mold of Antonin Scalia.

A Politico review of the 75 judges Giuliani appointed to three of New York state's lower courts found that Democrats outnumbered Republicans by more than 8 to 1. One of his appointments was an officer of the International Association of Lesbian and Gay Judges. Another ruled that the state law banning liquor sales on Sundays was unconstitutional because it was insufficiently secular.

A third, an abortion-rights supporter, later made it to the federal bench in part because New York Sen. Charles E. Schumer, a liberal Democrat, said he liked her ideology.

Cumulatively, Giuilani's record was enough to win applause from people like Kelli Conlin, the head of NARAL Pro-Choice New York, the state's leading abortion-rights group. "They were decent, moderate people," she said.

"I don't think he was looking for someone who was particularly conservative," added Barry Kamins, a Democrat who chaired the panel of the Bar Association of the City of New York, which reviewed Giuliani's appointments. "He picked a variety from both sides of the spectrum. They were qualified, even-tempered, academically strong."

That is the kind of praise that will amount to damnation (not necessarily faint) among some of the people Giuliani will be trying to impress in Washington on Friday, when he addresses the Conservative Political Action Conference. The group is filled with social conservatives, for whom the effort to recast the ideological orientation of the federal judiciary has been a generation-long project. Giuliani already faced a high threshold of skepticism from many of these activists because of his comparatively liberal record on such hot-button issues as abortion rights, tolerance of gays and gun control.

Giuliani's judicial appointments continue to win good reviews in New York legal circles for being what conservatives sometimes say they want: competent lawyers selected with no regard to "litmus tests" on hot-button social issues. Many of these people were in the mode of Giuliani himself: tough-on-crime former prosecutors with reformist streaks and muted ideologies.

"He took it very seriously -- he spent a lot of time with these candidates," recalled Paul Curran, a Republican and former U.S. attorney who chaired Giuliani's Commission on Judicial Nominations. "He was looking for judges who were willing to enforce the laws."

The mayor of New York appoints judges to three of the state's lowest courts, the Criminal Court and Family Court, which deal with lower-grade crimes than the state's Supreme Court, the main trial court and the Civil Court, which deals in relatively small financial disputes.

When Giuliani took office in 1994, he inherited a system of judicial appointments created by one of his predecessors, Ed Koch, and designed to insulate the courts from political influence. Under the system, the mayor appoints members of an independent panel. Aspiring judges apply to the panel, which recommends three candidates for each vacancy. The mayor chooses among the three.

Giuliani, a former U.S. attorney, and top aides who remain close to him, Dennison Young and Michael Hess, reviewed the applications.

Giuliani cast himself in New York not as a conservative (he had actually run on the Liberal Party line) but as a reformer. Though at least 50 of his 75 appointees were registered Democrats (only six were registered Republicans), Giuliani also won praise for, some say, appointing fewer judges with ties to local Democratic politics than his predecessors.

"It was not people coming out of the clubhouses, which is what I'd seen earlier," said Charles Moerdler, a member of the Commission on Judicial Nominations who had served other mayors in the same capacity. "I did not support Rudy (the first time he ran) because he was too conservative for me, so I was very alert to that, but I didn't see any litmus tests on his part," he said.

Giuliani's judges serve across New York's courts, where they're more likely to encounter misdemeanant celebrities -- Boy George and Naomi Campbell have appeared recently in front of his appointees -- than they are to tangle with the Establishment Clause. Some, like a Family Court judge who ruled that an unmarried couple couldn't adopt, would please national conservatives. But many of their occasional forays into jurisprudence would likely make Scalia wince.

Charles Posner, a Brooklyn judge appointed by Giuliani, made the kind of decision that keeps conservatives up nights when he was asked to levy a fine against a shopkeeper, Abdulsam Yafee, who had illegally sold beer at 3:30 a.m. on a Sunday. In an unusual, lengthy 2004 ruling, Posner found that "there is no secular reason why beer cannot be sold on Sunday morning as opposed to any other morning."

Noting that Sunday is only the Christian Sabbath, Posner continued, "Other than this entanglement with religion, there is no rational basis for mandating Sunday as a day of rest as opposed to any other day."

Giuliani was out of office at the time of the decision and, in any case, had no say over his appointees' rulings. His spokeswoman, Maria Comella, declined to comment on the difference between the judges he appointed and those he promises to appoint.

Another Giuliani appointee reached a socially conservative verdict by a means that might not please strict constructionists. Judge Michael Sonberg denied a motion by two Bronx strip-club owners to dismiss prostitution charges against them that were based on dancers' offering "lap dances" to an undercover officer.

Sonberg ruled that the changing "cultural and sexual practices" of the previous two decades permitted him to alter the definition of prostitution.

"Statutory construction cannot remain static while entrepreneurial creativity brings forth heretofore unimagined sexual 'diversions,' " he wrote in a ruling that would have pleased social conservatives while, perhaps, alarming strict constructionists and strippers alike.

More troubling to some of the social conservatives Giuliani is courting, however, would have been Sonberg's other affiliation: When he was appointed in 1995, he was already an officer of the International Association of Lesbian and Gay Judges, a professional group. After his appointment, he became the group's president.

Laboring in the state's lower courts, few of Giuliani's other appointees show signs of ideological leanings. Two, however, were appointed to federal district courts -- one of them, Richard Berman, by President Bill Clinton. The other, Dora Irizarry, was a Bush nominee considered so liberal that Schumer pushed her nomination through.

Irizarry, appointed by Giuliani to the Bronx Criminal Court in 1996, had disclosed that she considers herself "pro-choice" during her 2002 campaign for New York state attorney general. Her appointment to the federal bench was almost derailed when the American Bar Association ruled her "not qualified" on the grounds that as a state judge, she had been "gratuitously rude and abrasive" and "flew off the handle in a rage."

But to Schumer, who led the fight against Bush's appellate judges, Irizarry was a Republican he could live with.

"Temperament is not at the top of my list," Schumer explained at the time, when asked why he supported the former Giuliani appointee. "Ideology is key."

McCain To Formally Announce Bid In April (AP)

By Marcus Franklin And Liz Sidoti

Republican Sen. John McCain will officially enter the presidential race — his second run after a bitter loss to George W. Bush in 2000 — with a formal announcement in early April after a trip to Iraq.

The Arizona senator discussed the timing of the long-expected announcement with reporters at an awards reception Wednesday evening a few hours after taping an appearance on CBS' "Late Show With David Letterman."

McCain told Letterman: "The last time we were on this program, I'm sure you remember everything very clearly that we say, but you asked me if I would come back on this show if I was going to announce. ... I am announcing that I will be a candidate for president of the United States."

McCain said he would make a formal announcement in early April. He later told reporters that he would visit Iraq first and that his campaign would be about "whether I have the vision, experience and knowledge to lead the nation."

Former New York Gov. George Pataki introduced McCain to reporters before the Irish-American 10th Annual Awards reception Wednesday night. Asked about polls showing him trailing former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, McCain said: "We keep doing the best we can. We're very happy with the way things are going."

There had been no doubt that McCain would eventually become a full-fledged White House candidate, and he had been expected to make his candidacy official in the spring.

The 2006 midterm campaign had just ended when McCain took the first formal step toward a presidential run in November. He formed an exploratory committee and gave a speech casting himself as a "common-sense conservative" in the vein of Ronald Reagan who could lead the party back to dominance after a dreadful election season by returning to the GOP's core principles.

However, he faces strong challenges from Giuliani, who has widened his lead over McCain in popularity polls in recent weeks, and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who is little-known nationally but is drawing notice for his deft fundraising.

The other two have spent the past two months mostly campaigning while McCain largely has been tied to Capitol Hill in his role as the highest-ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, which is focused largely on the unpopular Iraq war.

McCain, a former Navy pilot who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam, has emerged as the Senate's go-to guy on Iraq. He has become President Bush's most outspoken supporter of sending 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, a position that could endear him to GOP primary voters but anger much of the rest of the electorate.

A four-term senator, McCain unsuccessfully ran for president in 2000 against Bush and has been laying the groundwork for a second run for more than a year.

Since losing that race, McCain has alternately challenged and embraced the president, building an independent reputation as one who isn't afraid to speak his mind. At the same time, he's sought to mend fences with conservatives he alienated in his first presidential run.

Should he win this nomination and then the presidency, McCain, 70, would be the oldest president ever sworn into office for a first term. Only Reagan, who was 73 at the start of his second term, was older.

Asked by Letterman if he would consider being a vice presidential candidate, McCain repeated an answer he gave in 2004 when he was mentioned as a possible running mate: "You know, I spent all those years in a North Vietnamese prison camp, kept in the dark, fed scraps — why the heck would I want to do that all over again?"

McCain To Formally Announce Bid In April (CHIT)

By MARCUS FRANKLIN And LIZ SIDOTI

NEW YORK -- Republican Sen. John McCain will officially enter the presidential race -- his second run after a bitter loss to George W. Bush in 2000 -- with a formal announcement in early April after a trip to Iraq.

The Arizona senator discussed the timing of the long-expected announcement with reporters at an awards reception Wednesday evening a few hours after taping an appearance on CBS' "Late Show With David Letterman."

McCain told Letterman: "The last time we were on this program, I'm sure you remember everything very clearly that we say, but you asked me if I would come back on this show if I was going to announce. ... I am announcing that I will be a candidate for president of the United States."

McCain said he would make a formal announcement in early April. He later told reporters that he would visit Iraq first and that his campaign would be about "whether I have the vision, experience and knowledge to lead the nation."

In discussing the war in Iraq with Letterman, McCain repeated his assertion that U.S. troops must remain in Iraq rather than withdrawing early even though the war has been mismanaged.

"Americans are very frustrated, and they have every right to be," McCain said. "We've wasted a lot of our most precious treasure, which is American lives."

In February, Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama described the lives of troops in Iraq as having been "wasted" but then apologized a day later for making what he called "a slip of the tongue" that he said was not meant to diminish their sacrifice.

Former New York Gov. George Pataki introduced McCain to reporters before the Irish-American 10th Annual Awards reception Wednesday night. Asked about polls showing him trailing former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, McCain said: "We keep doing the best we can. We're very happy with the way things are going."

There had been no doubt that McCain would eventually become a full-fledged White House candidate, and he had been expected to make his candidacy official in the spring.

The 2006 midterm campaign had just ended when McCain took the first formal step toward a presidential run in November. He formed an exploratory committee and gave a speech casting himself as a "common-sense conservative" in the vein of Ronald Reagan who could lead the party back to dominance after a dreadful election season by returning to the GOP's core principles.

However, he faces strong challenges from Giuliani, who has widened his lead over McCain in popularity polls in recent weeks, and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who is little-known nationally but is drawing notice for his deft fundraising.

The other two have spent the past two months mostly campaigning while McCain largely has been tied to Capitol Hill in his role as the highest-ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, which is focused largely on the unpopular Iraq war.

McCain, a former Navy pilot who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam, has emerged as the Senate's go-to guy on Iraq. He has become President Bush's most outspoken supporter of sending 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, a position that could endear him to GOP primary voters but anger much of the rest of the electorate.

A four-term senator, McCain unsuccessfully ran for president in 2000 against Bush and has been laying the groundwork for a second run for more than a year.

Since losing that race, McCain has alternately challenged and embraced the president, building an independent reputation as one who isn't afraid to speak his mind. At the same time, he's sought to mend fences with conservatives he alienated in his first presidential run.

Should he win this nomination and then the presidency, McCain, 70, would be the oldest president ever sworn into office for a first term. Only Reagan, who was 73 at the start of his second term, was older.

Asked by Letterman if he would consider being a vice presidential candidate, McCain repeated an answer he gave in 2004 when he was mentioned as a possible running mate: "You know, I spent all those years in a North Vietnamese prison camp, kept in the dark, fed scraps -- why the heck would I want to do that all over again?"

In Newly Usual Way, McCain Says He'll Run (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — Senator John McCain of Arizona took the platform of a late-night talk show Wednesday and said he would formally announce his campaign for the presidency in early April. His remarks erased entirely whatever doubt could have existed about his ambitions for the Republican nomination.

"The last time we were on this program — I'm sure you remember everything very clearly that we say — but you asked me if I would come back on this show if I was going to announce," Mr. McCain told David Letterman. "I am announcing that I will be a candidate for president of the United States."

Mr. McCain is known as something of a free spirit, and his aides suggested that his remarks to Mr. Letterman were, if formal-sounding, extemporaneous rather than a result of careful planning by his campaign. Nonetheless, aides said, his appearance clearly fit into the campaign's effort to stir as much excitement and interest as possible in his plans — a point Mr. McCain himself made as he and Mr. Letterman bantered on.

"By the way, I'll be making a formal announcement in April," Mr. McCain said. By way of explanation, he added: "This is the announcement preceding the formal announcement. You know you drag this out as long as you can. You don't just have one rendition. You've got to do it over and over."

Acting a bit downcast, Mr. Letterman responded, "How do you think that makes me feel?"

The exchange was the latest example of how the customs of presidential campaigns are changing. Not all that long ago, an announcement was a defining moment in the evolution of candidates, in which they truly opened their campaigns. For 2008, on the other hand, candidates have been not only announcing but also preannouncing on Web sites and various television shows and in random interviews.

In truth, Mr. McCain has been running for the White House for nearly two years and, ever since forming a presidential exploratory committee in November, has repeatedly told interviewers that there are no circumstances he can foresee in which he would not run.

He has assembled a full campaign staff, and his organization has been churning out nearly daily pronouncements of the latest political figure to endorse him. In Iowa two weeks ago, he talked at three events about what he would do as president. And he is going to the West Coast this weekend to raise money.

Mr. McCain's aides said Wednesday that they would not disclose any details about the announcement tour until later, no doubt in anticipation of drawing yet another round of publicity. "Details on the formal announcement will be forthcoming," said Brian Jones, campaign spokesman.

McCain Says He'll Seek Presidency, Plans To Make It Official In April (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Sen. John McCain of Arizona declared last night that he will join the 2008 race for the White House and will formally announce his candidacy in April.

McCain used an appearance on CBS's "Late Show With David Letterman" to say what has been clear for many months, erasing whatever doubts may have existed that he intends to battle for the Republican nomination, which eluded him in 2000.

"I am announcing that I will be a candidate for president of the United States," the former Navy pilot and Vietnam War prisoner told Letterman.

McCain's decision to use the program to declare his intentions followed a pattern increasingly common in this presidential contest, as candidates have used multi-step announcement schedules to garner maximum attention for their bids.

In this case, however, McCain, 70, may have additional motives for using the late-night comedian's show, as he tries to rekindle some of the spontaneity and unpredictability from his first campaign. He cast himself as an insurgent politician in 2000, but this time, weighed down by a supportive position on the Iraq war that is out of step with the public even as he methodically woos the GOP establishment, he has struggled to project the buoyant personality of his first effort.

McCain lost a bitter contest for the Republican nomination to George W. Bush in 2000. But he emerged as the early leader in the race for the 2008 GOP nod, in part because of his support for the president's leadership on the Iraq war but also because he has spent months courting Bush loyalists and the Republican establishment that had spurned him.

In recent months, however, his star has been eclipsed somewhat by that of former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who now leads McCain in many national and some state polls testing the Republican field. A Washington Post-ABC News poll released Tuesday showed Giuliani leading McCain 44 percent to 21 percent. A month ago, Giuliani's advantage was much narrower, at 34 percent to 27 percent for McCain.

McCain advisers said the decision to declare that he will join the Republican race was not a direct result of concern that Giuliani has gained ground in the past two months but rather part of a long-planned strategy to make his intentions known around this time.

McCain is one of the leading congressional advocates for Bush's troop increase in Iraq, a position that has tied his presidential aspirations to progress in the conflict there. McCain has been highly critical of the administration's management of the war, describing what has taken place over the past few years as a "train wreck" and calling Donald H. Rumsfeld "one of the worst secretaries of defense in history."

In addition to McCain and Giuliani, former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney is seen as a potentially strong candidate for the GOP nomination. The McCain and Romney camps have been circling each other for months, attempting to corral activists and major fundraisers both nationally and in states with early contests next year.

Other Republicans already in the race or contemplating running include former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, former Wisconsin governor Tommy G. Thompson, former Virginia governor James Gilmore and Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado.

Former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) may also join the race, although he appears likely to wait until at least late summer before deciding.

McCain was one of the first Republicans to establish a presidential exploratory committee, filing papers with the Federal Election Commission weeks after the GOP drubbing in the midterm elections last November. At that time, McCain also filed a statement of candidacy, in essence a declaration of his intentions to run.

He recently made his first trip to Iowa as a prospective candidate and made clear that he would run hard for the Republican nomination.

The 2000 race was hard-fought and highly negative. Bush entered as the dominant front-runner, while McCain, who had often parted company with the GOP, was seen as a dark horse.

McCain chose to skip the Iowa caucuses that year and concentrate on New Hampshire, where independents play a more significant role in the process. His maverick style and "Straight Talk Express" theme caught fire and he soundly defeated Bush in the nation's first primary.

That set up what turned into a nasty clash in South Carolina, where McCain was the subject of scurrilous attacks. His advisers blamed the Bush camp for the attacks, but Bush advisers said they were not responsible. Bush won the primary and McCain and his team emerged angry and bitter.

McCain would later find himself in conflict with religious conservatives after he delivered a speech sharply critical of the influence of Rev. Jerry Falwell and the Rev. Pat Robertson, among others, describing them as "agents of intolerance."

Those kinds of remarks have soured some conservatives on McCain as a potential party standard-bearer. Some doubt his commitment to social issues, despite a long record opposing abortion rights, and others believe he has not been a strong advocate for supply-side tax cuts, which have been at the heart of GOP economic philosophy since the administration of President Ronald Reagan.

Some Republicans who opposed McCain in the past have warmed to the prospect of his candidacy, in part because they see him as a potentially strong candidate. But those moves to court conservatives have cost some support among independent voters, and the issue of the war has further complicated McCain's ability to project himself as a nominee who could attract Democrats and left-leaning independents.

Former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge will serve as national co-chair of Republican John McCain's presidential exploratory committee, the campaign said Wednesday.

Ridge, a former two-term Pennsylvania governor, served as first head of the nation's newly created Department of Homeland Security from 2003 to 2005. He praised McCain's leadership in a statement announcing his support for the Arizona senator's bid for the White House:

"What sets John apart is his ability to form coalitions around a common, principled cause. Our country is at a crossroads and John McCain is the leader who fundamentally knows what it takes to move us forward and keep us safe," Ridge said.

McCain, who said Wednesday that he will formally enter the race for the 2008 GOP nomination in April, said that Ridge's "expertise as an innovative governor and national leader ... is invaluable and I'm grateful for his support."

WASHINGTON (AP) — New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer broke bread with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton on Wednesday, but unlike other Democrats at the breakfast table, he's not ready to give her a morsel of an endorsement.

On a trip to the nation's capital, Spitzer met with the state delegation — including Clinton, his party's early front-runner in the 2008 presidential race — but when asked later about who he's supporting for president, he kept a professional distance.

"At this point it's premature to be even thinking about questions like that," Spitzer said in an interview with the Associated Press.

"I'm focused on the state and the budget," he said, adding that in his meetings with Clinton, "presidential politics didn't come up, because we have jobs to do."

And on the same day the Democratic governor said it was too early to think about it, his lieutenant governor, David Paterson, told Albany radio station WROW that his candidate was "Hillary Clinton. No question."

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney wants to sign up supporters who can raise as much as $250,000 for his presidential campaign at a Los Angeles fundraiser in March.

The event, at the home of developer Rick Caruso on March 27, is being co-hosted by California venture capitalist Brad Freeman, a major fundraiser for President Bush, and money manager Robert A. Day.

An invitation for the "Los Angeles Kick Off" notes that the maximum individual donation for an election is $2,300, but supporters can be named co-chair and "national founder" by agreeing to raise $250,000 for the event.

Big Calif. Names On McCain's Campaign Finance Team (LAT)

By Dan Morain

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) unveiled a presidential campaign finance committee Wednesday dominated by Californians and New Yorkers, including some of the biggest donors to Gov. Arnold Schwarze-negger and President Bush.

McCain's 13 national finance committee co-chairmen include five Californians: Orange County billionaire Donald Bren; investor George Argyros; Univision Chairman A. Jerrold Perenchio; Cisco Systems Chief Executive John Chambers; and San Francisco venture capitalist J. Gary Shansby.

Altogether, McCain named 70 Californians, 68 of them men, to his finance team. They will be expected to raise $100,000 or more for the campaign.

"I'd be very disappointed if I didn't raise over $2 million," said Shansby, former chairman of Shaklee Corp., who helps runs an investment fund.

The California list includes executives in the entertainment, investment, banking, telecommunications, real estate, gambling and alcohol industries, and current and retired politicians.

Though McCain hasn't officially announced his candidacy, he said in a taping of the "Late Show With David Letterman" on Wednesday that he was running and would "announce" it in April.

The release of his finance committee is aimed at showing other candidates the depth of his support and convincing donors that he is the front-runner.

Perenchio is one of at least eight Californians on McCain's list identified as a Bush "pioneer," meaning he raised in excess of $100,000 for the president's campaigns.

Perenchio is Schwarzenegger's largest single donor, at $4.8 million. McCain also tapped Schwarzenegger's lead fundraiser, Marty Wilson, as part of his California finance committee.

Argyros, Bush's first ambassador to Spain, has spent more than $960,000 on federal campaigns since 1997, including $200,000 to Bush's 2005 inaugural.

Chambers has given more than $1 million to federal campaigns since 1997, and his company has accounted for $1.6 million during the last four years.

Bren and his wife, Brigitte, have given $267,000 to federal campaigns since 2003. Bren's Irvine Co. has accounted for $250,000 to Schwarzenegger.

Shansby has been a relatively small federal donor in the last decade, giving $35,000, Federal Election Commission records show. But as managing director and chairman of TSG Consumer Partners, a San Francisco-based fund that invests in consumer products, he has the potential to raise significant sums.

McCain Rejects CPAC Invite (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow, The Washington Times

Sen. John McCain is the only major Republican presidential candidate who will not address the nation's premier gathering of conservatives this year.

Sponsors of the Conservative Political Action Conference, which begins today in Washington and brings together thousands of conservative leaders and grass-roots activists, say the Arizona Republican has "dissed" organizers by attempting to schedule a private reception for attendees after rejecting invitations to speak at the event.

"It was a classical McCain move, dissing us by going behind our backs," said William J. Lauderback, executive vice president of the American Conservative Union.

Convening through Saturday at a sold-out Omni Shoreham Hotel, the 34th annual CPAC will feature personal appearances and nationally televised speeches by every Republican presidential hopeful except Mr. McCain, said David A. Keene, chairman of the ACU, which, along with Young America's Foundation and Human Events, is a principal sponsor of CPAC.

Conservative activists have speculated that Mr. McCain did not want to be seen on television "pandering" to Republican "right-wingers" but wanted to court those same activists at a reception in the same hotel.

"He turned down repeated CPAC offers to speak but then tried to get around us by having his office call the hotel to rent a room for a reception for CPAC attendees -- without first seeking approval of CPAC organizers," said Mr. Lauderback.

By contrast, he said, other Republican presidential aspirants have called ACU to seek permission to hold receptions at the hotel during CPAC. Each of those candidates -- including Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney -- "called us a long time ago to arrange for a hospitality reception he will give for CPAC attendees," Mr. Lauderback said.

"We would have still allowed McCain to do something at CPAC, but by the time his folks approached the hotel, everything was in concrete and there was no facility available for what he wanted," Mr. Keene said.

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, a possible contender who is considered his party's one-man think tank, and Vice President Dick Cheney, still a crowd favorite for the conservative faithful, will also address the conference.

When an attempt was made to ask why Mr. McCain declined to address CPAC, top campaign advisers John Weaver and Terry Nelson were said to be "unreachable."

But a spokesman for Mr. McCain -- who is running an average of 13 percentage points behind former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani in the latest national polls -- said the candidate's conservative credentials are well-known.

"The senator has run, been elected and served as a conservative and looks forward to talking about his conservative record throughout the course of this campaign," said Brian Jones, communications director for the McCain campaign.

CPAC has been considered a key event for conservative candidates since the Reagan era.

"Reagan attended every CPAC from the first one in 1974 -- when he gave his famous 'City Upon a Hill' speech -- until his last year in office in 1988," said Craig Shirley, a longtime Republican activist and Reagan historian. "The exceptions were 1976 and 1980, when he was campaigning in New Hampshire for the GOP nomination."

Mr. Shirley recalled that at "the very first CPAC, Reagan brought as his guest a young, severely wounded Navy pilot who had been a POW in Hanoi: John McCain III."

Organizers say they expect more than 5,000 people -- including busloads of college students from across the country -- at what is being billed as the largest CPAC ever. This year's conference features 36 panel discussions (twice the number as last year) in two ballrooms over three days, and more than 40 private receptions held by candidates and advocacy groups.

CPAC attendees "are the people who knock on doors for candidates they support and make up the core of the ground troops on whom any candidate has to rely," Mr. Keene said. "By simply dismissing them, as Senator McCain has done, he is telling them more about himself than perhaps he wants them to know."

Mr. McCain's conservative supporters, from Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty to veteran conservative consultants such as Becky Donatelli, have told friends that they tried hard to get the senator to accept the invitation to speak at CPAC.

"It makes no sense," Mr. Lauderback said. "McCain alienates the left by calling for the repeal of the Roe v. Wade decision ... but he then alienates the right by dissing their organizations -- refusing to speak at the recent National Review conference, the House Republican Study Committee retreat and now CPAC."

Mr. Shirley said skipping CPAC is a mistake for any Republican candidate.

"Any GOP politician who doesn't understand this and the importance of this conference doesn't understand conservatism," he said.

Some candidates who originally hesitated about attending CPAC, including Mr. Giuliani, changed their minds. He is scheduled to be introduced by commentator George F. Will for a noon speech on Friday.

Nevertheless, Mr. Keene said he thought Mr. McCain would have been warmly welcomed at CPAC.

"Most conservatives disagree with his positions on a number of issues like campaign-finance reform, gun-show loopholes, taxes and global warming," said Mr. Keene. "But many like his stand on earmarks and his support of President Bush on Iraq and almost all respect the sacrifices he made for his country during the Vietnam era."

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

New York-based political consultant Kieran Mahoney's survey of probable Republican participants in the 2008 Iowa presidential caucuses showed this support for the "big three" candidates: John McCain, 20.5 percent; Rudy Giuliani, 16.3 percent; Mitt Romney, 3.5 percent. Astonishingly, they all trailed James Gilmore, the former governor of Virginia, who had 31 percent.

How could that be? Because it was not a legitimate survey but a "push poll," normally a clandestine effort to rig the results by telling respondents negative things about some of the candidates. But Mahoney makes no secret that the voters he sampled were told of liberal deviations by McCain, Giuliani and Romney, as well as true-blue conservatism by Gilmore, who is Mahoney's client.

Mahoney is trying to prove a point widely accepted in Republican ranks. None of the three front-line candidates is a natural fit for the nation's right-of-center party. Without question, there is a void. The question is whether Gilmore or anyone else can fill it.

The most commonly mentioned potential void-filler is not Gilmore but Newt Gingrich. A straw poll by the right-wing organization Citizens United of its political contributors showed Gingrich leading with 31 percent (followed by Giuliani at 25 percent, Romney at 10 percent and McCain at 8 percent). But based on his actions as speaker of the House, Gingrich's conservative record is far from flawless.

Mahoney did not include Gingrich in his poll of Iowa Republicans likely to vote in next year's caucuses. His survey first showed McCain leading with 33 percent, followed by Giuliani at 31.5 percent and Romney at 8.8 percent (and the unknown Gilmore at 1.3 percent). Seventy percent of those polled described themselves as conservative, and 68 percent said they were pro-life; they also gave President Bush an astounding 76 percent favorable rating.

The poll-takers then "pushed" -- providing information about the front-runners that could alienate conservatives. McCain was said to have opposed tax cuts, favored "amnesty" for illegal immigrants and opposed a ban on same-sex marriage. Romney: "refused to ban" abortion in Massachusetts, committed to "full equality" for gays and lesbians, put health care in the hands of bureaucrats. Giuliani: supported Democratic Gov. Mario Cuomo's reelection in New York, is pro-gay rights and pro-choice, supports gun control.

That information dropped Giuliani by nine percentage points, to 22.3 percent, and Romney by five points, to 3.8 percent. McCain rose two points, to 35.3 percent. Gilmore remained at 1.3 percent.

Then the pushers described Gilmore as a tax-cutting, jobs-creating governor of Virginia, the head of a congressionally appointed commission on terrorism, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee and a National Rifle Association member who opposes gun control. With that buildup, Gilmore finished first, well ahead of the field.

That suggests at least the theoretical success of a campaign to knock down the conservative credentials of the big three and build up Gilmore's. "I have the best track record of any of the candidates," Gilmore told me, adding that McCain and Giuliani are "not conservative" while Romney was a "liberal governor of Massachusetts."

With Gilmore a latecomer to the presidential fundraising game, it is doubtful he could find sufficient money to tear down his opponents and build up himself nationally, or even in Iowa. But he will have plenty of help.

At the Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC), which is attracting right-wingers from across the nation to Washington this weekend, Citizens United will distribute a 23-page attack on McCain. "He's no Ronald Reagan," it begins, and concludes: "John McCain is not a conservative." (McCain is the only announced Republican presidential hopeful not scheduled to speak at CPAC.) Simultaneously, McCain operatives are putting out material that depicts Giuliani riding into City Hall on the shoulders of the New York Liberal Party as a throwback to the old Tammany Hall Democratic machine.

It is hardly too late for such negative campaigning to bring down Republican front-runners because of inadequate conservative credentials. At this point in the 2000 election cycle, Bush was far in front with about 45 percent in the polls, with Elizabeth Dole second at 29 percent. McCain was at a mere 3 percent, behind Dan Quayle and Steve Forbes, before making the run that nearly won the nomination. The GOP race for 2008 may still be open, considering the conservative void.

Obama Wants To Change Security Funding (WP/AP)

By Nedra Pickler

WASHINGTON -- Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama wants to change the government's formula for giving states money for homeland security, with the early voting states getting a little extra.

Obama wants states that have a bigger risk from the terrorist threat to get more of federal homeland security dollars _ also a recommendation from the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks. That's an unpopular idea among lawmakers from smaller states who would lose funding on the switch.

Currently, each state gets at least a .75 percent share of the roughly $900 million in the state homeland security grant program. The Senate bill would lower that to .45 percent, and Obama, the Illinois senator, is offering an amendment that would cut it to .25 percent. His office said it expects the Senate to consider the measure next week.

But states with big political influence need not worry that they will get short shrift from the candidate's amendment.

The biggest benefactors would be Obama's Illinois and other heavily populated states, including White House rival Hillary Rodham Clinton's New York, which would each get more than $1 million in extra funding under Obama's plan versus another Senate proposal. Clinton and other members of the New York congressional delegation have been trying to change the formula for years.

"Every state gets two votes in the Senate so we're facing the challenge of convincing people they should give up what they think is their rightful claim on some of this money to do what the 9/11 commission and everybody who has studied it has said, which is have the money follow the risk," Clinton said Wednesday.

But even though they have much smaller populations, the leadoff Democratic primary states of Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina would not be harmed under Obama's plan. Iowa would get an additional $119,824; Nevada would get $86,222 more; and South Carolina would receive $175,027 extra.

Obama spokesman Ben LaBolt points out that Obama doesn't determine which states have higher risk and therefore would get more money. Those calculations are made by the Department of Homeland Security, which won't reveal its methods or say just what makes Iowa more vulnerable than, say, New Hampshire.

New Hampshire would have had a drop in funding if Obama's proposal was simply based on risk. But Obama has a provision to ensure that states with an international border would stay at the .45 percent minimum, and New Hampshire's 58-mile dividing line with Canada qualifies it to keep the same amount that it would get in the current Senate bill.

In all, 34 states would get more money under Obama's amendment. That comes largely at the expense of eight smaller population states and the District of Columbia, which would lose more than $1.8 million each under the formula.

Black Voters Help Obama Gain Ground On Clinton (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

WASHINGTON

Sen. Barack Obama's dramatic rise in support among African-Americans signals a shift in the race for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination that is larger than just the black vote. Overall, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is still on top, but her lead is shrinking. And polls show Senator Obama of Illinois has more room for growth than she does, because of her high negatives.

In short, if Senator Clinton of New York thought the primaries would result in her coronation as the Democratic nominee, she should think again.

"We have a real horserace," says John Zogby, an independent pollster whose latest data show that Obama leads Clinton among black Democratic voters 36 percent to 27 percent.

A Washington Post/ABC News poll released Tuesday showed a similar trend: Obama leads Clinton among black Democratic voters 44 to 30. In both December and January, the Post/ABC poll had Clinton beating Obama among African-Americans 60 to 20. Overall, the latest Post/ABC poll shows Clinton beating Obama 36 to 24, down from a 41-17 split in January. The Post attributes the gains of Obama, who is black, to his rise in support among African-Americans.

Of course, it's early; the first caucuses and primaries are almost 11 months away. But Obama has the momentum and buzz, and is drawing phenomenal crowds. Last Friday, 20,000 people came to see him speak in Austin, Texas. Between 15,000 and 17,000 people showed up in frigid temperatures for his announcement speech Feb. 10 in Springfield, Ill.

Analysts say Obama's bounce in the polls is due in part to his formal announcement, which has led growing numbers of voters to tune in to who he is and what he is saying. But, says Mr. Zogby, Clinton is losing some of her luster for other reasons: First is her refusal to apologize for her vote in 2002 that gave President Bush a green light to launch the Iraq war. Democratic activists – those most likely to show up in primaries and caucuses – are more in sync with Obama, who has opposed the war from the beginning.

Second, Clinton faces questions about electability in the general election. Obama also faces such questions, but there is firmer opposition to her candidacy in the electorate than there is against Obama.

"Her third problem is that she has the misfortune of running against Jack and Bobby in one year," says Zogby, referring to President Kennedy and his brother Bobby, in a loose comparison to Obama and the third top contender in the Democratic race, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina. "They are not to be taken lightly at all. As we see, Barack in particular right now is cutting into a very solid Clinton constituency."

Indeed, the Clinton camp had been counting on holding onto the rock-solid support among African-Americans for Clinton's husband, former President Bill Clinton. Initially, some blacks had expressed reservations about supporting Obama, citing concerns about his own electability in a country with persistent racial issues.

But in dramatic fashion, some black Democrats are now changing their allegiance. In the primaries, the black vote is crucial: Nationwide, one-fourth of primary voters are black, and in some of the early primary states, that number rises much higher. The very first nominating states – Iowa and New Hampshire – have few minority voters, but in South Carolina, the second state to hold a primary, the Democratic electorate is 47 percent black. Many other states are considering holding their primaries early, and the African-American vote could be key in those as well.

"New York, Illinois, and New Jersey are all talking about moving up, and they all have significant black populations," says David Bositis, an expert on the black vote at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies in Washington.

Then there's the Edwards factor. Former Senator Edwards drew strong support in South Carolina when he ran for president four years ago, and could cause problems for Clinton and Obama in 2008. In this cycle, Edwards has carved out strong support in particular among union members and the working class.

In a way, Edwards could save Clinton from a head-to-head matchup against Obama. In a three-way nomination race, Clinton may well successfully divide and conquer the other two. But if it's head to head against Obama, Clinton may find that her advantage in political experience and organization is not enough. Already, Obama is tapping into the big Democratic money centers – Hollywood and New York – that Clinton may have assumed that she would rule. Obama is also beating Clinton with the youth vote – a constituency notorious for low turnout, but the Iraq war may keep turnout higher than usual this time.

The next faceoff between Clinton and Obama will come this Sunday, when both appear in Selma, Ala., for the annual bridge-crossing, a major civil-rights commemoration. For a while, the debate around Obama centered on whether he was "black enough," given his biracial heritage. Now, the Clinton camp faces its own "black question" – can the senator hold onto the support of the voters who showed unfailing devotion to her husband?

There is an irresistible quality to the story about Al Gore's energy-hungry Tennessee home, replete with a heated poolhouse that burns more natural gas -- $500 a month worth -- than most of us can afford to use while heating houses that shelter people, as opposed to swimming lanes. Did you know that Mr. Gore's house uses more electricity in a month than the average household does in a year?

The climate-change activist and former vice president insists, through a spokesperson, that this is not as simple as it sounds. The Oscar winner has a clear conscience because he makes sure he pays a premium for electricity from "renewable" sources and claims that he purchases "carbon offsets" to make up for his rampant energy use.

To "do the carbon offset," as his spokesperson put it, is to fund projects elsewhere that may reduce the total carbon dioxide emitted into the atmosphere. So, one might burn up hundreds of dollars worth of natural gas to keep one's poolhouse toasty, but then do penance for this carbon sin by paying someone else to put up solar panels. Drew Johnson of the Tennessee Center for Policy Research, the think tank that broke the story, called these offsets a way of "buying his way out of his guilt."

We don't begrudge Mr. Gore his Tennessee spread or his pool, but his energetic energy use does underscore the complicated nature of modern economic life and the real costs of "doing something" about global warming. The pleasures of affluence take energy, whether they be relaxing in a hot tub after a long day of predicting the end of the Greenland ice sheet, or flying in a private jet to talk political strategy with Leo DiCaprio. You never know where you're going to leave your next carbon footprint.

Mr. Gore is rich and fortunate enough to be able to afford the "carbon offset" for his energy indulgences. The middle-class parents who need a gas-guzzling SUV to haul the kids to soccer practice might not be so lucky. They might even settle for an unheated pool.

By Ralph Blumenthal

AUSTIN, Tex., Feb. 28 — Gov. Rick Perry removed the chairman of the Texas Youth Commission on Wednesday over charges that the agency covered up the sexual abuse of incarcerated juveniles.

Mr. Perry also called for the ouster of the acting executive director, the appointment of an independent inspector general and a shake-up throughout the commission, which runs 13 schools housing 3,000 felons under age 21.

Late Wednesday, the State Senate voted unanimously to demand that the governor appoint a conservator to take over the commission temporarily.

On Tuesday, the Senate Criminal Justice Committee disclosed details of long-secret investigations by the commission and the Texas Rangers showing that two supervisors at the West Texas State School in remote Pyote routinely roused boys from their beds for sexual encounters that were reported but went unpunished by the school superintendent, who now has a top leadership position at the commission. The supervisors were allowed to resign without facing criminal charges, but are now under investigation.

The dismissed chairman, Pete C. Alfaro, is a former mayor of Baytown who was first named to the commission in 1995 by Gov. George W. Bush and was appointed chairman by Mr. Perry in 2004. Mr. Alfaro did not respond to messages seeking comment. His latest five-year term expires in August.

Hours after the governor’s spokesman said that Mr. Alfaro had been told by phone that he was being replaced by his vice chairman, Donald R. Bethel, a spokesman for the Texas Youth Commission, Tim Savoy, said the agency had received no notice of the action. The board has a meeting scheduled for Tuesday.

Mr. Perry, a Republican, also called on the board to replace the acting executive director, Neil Nichols, who is the general counsel and a 33-year veteran of the agency. Mr. Nichols took over last Friday upon the sudden retirement of the executive director, Dwight Harris, who started as a caseworker in 1981.

The governor said Ed Owens, deputy executive director of the Texas Department of Criminal Justice, had agreed to serve as the commission's acting executive director.

Though the governor makes appointments to the seven-member board, he has the power by himself only to remove the chairman, legal experts said. He can fire members upon a finding of gross fiscal mismanagement by a legislative audit committee made up of the lieutenant governor, who is the president of the Senate; the House speaker; and two other members from each chamber.

Senator John Whitmire, a Houston Democrat and chairman of the Criminal Justice Committee, said Wednesday that he had "no confidence in the board" but that Mr. Perry was not yet ready to seek its ouster.

The Myth Of The Middle (WP)

By Alan Abramowitz And Bill Bishop

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

The story of 2006 was that regular Americans were sick of partisan divisions in Washington. The vast and consensus-hungry middle asserted itself in November, the narrative went, finally ordering the parties and their childish politicians to stop fighting and to work together.

After the vote, bipartisanship was all the buzz, and moderation the wave of the future. But something happened on the way to the evening campfire and s'mores. House Republicans started complaining about Democrats riding roughshod into the majority, refusing to consider their amendments to legislation. President Bush announced that he wasn't going to let the opposition of congressional Democrats stop him from sending 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq. Meanwhile, Democratic leaders trashed most of Bush's domestic policy proposals as soon as they were announced in his State of the Union address.

One explanation for all this is that politicians are acting against the will of their compromise-loving constituents. Another is that Republicans and Democrats are simply being good representatives. We think the evidence supports the second interpretation.

The Cooperative Congressional Election Study (CCES) surveyed more than 24,000 Americans who voted in 2006. The Internet-based survey compiled by researchers at 30 universities produced a sample that almost perfectly matched the national House election results: 54 percent of the respondents reported voting for a Democrat, while 46 percent said they voted for a Republican. The demographic characteristics of the voters surveyed also closely matched those in the 2006 national exit poll. If anything, the CCES respondents claimed they were more "independent" than those in the exit poll.

The CCES survey asked about 14 national issues: the war in Iraq (the invasion and the troops), abortion (and partial birth abortion), stem cell research, global warming, health insurance, immigration, the minimum wage, liberalism and conservatism, same-sex marriage, privatizing Social Security, affirmative action, and capital gains taxes. Not surprisingly, some of the largest differences between Democrats and Republicans were over the Iraq war. Fully 85 percent of those who voted for Democratic House candidates felt that it had been a mistake to invade Iraq, compared with only 18 percent of voters who cast ballots for Republicans.

But the divisions between the parties weren't limited to Iraq. They extended to every issue in the survey. For example, 69 percent of Democratic voters chose the most strongly pro-choice position on the issue of abortion, compared with 20 percent of Republican voters; only 16 percent of Democratic voters supported a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage, while 80 percent of Republican voters did; and 91 percent of Democratic voters favored governmental action to reduce global warming, compared with 27 percent of Republican voters.

When we combined voters' answers to the 14 issue questions to form a liberal-conservative scale (answers were divided into five equivalent categories based on overall liberalism vs. conservatism), 86 percent of Democratic voters were on the liberal side of the scale while 80 percent of Republican voters were on the conservative side. Only 10 percent of all voters were in the center. The visual representation of the nation's voters isn't a nicely shaped bell, with most voters in the moderate middle. It's a sharp V.

The evidence from this survey isn't surprising; nor are the findings new. For the past three decades, the major parties and the electorate have grown more divided -- in what they think, where they live and how they vote. It may be comforting to believe our problems could be solved if only those vile politicians in Washington would learn to get along. The source of the country's division, however, is nestled much closer to home.

Alan Abramowitz is a political science professor at Emory University. Bill Bishop is a journalist in Austin who is writing a book on political segregation.

Schwarzenegger's 'Post-Partisanship' Is Model For D.C. (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, March 1, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — It used to be said that every American social, political and fashion trend started in California. Let's hope that's true again with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's concept of "post-partisanship."

The idea doesn't have to sweep the nation like Hula-Hoops or counter-culturalism. It just has to take hold in Washington, D.C.

As Schwarzenegger declared in his second inaugural address on Jan. 5, "we have the opportunity to move past partisanship, past bi-partisanship to post-partisanship.

"[It] is Republicans and Democrats actively giving birth to new ideas together. I believe it would promote a new centrism and a new trust in our political system," he said.

Having stopped calling Democratic legislators "girlie men" and having dramatically turned around his political fortunes after an epic ballot-initiative defeat in 2005, Schwarzenegger was triumphantly re-elected in 2006 with nearly 60 percent of the vote.

In this bright-blue state, he carried 93 percent of the Republican vote, 22 percent of the Democratic and 59 percent of the independent vote against liberal former state Treasurer Phil Angelides.

Now, Schwarzenegger is in the process of trying to put post-partisanship to work to achieve environmental cleanup, road and prison construction — and, most creatively, a mandatory health insurance plan to cover all Californians, including illegal immigrants.

But beyond that, whether it's called post-partisanship or just old-fashioned bipartisanship, what Schwarzenegger is selling philosophically is what every poll indicates the public wants — an end to partisan combat and attention to problem solving.

In fact, there is evidence that some people in Washington have caught the mood. Last week, 10 Senators — five of each party, including some pretty conservative Republicans — called on President Bush to begin working on health care reform that would "ensure that all Americans have affordable, quality private health coverage."

The organizer of the letter was Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), author of another mandatory insurance plan that is actually more radical than Schwarzenegger's.

Wyden proposes to detach health coverage from private employment and make individuals responsible for buying their own insurance, with tax breaks from the government and subsidies for low-income persons.

Bush administration officials say they are encouraged by some aspects of the plan — especially tax reform similarities to Bush's own proposal — and they were impressed by the 10 Senators' letter, especially participation by conservative Republicans Jim DeMint (S.C.), Bob Bennett (Utah), Trent Lott (Miss.), Mike Crapo (Idaho) and John Thune (S.D.).

However, Wyden told me in an interview that the administration is balking at the idea of universal coverage. He cited a Bush speech last week in Tennessee, in which the president said "We need to make sure that ... quality care is given to as many Americans as possible."

"That will not be acceptable to Senate Democrats," Wyden said. "You've got to be for covering everybody because if you don't cover everybody, you will constantly have cost-shifting," whereby providers charge those who have insurance to cover the costs of treating those who don't.

Wyden's demand that Bush publicly support universal coverage is akin to some of his colleagues' requirement that he agree to consider raising taxes as a prelude to negotiations about America's long-term fiscal woes. Everybody's got a precondition for talks, so there are no talks.

He confessed that "in 2003, I contributed to the polarization. I tried to push through some initiatives the wrong way — us-versus-them. I'm not a person to get all introspective about my failures, but I do know when something doesn't work. Dividing people does not work."

"Division," he said, "is what Washington has come to represent." After an initial flurry of bipartisan talk after the 2006 elections, he said, "It doesn't look as though anything has changed here in Washington."

"All this energy spent on bitterness, all this effort spent on maneuvering — imagine if that same energy were put into working together to build a consensus. The wings of each party say, 'but we have our principles!' Why is being principled reserved for extremists?

"The left and right don't have a monopoly on conscience. We should not let them get away with that. You can be centrist and be principled. ... What is more principled than giving up some part of your position to advance the greater good of the people?"

It's sad that the Constitution prevents the Austrian-born Schwarzenegger from running for president. But we'd all be better off if politicians in Washington would follow his lead. And, as the California election returns last year indicate, so would they.

HUD Study Of Homeless Quantifies The Problem (WP)

By Bill Brubaker

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

An estimated 754,000 people -- most of them minorities -- are homeless on any given night in the United States, according to a government survey presented to Congress yesterday.

The Department of Housing and Urban Development based its estimate on the number of people who lived in shelters and on the streets on a single night in January 2005.

The report made it clear there are more homeless people in the nation than beds in shelters and transitional housing.

In early 2005, there were 438,300 beds in such sites, the report said. However, HUD said there are an additional 209,000 beds in permanent houses for formerly homeless people.

HUD Secretary Alphonso Jackson trumpeted the study -- the first of its kind by the agency -- as a "huge leap forward in our understanding of not only how many people are homeless but also what their needs are."

Jackson called this report"a powerful tool to help all of us at the federal, state and local level design more effective responses to homelessness and better help those who are living in shelters and on our streets."

Michael Stoops, acting director of the National Coalition for the Homeless, criticized the government for "spending more time on counting homeless people than finding housing for them."

"But we hope these figures will make Americans aware we are not doing as much as we can for homeless people," Stoops said in an interview.

The HUD survey of 80 areas also reported that 704,000 people used emergency shelters or transitional housing between February and April 2005.

About 65 percent of these people were men, and 19 percent were military veterans. Fifty-nine percent of those surveyed were racial minorities; 45 percent were black. A third of the people who sought shelter during that three-month period had families with children, and a quarter had a disabilities.

Bush's Ex-Campaign Manager To Give Firms Political Advice (WSJ)

By John Harwood And Brody Mullins

Ken Mehlman, most recently chairman of the Republican National Committee, is setting out to advise U.S. businesses on coping with political winds shifting against his party. And the challenges he sees looming are hardly touchstones of the Bush political agenda.

"We are moving toward universal access to health care," Mr. Mehlman says. To respond to climate change, he adds, there will be "increased scrutiny of the emission of carbon." And powerful corporations -- as Wal-Mart Stores Inc. has discovered in recent years -- face the threat of Web-based public relations warfare from opponents who need relatively few resources to have an impact.

Moving to the Washington law firm of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld LLP, Mr. Mehlman becomes the latest political figure to enter a niche in the capital's influence business. Instead of traditional lobbying centered on relationships with officeholders, many former officials pursue careers counseling business about political trends and helping them meet challenges with quasipolitical campaigns that blend strategic advice, public relations and mobilization of targeted constituencies.

A Harvard-trained lawyer who practiced at Akin Gump previously, Mr. Mehlman plans to provide "political intelligence" to hedge funds trying to gauge developments in their investment strategies. In private equity, he cites as a model the decision by buyout firms to pledge cancellation of some pending coal-fired power plants to win environmentalists' support for their purchase of TXU Corp. in Texas.

"What you want are people who are creative at building coalitions...in a bipartisan way at the nexus of business and politics," he says.

In 2004, Mr. Mehlman earned plaudits for mobilizing fellow Republicans with sophisticated "microtargeting." But even some allies lament Bush-era failures to deliver on the president's 2000 pledge to be "a uniter, not a divider."

One of the city's largest law-and-lobbying firms, Akin Gump boasts such prominent Democrats as Robert Strauss, the firm's co-founder and later chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and Vernon Jordan, a close adviser to President Clinton. After Republicans won control of Congress in 1994, Akin Gump diversified by adding prominent Republicans.

Mr. Mehlman has a longstanding relationship with his Harvard Law classmate Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill.). Having left the Republicans' employ, he embraces a change in what many see as Washington's Bush-era culture of ferocity.

"How do we get back to the time when you argued during the day and had a beer after work?" Mr. Mehlman says. "That's something I look forward to -- particularly if someone else is paying."

Iran To Join Iraq Talks In Highest Contact With U.S. In 2 Years (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

BAGHDAD, Feb. 28 — The top Iranian national security official, Ali Larijani, indicated Wednesday that Iranian officials would take part in a regional security conference on Iraq, setting the stage for the highest-level contact between American and Iranian officials in more than two years.

A day after the Bush administration said it had agreed to such talks, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq announced Wednesday that the first stage of the conference would be held March 10 in Baghdad, the capital. The agenda will be how to rescue Iraq from a civil war that claimed about two dozen more lives on Wednesday, and that is likely to require the American military to maintain a greatly enlarged force in Baghdad until at least fall, a top United States commander said.

In the deadliest attack on Wednesday, a car bomb exploded in a marketplace in the Bayaa district of Baghdad, killing 10 people and wounding 27 others, officials from the Interior Ministry and Yarmouk Hospital said. In central Baghdad, two Iraqi policemen died when a suicide bomber struck the entrance to the Bab al-Sheik police station.

Also on Wednesday the American military command said a soldier was killed by small-arms fire in an unspecified western district of Baghdad on Tuesday while on patrol with the Iraqi national police.

North of the capital in Diyala Province, where Sunni Arab insurgents and foreign fighters have been waging a deadly struggle for control against Shiite militias and death squads, two brothers of a prominent Sunni Arab member of the Iraqi national Parliament, Dr. Salim Abdullah, were shot to death on Wednesday, security officials there said.

Also on Wednesday, mortar attacks killed at least six people and wounded 14 in Shurta, a neighborhood in western Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said. Other mortar barrages have killed at least four people in the past two days near Iskandariya, a town south of Baghdad, the local police said.

In Salahuddin Province north of Baghdad, two Iraqi policemen were killed in a drive-by shooting near Baiji. Farther north, in Mosul, a police colonel and his driver were shot dead in their car.

Two weeks have passed since American forces began large-scale operations as part of the Baghdad security plan. Iraqi officials have called the plan a success, but American commanders are much more measured. Some American officers have said they believe many death squad and militia leaders fled the capital to avoid stepped up American patrols and will return once the Baghdad security plan is completed.

The plan, which calls for 17,000 additional troops in Baghdad, will continue until at least this fall, the second-ranking commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, told CNN on Wednesday.

“I don’t want to put an exact time on it, but a minimum of six to nine months,” General Odierno said. He also said that Sunni militants were responsible for about 70 percent of the attacks on American troops.

The willingness of American officials to attend the March 10 security conference with Syrian and Iranian officials has been widely seen as reflecting a decision by the Bush administration to yield to critics who have argued that it should no longer avoid high-level contacts with Tehran.

Mr. Larijani, in a statement translated into English on the official Iranian news agency Web site, said that the Iranian foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, had received a formal invitation from his Iraqi counterpart, Hoshyar Zebari.

“We will participate in the conference of Iraqi neighboring states in Baghdad in March, if it will be of help to Baghdad,” Mr. Larijani said. “We will carry out everything necessary to advance Iraqi interests. Iraqi leaders have a great potential for administering the country’s affairs.”

Iraqi officials have also said that Syria has agreed to attend.

Iran Agrees To Take Part In Iraq Security Conference (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Gareth Smyth

Iran's top security official, Ali Larijani, indicated yesterday that Tehran would take part in a Baghdad conference this month on Iraq's future, but the White House insisted that the meeting would not be an occasion for bilateral talks between the US and Iran.

Iraq's prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, has invited all Iraq's neighbours as well as Egypt, the five permanent members of the UN Security Council, the Arab League and the Organisation of the Islamic Conference. Iraqi television reported last night that the conference would take place on March 10.

"We hope the meeting will bring political backing for the national unity government in providing security and stability that will help national reconciliation in Iraq," his office said.

Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, said on Tuesday the conference, to be attended by ambassadors and senior officials, was to be followed by a meeting at foreign minister level in April, outside Iraq.

The State Department spokesman Sean McCormack raised the possibility that Ms Rice would meet directly with Manouchehr Mottaki, her Iranian counterpart, but not to discuss the nuclear issue. However just hours later Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, ruled out any bilateral talks between the US and Iran and the US and Syria.

While the State Department was signalling a possible shift in policy, the White House was eager to insist that US policy had not changed and that the conditions for talks with Iran had not changed - the suspension of its nuclear fuel development programme.

This week the US is drafting a second UN Security Council resolution that would tighten sanctions on Iran over its nuclear programme.

Iran has rejected accusations by the US that it is arming and equipping Shia militia in Iraq and providing explosives used against US forces. In an interview in January, Ms Rice did not rule out the option of meetings over Iraq in an international context but fretted that Iran would raise the nuclear issue and Syria that of Lebanon.

"Of course the only reason to talk to us would be to extract a price. And that's not diplomacy, that's extortion," she told Der Spiegel in Berlin.

Iran and the US last held a high-level bilateral meeting in Geneva in May 2003. Egypt tried to move the process forward at a conference on Iraq in November 2004 by seating Colin Powell, the secretary of state, next to Iran's Kamal Kharrazi. But neither had the green light from their capitals and little more than polite small talk came out of it.

Mr Larijani said Tehran's participation in the Baghdad conference would be designed to help the Iraqi government.

"We will carry out everything necessary to advance Iraqi interests. Iraqi leaders have a great potential for administering the country's affairs," he told reporters.

Asked if Tehran ran any risks in meeting the Americans, Mr Larijani replied: "One should not commit suicide because one is afraid of death."

Diplomats in Washington said widely held concerns that the US and Iran were stumbling towards conflict, whether over Iraq or the nuclear dispute, had driven the Bush administration to try to calm the situation.

Cliff Kupchan, analyst with the Eurasia Group consultancy, said it was possible the meetings would lead to broader discussions, including the nuclear issue.

Iraq Neighbors Agree To Security Summit (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-Zahra And Edith M. Lederer

Iraq's neighbors including Iran and Syria have agreed to join U.S. and British representatives to discuss the Iraqi security crisis at a regional conference March 10 in Baghdad, the government said Wednesday.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said he will be issuing formal invitations shortly to the neighboring countries and the five permanent U.N. Security Council members — the U.S., Britain, France, Russia and China — to send deputy foreign ministers or senior officials to the conference.

Zebari, in a telephone interview with The Associated Press from Sweden, said the Iranians agreed to participate in a meeting with the other neighbors but "they have some questions" about a separate session that would be held the same day with the five permanent council members.

His words seemed to indicate that Iran was at least partly unhappy with the arrangements for the conference, and weighing the extent of its own participation.

Iran has had little public comment on the conference so far. But in the past, Iranian leaders have been vocal in accusing the United States of trying to use the U.N. as a way to "gang up" on it, and the presence of the key Security Council countries at the Iraq conference might give Iran pause.

For their part, Sunni Arab countries like Egypt still hold grave concerns about the direction taken by Iraq's Shiite-led government, raising concerns the conference will make little headway on key issues like security.

Iraq's relations with its Arab neighbors have been rocky because of fears that the Shiite-led government is falling under Iran's influence. Originally, the Iraqi government had been reluctant to endorse the regional conference, fearing pressure from Sunni-dominated regimes, but it dropped those objections last year so long as the gathering was held on Iraqi soil.

Two Arab diplomats in Cairo said Wednesday that the U.S. recently increased pressure on some Arab governments to press them to attend the conference, after they initially had turned down invitations from the Iraqi government. They spoke on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity.

The March conference got a big boost Tuesday when Washington said it would attend, leading to the possibility it could discuss Iraq's security with adversaries Syria and Iran.

The Bush administration had waited to embrace the idea until Iraq made progress on a deal governing national distribution of oil revenue. The difficulty in getting such a deal is symbolic of Iraq's regional, factional and political divisions, and the deal was seen by the United States as a key marker of the government's will to work across divides.

"They thought the timing was right for them to hold the conference, and so we encouraged them to move forward with it," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Wednesday.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon is sending the U.N. envoy in Iraq, Ashraf Qazi, to attend the conference as an observer, U.N. spokeswoman Michele Montas said.

"The secretary-general hopes that the participants in the preparatory meeting will focus on urgently needed steps to reduce violence in Iraq and help stabilize the situation in the region," Montas said.

Iraqi Deputy Foreign Minister Labid Abawi said the United States, Britain, China, Saudi Arabia and Iran said they will attend.

"The conference will be important. It will prove that Iraq is politically capable of holding such a conference. It will send a message to the world," said Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's adviser, Sami al-Askari.

Syria and Egypt confirmed separately they would attend, but there was no immediate comment from Jordan or Saudi Arabia. Bahrain, Turkey and Kuwait were also invited, along with the Arab League and the Organization of the Islamic Conference.

Arab countries had been reluctant to accept an invitation previously, because of Iraqi security issues as well as their hesitancy to be seen as supporting the Baghdad government by attending the gathering there, Arab diplomats said.

Iraq and its neighbors have held nine meetings, Zebari said. At the last meeting, in Tehran in July 2006, Zebari said "I demanded that the next meeting should be in Iraq. ... I told them we are capable, we are confident, we can ensure your security."

Asked about Iran's participation in the conference, a spokesman for Iran's U.N. Mission sidestepped the question:

"We believe if the United States really wants to reach a solution there is hope that they can achieve that," the spokesman said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

Ali Larijani, the head of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, said it was important to involve Iraq's neighbors.

"We believe Iraq's security is related to all its neighboring countries, and they have to help settle the situation," Larijani said.

But Mustafa Alani, an expert in Iraqi affairs at the Gulf Research Center in Dubai, said while the conference will officially focus on Iraq's security, neighboring Sunni Arab countries and the U.S. will use it to convey their disquiet at Iranian influence.

Each side has accused another of being responsible for the spiraling violence in Iraq. The U.S. claims Iran is sending weapons and money to Shiite extremists in Iraq. Iraqi officials, meanwhile, have complained that Syria harbors former Saddam Hussein loyalists and allows weapons and foreign fighters to slip into the country, while Sunni countries believe the fault lies with Iraq's Shiite-led government.

America's New Path On Iraq: Talk To Iran (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

BOSTON

The United States has agreed to do what it once insisted it wouldn't do: Talk directly to Iran about Iraq, without preconditions.

After an initial meeting in two weeks, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plans to sit down in April with the foreign ministers of some 20 countries, including two that the US considers key troublemakers in the region: Iran and Syria.

Though the meeting will be confined to the goal of stabilizing Iraq – not the dispute over Iran's nuclear program – the Bush administration's decision to participate indicates that the days of working from an "our-way-or-the-highway" stance may be over.

Still, the sprawling nature of the regional talks means that understanding what key players want will be crucial to meaningful progress. The key players and their likely goals:

United States

In recent months, US officials have tried to convince the world that Iran is providing explosives and training to militias in Iraq that are attacking US forces. The US also alleges that Syria is failing to prevent Sunni Arab jihadis from crossing its border into Iraq. But most analysts are skeptical that either country plays a crucial role in Iraq's ongoing civil war.

The two countries have also roundly denied the charges, which could set the stage for explosive exchanges across the negotiating table.

Holding the conference reflects an effort to build the Iraqi government's legitimacy in the region. "This initiative is about normalizing the new Iraqi government's relations with the rest of the world," says Patrick Clawson, deputy director of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. "It's part of a process of the government taking on more authority, and part of that is developing better relations with its neighbors."

To be sure, Ms. Rice's announcement does not necessarily mean the administration has wholeheartedly jumped on the "talking with the enemy" bandwagon.

"The administration is still skeptical, but they were not going to be the skunk at the garden party and say we are not going at all," says Jon Alterman, a Middle East expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

Noting that Iraq's neighbors all have an interest in Iraq's stability, Geoffrey Kemp of the Nixon Center in Washington says that the open-to-all talks make sense. The US may be interested in addressing what it sees as Iranian interference, he says, but the Iranians are worried about Iraq-originating Kurdish interference in its territory, while Turkey also is concerned about Kurdish elements.

Mr. Clawson says that such a broad conference is unlikely to be the venue for negotiating specific issues like the flow of Iranian pilgrims or smuggling across the Iranian border. It's more likely that the process will serve to encourage more international assistance for Iraq.

Iran

Iraqi officials say the Iranians have confirmed they will participate, but Ali Larijani, the head of Iran's national security council, said Wednesday that the country would attend if it was "expedient." Analysts say that Iran won't miss the chance to sit down with the US. It remains angry at US allegations that it's running a secret nuclear-weapons program, but America's apparent belief that Iran can help fix the problems of its neighbor opens up the slight possibility of a quid pro quo – less pressure on nukes in exchange for more help on Iraq.

Iran has been making overtures for more bilateral diplomacy for years, but has been consistently rebuffed by the US, which has demanded that Iran meet preconditions like suspending its uranium enrichment program first. The Iranians will see this as a golden opportunity to get the ball rolling to a more normal relationship, analysts say.

"The Iranians have been signaling they want to do this forever," says Bill Beeman, a professor at the University of Minnesota whose recent book, "The Great Satan vs. the Mad Mullahs," explores the two country's tempestuous relationship. "The thing that the Iranians will value above all about this is that they're sitting down in a situation with the US in which the parties are equals," he says. "They get to sit together on an equal playing field without having to kowtow to the US. In the past, "the US has insisted the Iranians somehow have to do penance before the US will talk to them," Beeman says.

Iran will also be seeking to make it clear that its shared interests with Iraq over both oil and the flow of Shiite pilgrims across the border make close relations crucial and inevitable, and that efforts to isolate the two countries could backfire.

Britain

Britain's interests and perspectives on Iraq are roughly aligned with America's, but it has been much more open to diplomacy with Iraq's neighbors in recent years.

Britain has argued that as neighbors, Iran and Syria can be part of the solution rather than part of the problem. When the Iraq Study Group – a US government panel that issued a report urging a change in the Bush administration's course earlier this year – recommended that the two countries be drawn into dialog, Britain welcomed its report. At the time, the Bush administration rejected that advice.

Still, Downing Street is skeptical about how constructive the talks with Tehran and Damascus will prove. "Meeting is good but results have to flow from meetings," says a British foreign office spokesman.

Syria

Like Iran, Syria will see the meeting as a chance to get a "foot in the door" with the US which has cold-shouldered Damascus for the past two years. Despite Washington's icy relations with Damascus, the Syria regime of President Bashar al-Assad has repeatedly said it wants to resume full dialog with the US and that it's willing to revive peace talks with Israel.

Analysts say Syria will seek to use the meeting to advance its interests outside of Iraq. "Probably the immediate priority is Lebanon, followed by the Palestinian and Israeli issue," says Andrew Tabler, a Damascus-based fellow with the Institute of Current World Affairs.

A United Nations probe into the killing of former Lebanese premier Rafik Hariri has implicated Syria. Damascus denies any involvement. The US has backed demands that those involved with the killing be prosecuted, even if they're found to be Syrian officials. Syria is worried that a proposed international tribunal to try Hariri's killers will be used as a political tool by the US to weaken the regime. It's seeking to persuade the Americans to ease the pressure.

Syria also wants to resume peace talks with Israel, and says it is willing to agree to a full peace with the Jewish state in exchange for the Golan Heights, captured by Israel in 1967. But Israel has been split over the Syrian overtures. The Syrians are hoping to improve their image as potentially serious partners for peace and thereby ease America's pressure.

In exchange, Syria could help in Iraq, Mr. Tabler says, by encouraging the Sunni tribes of eastern Syria to try to convince their cross-border tribesmen to stop supporting the insurgency, and by tightening security along its porous 400-mile frontier with Iraq.

Russia

The Russians are intensely worried about how Middle East destabilization might affect Russia's neighbors in the Caucasus and Central Asia, as well as attitudes among their own population of 20 million Muslims.

Russia wants to reestablish its credentials as a big-power player in the region, analysts say, and more engagement on Iraq creates an opportunity to do that. President Vladimir Putin has been seeking to hold Russia up as an alternative, more accommodating pole to what is now often seen as a brash and bullying America. It also has major business interests in Iran and Syria.

"Russia has repeatedly said it wants to see the Iraq problem solved with the involvement of Iraq's neighbors and the entire world community, through engagement and dialog and not through the use of force," says Yevgeny Bazhanov, vice rector of the government's Diplomatic Academy, which trains Russian diplomats. "Without Russian involvement you couldn't have this dialog ... because Russia can play the role of mediator at that table."

Iraq

Iraq, of course, wants peace and stability, as well as to be treated as an equal by its neighbors, particularly by Sunni Arab states like Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and Egypt that are uncomfortable with the Shiite political ascendancy inside the country. The Iraqi government also worries that these neighbors, the US, and Iran are turning the country into a proxy battleground for their own disputes and are eager to see all sides sit down together and tensions defused.

Tehran May Take Part In Iraq Talks (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

Iran said yesterday it is likely to attend a regional conference this month -- with the United States and Syria -- to address the violence in neighboring Iraq, while the Bush administration insisted its decision to participate did not signal a softening of its hard line against the two foes.

Ali Larijani, Iran's top national security official, said Tehran was still reviewing the invitation for the March 10 gathering of lower-level ministers in Baghdad. The government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has planned a follow-up meeting of foreign ministers, possibly in April.

"We support solving the problems of Iraq by all means and we will attend the conference if it is expedient," Mr. Larijani, head of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, told reporters.

Syria has already agreed to attend the conference.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari, in an interview with the Associated Press from Sweden, said Iran had agreed to meet with other regional powers, but "they have some questions" about a separate meeting to be held the same day in Baghdad that would include the United States and the four other permanent members of the U.N. Security Council.

Diplomats expected in Baghdad on March 10 also include U.N. Iraq envoy Ashraf Qazi and representatives from Egypt, the Arab League and the Organization of the Islamic Conference. An Iraqi official said yesterday no one had yet turned down the invitation.

U.S. officials yesterday were at pains to reject the idea that the decision to sit down with Syria and Iran reflected an about-face in U.S. policy. The administration has been sharply critical of both countries, charging them with backing insurgent forces and militias in Iraq that have attacked U.S. troops.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said it was Mr. al-Maliki's government that organized the gathering and issued the invitations. Mr. Snow said issues like Iran's suspect nuclear programs would not on the table in Baghdad.

"If you're suddenly expecting chummy new relations, you've created a scenario that is not justified by the facts on the ground or by precedent," Mr. Snow said.

But critics in Congress and in the Middle East noted that President Bush in December had dismissed a suggestion by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group for just such a regional conference on Iraq.

The Daily Star, an influential Lebanese daily, said in its lead editorial yesterday that the most significant thing about the conference may be that Iraq took the lead in organizing it.

"The Iraqi-led conference may the first sign that the Iraqis are rising up from under a mountain of American mistakes and setting their own security agenda," the paper said.

There were signs that Mr. al-Maliki's government was coordinating with Syria and Iran in planning the meeting.

Washington Rules Out Dir-ect Talks With Iran (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

The Bush administration on Wednesday dismissed suggestions that it might engage dir-ectly with Iran or Syria at an international conference on Iraq to be held in Baghdad next week.

European allies and dom-estic critics have broadly welcomed the announcement by Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, that the US would take part in the conference alongside Iran and Syria. She also noted that such a diplomatic initiative had been recommended by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group last year.

Ms Rice's statement at a Senate hearing on Tuesday prompted reports in the US media of a dramatic shift in policy. It was fuelled in part by the State Department, which pointedly declined to rule out the possibility of bilateral talks between Ms Rice and Iranian officials at a follow-up conference on Iraq to be held in April.

But on Wednesday the White House stepped in to "clarify" the situation and explicitly ruled out such a move.

"There will not be bilateral talks between the United States and Iran or the United States and Syria, within the context of these meetings," said Tony Snow, the White House spokesman. The US precondition re-mained unchanged, he said, that Iran first suspend its uranium enrichment programme as called for by the United Nations Security Council.

"We want to make sure those waters don't get muddied," he said.

Some analysts interpreted the mixed signals as evidence that the Bush administration was more interested in using the appearance of diplomacy to appease domestic critics and get its supplemental Iraq war budget through Congress, rather than adopt one of the key findings of the Iraq Study Group, which was to engage Iran and Syria directly. However, other analysts believed that Ms Rice was in fact trying to shift the US position in the direction of engagement with Iran, as has happened in recent weeks with North Korea, culminating with the nuc-lear freeze agreement reached in Beijing last month.

"It creates confusion, and when the Iranians are confused they are paralysed," commented Ray Takeyh, an analyst with the Council on Foreign Relations think-tank who believes Ms Rice is anxious to engage Iran in talks.

In Tehran, Iran's top security official, Ali Larijani, indicated that Iran would take part in the Baghdad conference.

Nouri al-Maliki, Iraq's prime minister, has invited all Iraq's neighbours as well as Egypt, the five permanent members of the Security Council, the Arab League and the Organisation of the Islamic Conference. Officials said it would take place on March 10. The US is expec-ted to send a senior official below the rank of minister.

"We hope the meeting will bring political backing for the national unity government in providing security and stability that will help national reconciliation in Iraq," Mr Maliki's office said.

The Maliki government is anxious that Iraq is not turned into a proxy battleground for a US-Iranian conflict. Mr Larijani said Teh-ran's participation in the Bag-hdad conference would be designed to help the Iraqi government.

Iran has rejected accusations by the US that it is arming and equipping Shia militia in Iraq and providing explosives used against US forces. Asked if Tehran ran any risks in meeting the Americans, Mr Larijani replied: "One should not commit suicide because one is afraid of death."

The US last held direct high-level talks with Iran in Geneva in May 2003.

Analysis: Iraq Talks May Open New Doors (AP)

By Anne Gearan

The Bush administration says it's not going soft on Iran, but Washington's new agreement to talk to the clerical regime about violence in Iraq could crack the door for other discussions with the last holdout among President Bush's old axis of evil.

Iraq said Wednesday that its neighbors, including U.S. adversaries Iran and Syria, will attend a March 10 session on the country's security crisis. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made the surprise announcement Tuesday that a U.S. diplomat will also be there and that she herself will go to a later session.

It wasn't exactly an olive branch, but Rice's mild overture looked dramatic after escalating U.S. allegations that Iran is contributing to the spreading chaos in Iraq and a calculated show of U.S. military might in the Persian Gulf.

Bush administration spokesmen were quick to note that the talks are at Iraq's invitation, not Washington's. And the sessions are supposed to be about Iraq, not Iran.

"The Iraqis are putting together a meeting, and it's going to be a businesslike meeting," White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters. "If you're expecting, suddenly, new chummy relations, you've created a scenario that is not justified by the facts on the ground or the precedents."

"Going wobbly, shift, turnabout, change," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack mocked, using several terms pulled from the morning newspapers. "Look, the administration has continued to act on a certain set of principles that it has outlined," and will keep doing so, he said.

Yet there were hints that the administration is testing Iranian, and domestic American, willingness to go further. In the diplomatic world, tough talk can sometimes be a cover for more conciliatory gestures.

"While I'm not going to point you in the direction of any particular engagement with any particular delegation ..., I'm also not going to exclude any particular diplomatic interaction," McCormack said when asked about prospects for U.S.-Iranian contact at the meetings.

The subject of sophisticated homemade bombs might come up, McCormack said. The Bush administration claims that at least one element of the Iranian regime is supplying Iraqi insurgents with especially lethal bombs that kill U.S. troops.

As for Iran's disputed nuclear program, the subject of U.S.-backed efforts to apply punishing international sanctions on Tehran, the United States won't bring it up, McCormack said.

If the Iranians want to talk about it?

"I'm sure that people would listen politely," McCormack offered, before adding that the United States is not backing off its insistence that Iran drop its uranium enrichment program as a price for escaping sanctions.

Ahmad Bakhshayesh, a Tehran Allameh University teacher in politics, said the nuclear issue probably sinks any chance of a short-term improvement in U.S.-Iranian relations from the upcoming Iraq conferences.

"However, it may lead to a broader path for negotiations between the two countries," said Bakhshayesh.

Although the United States directly accuses Iran of supporting militants in Iraq, "Iran attends the conference to indicate to the U.S., Iraq and the region that Tehran supports stability in Iraq," he said.

The United Nations Security Council has begun to consider a second, tougher round of sanctions on Iran, including a ban on travel abroad by officials involved in the nuclear program.

Rice made a bigger overture to Iran on that point last year.

If Iran shelved activities the West feared could lead to a bomb, Rice said the United States would join Europe in face-to-face talks with Tehran. That amounted to a U.S. proposal for rapprochement after more than 25 years of estrangement, but at a price Iran's hard-line leaders were unwilling to pay.

The gambit was popular in Europe but unpopular in some quarters of Bush's own government. The administration has since toughened its rhetoric on Iran, flexed its muscles at the U.N. and sent two carrier battle groups to the Persian Gulf.

The White House had dismissed the recommendation from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group in December that it reach out to Syria and Iran to try to stabilize Iraq, saying both nations would try to use the opportunity as leverage in unrelated confrontations with the West.

Syria would want a free pass on allegations it is behind the assassination of a Lebanese politician, Washington said, while Iran would make cooperation in Iraq part of discussions about the nuclear program.

So, is the administration now becoming more flexible? After a separate diplomatic overture to North Korea, does the latest shift on Iran portend a retreat from the Bush administration's famously hard line against unsavory regimes?

The State Department's McCormack rolled his eyes.

"This just didn't happen overnight. This happened as a result of careful policy and diplomatic ground work that has been laid over the course of the years of this administration," but only now bearing fruit, he said.

A Diplomatic Avenue (WP)

THE BUSH administration's decision to participate in a regional conference on Iraq that could include Iran and Syria is a welcome way to strengthen U.S. diplomacy at a crucial moment in the Middle East. Iraq teeters between civil war and steps toward a political settlement; so do Lebanon and the Palestinian Authority. Regional talks aren't likely to settle any of these crises, but they are a necessary part of any solutions. By participating and opening the way for conversations with the Syrian and Iranian governments, the administration will extract itself from a diplomatic corner and gain some fresh opportunities.

It's quite possible that neither Syria nor Iran will prove cooperative on Iraq -- Tehran has yet to say whether it will attend the conference -- but there are some positive signs. Iran's hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has come under attack at home for his confrontational style. In recent weeks, Ali Larijani, Iran's national security adviser, who reports to supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, has been quietly negotiating with senior Saudi officials on Lebanon and Iraq. Though there have been no breakthroughs, the talks helped to stop street fighting in Lebanon; Iran seems to be interested in heading off a regional conflict between Sunni and Shiite movements. Syria, desperate to end its own isolation, has been advertising its willingness to help calm Iraq and to open peace talks with Israel.

Mr. Larijani and other Iranian officials have also been hinting that Iran is interested in striking a deal to end its confrontation with the U.N. Security Council over its nuclear program. It's at least possible that Tehran is looking for a way, without appearing to be capitulating, to accept the U.N. demand that it end uranium enrichment. That's why administration officials were wise not to rule out side talks between U.S. and Iranian officials at the upcoming Baghdad meetings, while sticking to the administration's position that formal negotiations with Iran will depend on an enrichment suspension.

Success with Iran will require a careful mix of diplomacy, economic sanctions and the threat of force. Since the beginning of the year the United States has strengthened its military position in the Persian Gulf and arrested Iranian agents in Iraq. Now it has matched those necessary measures with a new diplomatic avenue. What's needed next is a continued show of determination by the U.N. Security Council, whose latest deadline for an Iranian freeze on enrichment expired last week. Britain and the United States have begun seeking a new resolution strengthening the mostly symbolic sanctions that the Security Council approved in December. Russia and European governments that have been urging more dialogue with Iran have just witnessed a rare show of flexibility by the Bush administration, but the dialogue will lead nowhere unless it is accompanied by continued and escalating pressure from a united Security Council.

Don't Negotiate With Pariahs (USAT)

By Victor Davis Hanson

USA Today, March 1, 2007

America should attend regional talks that may include Syria and Iran, in support of stabilizing the democracy in Iraq.

But the United States should not negotiate directly with these terrorist states until they cooperate with ongoing United Nations investigations and cease trying to destroy neighboring democracies.

Syria has engaged in serial assassination in Lebanon to overturn that constitutional government. It blocks U.N. inquiries into the murders of prominent Lebanese. And Syrian money and agents foment unrest in democratic Iraq, even as they seek to aid Hamas in attacking democratic Israel.

Iranian theocracy violates international nonproliferation accords. Its president has promised to wipe Israel off the map. In chilling fashion, Iran has hosted an international conference to deny the Holocaust, as if proof were needed that its threats derive from an existential hatred of the Jewish state.

Like Syria, Iran wants to end the democratic experiment in Iraq. Iranian money, weapons and expertise are used by terrorists in kill Americans in Iraq, and through Hamas to disrupt Palestinian peace efforts. Hezbollah, a group also backed by Iran and Syria, seeks to destabilize Lebanese democracy and restart a border war with Israel.

Such aggression is not symptomatic, as is often asserted, of confident regimes on the rise. Iranian oil production is declining. Billions in food and fuel subsidies are proving unsustainable, and scarce funds are siphoned off to foreign terrorists and nuclear proliferation. Beset by unsound economies and rising domestic unpopularity, the Iranian theocracy and Syrian dictatorship have become pariahs at odds with European diplomats, other Arab states and the United Nations.

Only the continued American policy of ostracizing Iran and Syria, galvanizing the international community to enforce U.N. compliance, supporting Iranian and Syrian reformers, and keeping a high-profile military presence in the area offers any hope that either nation will cease their subversion.

We need to keep the pressure up — without bombing, without bombast and without talking directly with these rogue and increasingly desperate states that have caused themselves and the world so much trouble.

Russia Warns U.S. Against Striking Iran (AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

AP, March 1, 2007

Russia's foreign minister warned Washington not to use force against Iran and criticized what he described as the United States' unilateral approach to other global crises in an interview published Wednesday.

Russia was worried about Vice President Dick Cheney's recent comment that "all options are on the table" to stop Tehran from becoming a nuclear power, Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said.

"We are concerned about the possibility of a military scenario," Lavrov was quoted as saying, in the government daily Rossiyskaya Gazeta. "We are observing a U.S. military buildup in the Persian Gulf. Such a buildup of forces always threatens to trigger a military conflict, even by accident."

Iran has ignored a U.N. deadline to halt the enrichment of uranium, which the U.S. says is part of a secret effort to build nuclear weapons. Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel but highly enriched uranium can be used in an atomic bomb.

Russia has repeatedly spoken out against the use of military force against Iran, and has warned that harsh punishment would be counterproductive.

In December, Russia supported a U.N. Security Council resolution that imposed limited sanctions against Iran over its refusal to halt enrichment, but only after the council dropped an initial proposal to impose curbs on a nuclear power plant Russia is building in Iran.

Senior diplomats from the five permanent Security Council members and Germany met Monday in London to discuss ways to pressure Iran to suspend enrichment. Officials in London and Washington said new measures would likely include incremental restrictions on trade and arms.

Lavrov asserted that the talks on the Iranian issue were deadlocked, saying both the United States and Iran were unwilling to compromise.

"It would be unforgivable to miss a chance to use every opportunity to start such talks because of a false notion of prestige, because of the unyielding stance taken by both parties," he was quoted as saying.

Echoing recent comments made by President Vladimir Putin, Lavrov also assailed Washington for what he called a unilateralist approach to global issues.

"When they offer us a unilateral strategy and urge us to express solidarity in combating one or another evil ... that's not the behavior of a partner," he was quoted as saying.

Lavrov added that Putin's harsh criticism of U.S. policy earlier this month voiced an opinion many other nations shared, but were afraid to express publicly.

Putin told a security conference in Munich Feb. 10 that the United States "has overstepped its national borders in every way" and accused it of triggering a global arms race.

Russia can speak independently, he said, because of its resurgence following the troubled years after the 1991 Soviet collapse.

"There are those who cannot say 'no' to the United States," he said, according to the newspaper. "But we can allow ourselves to tell the truth, and not just reject unilateral calls for support but offer concrete constructive alternatives."

In a bid to increase its role in Middle East peace efforts, Russia this week hosted Khaled Mashaal, leader of the militant Palestinian group Hamas. Lavrov said Tuesday the Hamas chief pledged to end missile attacks and violence against Israel, although Mashaal reaffirmed his group's refusal to recognize Israel.

Lavrov also called for lifting the financial aid blockade of the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority.

The United States, the Europeans and Israel consider Hamas a terrorist group. Hamas' renunciation of violence and recognition of Israel are key demands of the Quartet of Middle East peace brokers — Russia, the United States, the European Union and the United Nations.

In the newspaper interview, Lavrov said Russia will continue to support the Quartet's demand that Hamas recognize Israel. But he warned the West's refusal to deal with the militant group could undermine a fragile accord among the Palestinians.

"It's wrong and shortsighted not to see the real progress that already has been made," he said.

Iran Sanctions May Target Bank (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

The world's big powers are debating whether to increase pressure on Tehran's nuclear programme by targeting Bank Sepah, a leading Iranian bank, with United Nations sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0138451

Such a move, against Iran's oldest bank, would follow a campaign by the US to persuade European nations to follow its example and take steps against Sepah that would exclude it from international markets.

In January, Washington barred US banks from doing business with Sepah because of what the Bush administration said was the institution's connections with Iran's missile programme. The decision effectively stopped Sepah from carrying out dollar transactions.

But moves in other jurisdictions would have a greater effect. Bank Sepah's wholly owned subsidiary Bank Sepah International claims it has "relationships in over 45 countries worldwide" as well as offices in London, Paris, Frankfurt and Rome.

To date, European Union countries have resisted taking action against Sepah, despite a campaign waged by Robert Kimmitt, deputy US treasury secretary, and Stuart Levey, Treasury under secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

States such as Germany and Sweden say that imposing measures against the bank would be legally difficult unless Sepah is specifically named by a UN Security Council resolution. Bank Sepah itself denounces what it says are Washington's "fabricated statements and unfounded allegations," adding that it "will spare no effort to seek righteous remedies in the near future".

Yesterday, however, European diplomats said they were discussing whether to include measures against Bank Sepah in a new resolution. The issue will be addressed by top diplomats from the permanent five members of the Security Council and Germany, who are due to discuss possible Iran sanctions in a telephone call today.

The diplomats said no decision had yet been made about Sepah. But, in line with the policy of exercising incremental pressure on Tehran, which missed a deadline to curb its nuclear programme last week, the US and the EU want to strengthen measures set out by a previous resolution agreed last December.

That resolution targeted seven organisations the UN said were involved in Iran's nuclear programme, three involved in its missile programme, and 12 people connected with either or both programmes.

As well as adding new names to the lists, the EU and US want a new resolution to impose a travel ban on the people identified in the previous measure – previously only subject to softer travel restrictions.

In addition, the six countries are discussing whether to impose limited restrictions on arms dealings with Iran – a measure Russia is very likely to resist – and whether to include language that would deter countries from subsidising trade with Iran.

U.S. Concedes Uncertainty On North Korean Uranium Effort (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And William J. Broad

New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — Last October, the North Koreans tested their first nuclear device, the fruition of decades of work to make a weapon out of plutonium.

For nearly five years, though, the Bush administration, based on intelligence estimates, has accused North Korea of also pursuing a secret, parallel path to a bomb, using enriched uranium. That accusation, first leveled in the fall of 2002, resulted in the rupture of an already tense relationship: The United States cut off oil supplies, and the North Koreans responded by throwing out international inspectors, building up their plutonium arsenal and, ultimately, producing that first plutonium bomb.

But now, American intelligence officials are publicly softening their position, admitting to doubts about how much progress the uranium enrichment program has actually made. The result has been new questions about the Bush administration's decision to confront North Korea in 2002.

"The question now is whether we would be in the position of having to get the North Koreans to give up a sizable arsenal if this had been handled differently," a senior administration official said this week.

The disclosure underscores broader questions about the ability of intelligence agencies to discern the precise status of foreign weapons programs. The original assessment about North Korea came during the same period that the administration was building its case about Iraq's unconventional weapons programs, which turned out to be based on flawed intelligence. And the new North Korea assessment comes amid debate over intelligence about Iran's weapons.

The public revelation of the intelligence agencies' doubts, which have been brewing for some time, came almost by happenstance. In a little-noticed exchange on Tuesday at a hearing at the Senate Armed Services Committee, Joseph DeTrani, a longtime intelligence official, told Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island that "we still have confidence that the program is in existence — at the mid-confidence level." Under the intelligence agencies' own definitions, that level "means the information is interpreted in various ways, we have alternative views" or it is not fully corroborated.

"The administration appears to have made a very costly decision that has resulted in a fourfold increase in the nuclear weapons of North Korea," Senator Reed said in an interview on Wednesday. "If that was based in part on mixing up North Korea's ambitions with their accomplishments, it's important."

Two administration officials, who declined to be identified, suggested that if the administration harbored the same doubts in 2002 that it harbored now, the negotiating strategy for dealing with North Korea might have been different — and the tit-for-tat actions that led to October's nuclear test could, conceivably, have been avoided.

The strongest evidence for the original assessment was Pakistan's sale to North Korea of upwards of 20 centrifuges, machines that spin fast to convert uranium gas into highly enriched uranium, a main fuel for atom bombs. Officials feared that the North Koreans would use those centrifuges as models to build a vast enrichment complex. But in interviews this week, experts inside and outside the government said that since then, little or no evidence of Korean procurements had emerged to back up those fears.

The continuing doubts prompted the Office of the Director of National Intelligence on Wednesday to declassify a portion of the most recent, one-page update circulated to top national security officials about the status of North Korea's uranium program. The assessment, read by two senior intelligence officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity in a joint interview, said the intelligence community still had "high confidence that North Korea has pursued a uranium enrichment capability, which we assess is for a weapon."

It added, they said, that all the government's intelligence agencies "judge — most with moderate confidence — that this effort continues. The degree of progress towards producing enriched uranium remains unknown, however."

In other words, while the agencies were certain of the initial purchases, confidence in the program's overall existence appears to have dropped over the years — apparently from high to moderate.

It is unclear why the new assessment is being disclosed now. But some officials suggested that the timing could be linked to North Korea's recent agreement to reopen its doors to international arms inspectors. As a result, these officials have said, the intelligence agencies are facing the possibility that their assessments will once again be compared to what is actually found on the ground. "This may be preventative," one American diplomat said.

American intelligence agencies had long known of North Korea's nuclear program employing plutonium, which can make compact weapons but requires large, easily detected reactors. By contrast, uranium warheads tend to be larger, but the technology for enriching uranium is much smaller and easier to hide.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, declined to discuss the decisions to confront North Korea in 2002 or the quality of the intelligence behind that decision, though both have noted previously that North Korea purchased equipment from Pakistan that could only have been intended for use in producing weapons fuel. One former official said that it was Ms. Rice, in a meeting at the C.I.A. in 2004, who encouraged intelligence officials to soften their assessments of how quickly the North Koreans could produce weapons-usable uranium.

"She asked, how did we know about the timing, and they didn't have answers," said the former official. "Did they have Russians and Chinese helping them? No one was sure. It was really a guesstimate about timing."

Different players in the 2002 debate have different memories. John R. Bolton, the former American ambassador to the United Nations, who headed the State Department's proliferation office at the time of the 2002 declaration, said in an interview on Wednesday evening that "there was no dissent at the time, because in the face of the evidence the disputes evaporated." Mr. Bolton, one of the most hawkish voices in the administration and a vocal critic of its recent deal with North Korea, recalled that even the State Department's own intelligence arm, which was the most skeptical of the Iraq evidence, "agreed with the consensus opinion."

But David A. Kay, a nuclear expert and former official who in 2003 and 2004 led the American hunt for unconventional arms in Iraq, said he had found the administration's claims about the North Korean uranium program unpersuasive. "They were driving it way further than the evidence indicated it should go," he said in an interview. The leap of logic, Dr. Kay added, turned evidence of equipment purchases into "a significant production capability."

But the doubts were on full display on Wednesday, when Christopher R. Hill, the chief American negotiator with North Korea, testified on Capitol Hill. "If we determine that there is a program, it's got to go," Mr. Hill said, words that were far more tentative than American policy makers have used about the program in the past. Expressing his resolve to get to the bottom of the mystery, he added: "We cannot have a situation where we — you know, they pretend to disarm and we pretend to believe them. We need to run this into the ground." He said that while there was no doubt that North Korea had bought centrifuges from Abdul Qadeer Khan, the rogue Pakistani engineer, there was doubt about "how far they've gotten."

John E. McLaughlin, a former director of central intelligence and the deputy C.I.A. director in 2002, defended the initial North Korean findings as accurate. "At the time we reported this, we had confidence that they were acquiring materials that could give them the capability to do this down the road," he said in an interview. But no one, he added, "said they had anything up and running. We also made clear that we did not have a confident understanding of how far along they were."

That confidence has dropped further because inspectors have been banned from North Korea for four years, nearly as long as they were out of Iraq before their readmittance just before the 2003 invasion. In Iraq's case, intelligence analysts extrapolated from the last information they had to assess what kind of weapons Iraq might be producing.

Outside experts, including David Albright, president of the Institute for Science and International Security, a private group in Washington that tracks nuclear arms, have suggested in recent days that something similar happened in North Korea's case. "The evidence doesn't support the extrapolation" to the judgment that North Korea was making crucial strides in its uranium program, Mr. Albright said in an interview. "The extrapolation went too far."

He said administration analysts were right in thinking that Dr. Khan had sold North Korea about 20 centrifuges. Gen. Pervez Musharraf, the Pakistani president, confirmed that in a memoir published last year. But, Mr. Albright said, intelligence agencies overstated whether North Korea had used those few machines as models to construct row upon row of carbon copies.

His report zeroed in on thousands of aluminum tubes that the North Koreans bought and tried to buy in the early 2000s. The C.I.A. and the Bush administration, the report said, pointed to these tubes as the "smoking gun" for construction of a large-scale North Korean plant for the enriching of uranium. It was assessments about the purpose of aluminum tubes that were at the center of the flawed Iraq intelligence.

In the North Korea case, intelligence analysts saw the tubes as ideal for centrifuges. But Mr. Albright said the relatively weak aluminum tubes were suitable only for stationary outer casings — not central rotors, which have to be very strong to keep from flying apart while spinning at tremendous speeds.

Moreover, he added, the aluminum tubes were "very easy to get and not controlled" by global export authorities because of their potentially harmless nature. So that purchase, by itself, Mr. Albright added, was "not an indicator" of clandestine use for nuclear arms.

New Doubts On Nuclear Efforts By North Korea (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

The Bush administration is backing away from its long-held assertions that North Korea has an active clandestine program to enrich uranium, leading some experts to believe that the original U.S. intelligence that started the crisis over Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions may have been flawed.

The chief intelligence officer for North Korea, Joseph R. DeTrani, told Congress on Tuesday that while there is "high confidence" North Korea acquired materials that could be used in a "production-scale" uranium program, there is only "mid-confidence" such a program exists. Meanwhile, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, the chief negotiator for disarmament talks, told a conference last week in Washington that it is unclear whether North Korea ever mastered the production techniques necessary for such a program.

If the materials North Korea bought "did not go into a highly enriched uranium program, maybe they went somewhere else," Hill said. "Fine. We can have a discussion about where they are and where they've gone."

The administration's stance today stands in sharp contrast to the certainty expressed by top officials in 2002, when the administration accused Pyongyang of running a secret uranium program -- and demanded it be dismantled at once. President Bush told a news conference that November: "We discovered that, contrary to an agreement they had with the United States, they're enriching uranium, with a desire of developing a weapon."

The accusation about the alleged uranium program backfired, sparking a series of events that ultimately led to North Korea's first nuclear test -- using another material, plutonium -- nearly five months ago.

In 2002, the United States led a drive to suspend shipments of fuel oil promised to Pyongyang under a 1994 accord that froze a North Korean plutonium facility. The collapse of the 1994 agreement freed North Korea to build up a stockpile of plutonium for as many as a dozen nuclear weapons. Pyongyang conducted its test with some of that plutonium -- while the alleged uranium facility faded in importance.

Plutonium and highly enriched uranium provide different routes to building nuclear weapons. The North Koreans were able to reprocess spent fuel rods -- which had been monitored by U.N. inspectors under the 1994 agreement -- to obtain the weapons-grade plutonium for a nuclear test last year. A uranium-enrichment program would have required Pyongyang to build a facility with thousands of uranium-spinning centrifuges to obtain the highly enriched uranium needed for a weapon. Iran's nuclear program, which the United States alleges is intended for weapons, involves enriched uranium.

When Bush took office in 2001, a number of top administration officials openly expressed grave doubts about the 1994 accord, which was negotiated by the Clinton administration, and they seized on the intelligence about the uranium facility to terminate the agreement. The CIA provided an unclassified estimate to Congress in November 2002 that North Korea had begun constructing a plant that would produce enough "weapons-grade uranium for two or more nuclear weapons per year . . . as soon as mid-decade."

David Albright, a respected former U.N. inspector and president of the Institute for Science and International Security, issued a report last week in which he likened the intelligence on North Korea's uranium facility to the discredited intelligence before the invasion of Iraq that Baghdad was building a nuclear program. "The analysis about North Korea's program also appears to be flawed," he wrote.

In the upcoming issue of the Washington Quarterly, Joel S. Wit, a former State Department official who, with Albright, recently met with North Korean officials in Pyongyang, also raises questions about the intelligence estimate.

Administration officials insist they had valid suspicions at the time about North Korean purchases -- including 150 tons of aluminum tubes from Russia in June 2002 -- to halt any possible cooperative talks with Pyongyang. Officials also say that a senior North Korean official admitted to the program in October 2002, when Hill's predecessor, James Kelly, confronted North Korean officials over the U.S. intelligence findings at a meeting in Pyongyang. North Korea subsequently denied that any such admission took place.

Kelly told reporters at the time he had informed the North Koreans that "this was a big problem and that they needed to dismantle it right away, before we could fully engage in a whole range of things that might well be mutually beneficial."

U.S. participants at the meeting said in interviews there was little dispute at the time North Korea appeared to be admitting the program, though one said the admission was more "tonal" -- such as the North Korean official's belligerent attitude -- than would appear in the transcript of the discussion.

During the early years of the crisis, the United States took a firm stand that North Korea must first admit to the uranium facility, rejecting proposals from other nations that it was more important to freeze the plutonium facility in order to halt North Korea's production. In May 2004, DeTrani -- then with the State Department -- was dispatched to give the North Koreans a detailed, 90-minute presentation of all the materials that Pyongyang had procured overseas, including aluminum tubes, chemicals and even a centrifuge kit from a Pakistani nuclear smuggling network, a U.S. official said.

The North Koreans have consistently denied having a uranium-enrichment program, and U.S. officials say suspected procurement activities have largely ceased in the past two years for unknown reasons. Some speculate that Pyongyang found a uranium program too difficult, especially since the plutonium facility was active. Others say DeTrani's presentation spooked them and they either ended the purchases or became more discreet.

Hill has said he has raised the uranium program at every meeting with the North Koreans, but the recent deal struck with Pyongyang focuses on the plutonium program. Under the agreement, North Korea will close and "seal" its plutonium nuclear reactor at Yongbyon within 60 days in return for 50,000 tons of fuel oil.

Pyongyang must eventually disclose and dismantle its programs in order to receive significant aid and other benefits, including normalizing relations with the United States.

U.S. Discusses Releasing North Korean Funds (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman And Donald Greenlees

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — China and the United States are close to an accord to let North Korea regain some of the $25 million in its funds frozen in a bank in Macao now that it has agreed to start dismantling its nuclear arms program, American officials said Wednesday.

The American officials said arrangements for North Korea to get a portion of the funds frozen at Banco Delta Asia, a small family-owned bank accused of money laundering, have been the subject of intense discussions this week in China. A deal could be announced in the next few weeks, they said.

The issue of the funds, frozen a year and a half ago, was a major factor in the off-again-on-again six-party negotiations with North Korea over its nuclear program. North Korea angrily boycotted the talks for most of the last year, charging that the bank action was based on false charges and was an example of economic coercion.

The intention to ease the freeze on the North Korean funds was not announced at the time of the North Korea accord reached on Feb. 13, but officials said at the time that they expected the issue to be resolved. Daniel Glaser, a deputy under secretary of the Treasury, has been in China this week for discussions about the subject.

Mr. Glaser said this week that the United States had gone through more than 300,000 documents from Banco Delta Asia and consulted on them with both North Korea and China. The effort, American officials said, was meant to determine which of the North Korean funds were tainted by illegal activities and which were legitimate.

“All of this work that we’ve done has put us in a position where we can begin to take steps to resolve the Banco Delta Asia matter,” Mr. Glaser told reporters in Hong Kong on Monday. He said the resolution of the matter would be completed “in a timely fashion” and “as quickly as possible.”

The expected return of some of the frozen funds to North Korea — officials involved in the discussions say the sum could exceed $12 million — offers a striking case study of how the United States has used its financial laws to extend its reach to foreign banks and isolate a country from the international financial system.

Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state who negotiated the nuclear deal with North Korea, said Wednesday that he had no doubt that freezing the funds compelled North Korea to negotiate.

“I think they were concerned about the fact that we were able to go after an important note of their financing,” he said, testifying before the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. Hill added that the agreement on nuclear matters meant no easing of American concerns over North Korea’s illicit activities on drugs, weapons or counterfeiting. “I can assure you that we have not, and will not, trade progress on denuclearization by turning a blind eye to some of these other activities,” he said.

The Bush administration hopes to replicate the North Korean experience with Iran, but American officials involved in the planning acknowledge that this might be more difficult because Iran has a web of banking relationships throughout Europe and the Middle East.

Sanctions against Iran approved by the United Nations Security Council in December have contributed to Iran’s economic isolation, administration officials say. In addition, Treasury steps similar to those against Banco Delta Asia have forced Iranian banks to carry out transactions, including the sale of oil, in currencies other than the dollar.

These steps have complicated business deals and the willingness of some foreign companies to invest in Iran, energy experts say. Recently, for example, Russia said it was slowing its investment in an Iranian civilian nuclear plant, saying that it objected to being paid in euros.

Banco Delta Asia was seen in financial circles as an early test case of American efforts to use such sanctions against not only North Korea but also other countries charged with supporting terrorism or illegal weapons proliferation. In 2005, for example, the Bush administration labeled Banco Delta Asia a "primary money laundering concern" and charged that it was helping North Korea carry out counterfeiting, narcotics trafficking and other illicit activities.

North Korea denied the accusations, and Banco Delta Asia, in filings with the Treasury Department, said it had no evidence of such activities for North Korea.

Nevertheless, the bank and the Chinese government closed accounts of 20 North Korean banks, 11 North Korean trading companies, 9 North Korean citizens and 8 Macao-based companies that do business with North Korea, according to bank records. The bank also promised to cease any further business with North Korea or its business partners.

American officials have suggested that some of these accounts helped North Korea's leader, Kim Jong-il, maintain a lavish lifestyle in Pyongyang, the capital.

While the $25 million in Banco Delta Asia is believed to be a small part of North Korea's financial activities with the outside world, it reflects only the amount of money in the bank at the time the funds were frozen. The volume of transactions conducted by the bank for North Korea could involve many times that amount of money, according to people close to the investigation into the bank.

The main enforcement tool by the United States was an announcement that it was considering a step barring American banks from doing business in dollars with Banco Delta Asia, effectively threatening to shut it out of the international banking system. To protect themselves, American banks then stopped doing business with Banco Delta Asia.

Those steps, in turn, forced the bank to shut itself down, hand itself over to the Chinese government and freeze all funds linked to North Korea.

US-North Korea Talks Set For March (AP)

AP, March 1, 2007

U.S. and North Korean officials will meet in New York on March 5-6 to discuss initial steps toward normalizing relations, the State Department said Wednesday.

Spokesman Sean McCormack said U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill will meet with North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan.

Talks on establishing normal relations after decades of hostility were called for in the six-party nuclear disarmament agreement signed in China on Feb. 13.

McCormack said Hill and Kim will spent a lot of time working on the agenda for the normalization process.

"It's not a meeting that will produce immediate results," McCormack said.

Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, said Tuesday that officials had seen North Korea take preliminary steps toward shutting down its main nuclear reactor, which the North pledged to close and seal in return for an initial load of fuel oil. More aid would follow once North Korean technicians had disabled its nuclear programs.

"There are parts of this nuclear program that we have to pay a lot of attention to, to see if we have the kind of disclosure and the inspection capabilities that we're looking for," Maples said.

N. Korea, U.S. Talks 'Just A First Step' (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The State Department yesterday ruled out "immediate results" from U.S.-North Korea talks on establishing full diplomatic relations, which officials said will take place on Monday and Tuesday in New York.

U.S. intelligence officials, meanwhile, said the North has taken preliminary steps to shut down its main nuclear reactor, as required by a Feb. 13 agreement under which it would scrap its atomic programs in exchange for about $300 million in aid.

The deal, signed in Beijing by the United States, North and South Korea, China, Japan and Russia, also calls for a "working group" to begin work on several bilateral issues -- including diplomatic relations -- within the next two weeks.

"I would caution you that this meeting is just a first step; it's an initial conversation," he said. "Don't look at it as a meeting that is going to produce immediate results. Nobody is going to come out the front door and wave a piece of paper with some agreement on it."

The talks will be conducted by the two countries' chief nuclear negotiators, Christopher Hill and Kim Kye-gwan. Mr. Kim is expected to arrive in San Francisco today and meet with nongovernmental groups in the San Francisco Bay Area before heading to New York tomorrow.

North Korea has also invited Mohamed ElBaradei, director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, to Pyongyang for talks on dismantling the North's nuclear facilities.

On Capitol Hill, Army Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, said on Tuesday that recent information and analysis show the North has taken initial steps to close its main nuclear reactor at Yongbyon.

"There are parts of this nuclear program that we have to pay a lot of attention to, to see if we have the kind of disclosure and the inspection capabilities that we are looking for," he told the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Joseph DeTrani, mission manager for North Korea in the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, said the United States will continue to insist that the North declare all of its nuclear programs, including the suspected enrichment of uranium.

Pyongyang has never admitted publicly to having such a program, though U.S. officials insist the North Koreans acknowledged it when confronted with evidence in 2002.

Mr. DeTrani said the U.S. has "high confidence" that North Korea was acquiring materials for a production-scale enrichment program in 2002. The assessment of the program's continued existence is "at the mid-confidence level," he said.

The six-party talks, which produced the Feb. 13 agreement, began in 2003 but were dogged by repeated North Korean boycotts. The last one followed Washington's successful effort in 2005 to persuade a Macau bank to freeze about $24 million in North Korean assets.

Mr. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, indicated yesterday that the Treasury Department may be ready to ease those restrictions, saying that such a development "will not solve all of North Korea's problems with the international financial system."

"It must stop its illicit conduct and improve its international financial reputation in order to do that," Mr. Hill told the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

In Pyongyang yesterday, senior officials from the two Koreas held their first formal negotiating session in seven months.

The South's chief delegate, Unification Minister Lee Jae-joung, criticized the North for conducting missile and nuclear weapons tests last year and urged it to "quickly implement the Feb. 13 agreement," said spokesman Lee Kwan-se.

North Korea's senior Cabinet councilor, Kwon Ho-ung, defended his country's missile tests as a "legitimate right for self-defense as a sovereign nation," but remained silent on the nuclear issue.

The North will hold talks with Japan on establishing diplomatic relations and resolving other disputes March 7 and 8 in Vietnam, Japan's Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki said yesterday.

In U.S. Overtures To Foes, New Respect For Pragmatism (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — In the span of just two weeks, the United States has agreed to hold high-level contacts with Iran and Syria, and to start down the path toward formal diplomatic recognition of North Korea.

Has the Bush administration gone soft on its foes?

As recently as Jan. 12, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice repeated what has been a constant of Bush foreign policy: a refusal to bestow on Iran, Syria and North Korea the legitimacy of diplomatic engagement as long as they refuse to bend on disputed issues.

"That's not diplomacy," Ms. Rice said before a Senate panel, in defending the administration's stand on Iran and Syria. "That's extortion."

Administration officials insisted Wednesday that the new overtures, including an agreement to join Iran and Syria in talks on Iraq, did not mean there had been a change in policy. "There is no crack," the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said. "A number of people have been characterizing U.S. participation in a regional meeting as a change in policy; it is nothing of the sort."

But foreign policy experts, administration critics on Capitol Hill and former diplomats disagreed, saying the administration appeared to have recognized the extent to which it had tied its own hands by insisting on talking only to friends. Even Ms. Rice had called the opening to Tehran and Damascus a "diplomatic initiative."

"The question isn't whether the axis of evil is dead; it's alive as it was yesterday," said Daniel P. Serwer, a vice president at the United States Institute of Peace and a former diplomat who served as executive director of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. "The question is whether the concept, as it was applied, is dead. And it's absolutely clear to me that you have to talk to who you have to talk to, in order to get things done."

Within the administration, there has long been a tug of war between advocates of engagement, represented by the diplomats at the State Department and sometimes led by Ms. Rice, and those who have sought to isolate enemies, a group led by Vice President Dick Cheney and defended by the former United Nations ambassador, John R. Bolton.

In the period leading up to the start of the Iraq war in 2003 and in the years immediately after, those pushing for isolation appeared to have the upper hand.

But last November's election results, along with the morass in Iraq and a yearning for some foreign-policy home runs as the clock winds down on the Bush administration, have made room for proponents of engagement.

A senior administration official who advocates at least limited contacts with America's enemies said, "There wasn't one big 'Aha!' moment, when suddenly we were being heard."

But, he said, "there seems to be more of a recognition of the limited success" of the approach.

At a dinner and lecture on Tuesday night at the Library of Congress, it looked like a reunion of the pro-engagement crowd. Seated at the front was former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, along with the new deputy secretary of state, John D. Negroponte; also in attendance was Robert L. Gallucci, the former chief United States negotiator during the North Korean nuclear crisis of 1994.

It was a veritable bevy of advocates of realpolitik, headlined by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, who told the audience, "America must be prepared to talk to our enemies."

Ms. Rice has come under criticism from conservative hard-liners, both in and out of the administration. So far, her close relationship with President Bush has allowed her to prod the administration toward more engagement, while at the same time taking pains not to push Mr. Bush further than he is willing to go, administration officials said.

In the North Korea case, Ms. Rice pressed for United Nations Security Council sanctions after it exploded a nuclear device in October. Then, three months later, she telephoned Mr. Bush directly from Berlin, where she was traveling, to get his approval for the United States to pursue an accord with North Korea on nuclear issues. In doing so, she bypassed layers of government policy review that had derailed past efforts to negotiate an agreement, administration officials said.

The State Department announced Wednesday that as part of the agreement, in which North Korea agreed to shut its main nuclear reactor in exchange for food and fuel aid, the United States and North Korea would hold "working group talks" on Monday and Tuesday on the normalization of relations.

In the case of Iran and Syria, Ms. Rice followed a similar strategy. In the weeks leading up to Tuesday's shift, she joined the rest of the Bush administration in increasingly confrontational oratory toward Iran. She accused Iran of aiding Shiite militias in attacks against American troops. She referred to "increasing lethality" in those attacks, which she said the United States would not stand for.

One senior administration official said the hard line helped Ms. Rice answer critics who accused her of being too soft. It also allowed the United States to sit at the table with Iran and Syria from a position of strength, the official said.

“The government of the U.S. now feels as though it has leverage,” another senior administration official said. “People ask, ‘What’s changed?’ That’s what’s changed.”

It remains unclear whether an administration that has been committed for so long to not talking to its enemies can make a sincere about-face. At this point, administration officials caution that they have no plans to negotiate one-on-one with Iran or Syria.

But they said the same thing about talks with North Korea, maintaining that Washington was willing to talk to the North only within the context of six-nation talks, while American officials were actually meeting one-on-one with their North Korean counterparts.

Still, there are not many people in the administration who believe that Vice President Cheney has suddenly changed his mind, and now favors engagement.

That means that Ms. Rice will be under pressure to show results quickly, a tall task. “You can’t expect miracles here,” said Lee H. Hamilton, a co-chairman, with Mr. Baker, of the Iraq Study Group, which advised the United States to engage Syria and Iran.

“There has to be a sustained effort,” Mr. Hamilton said. “Successful diplomacy requires very careful preparation and very extensive follow-through.”

Diplomacy Could Define End Of Bush's Term (USAT)

USA Today, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — It happened to Ronald Reagan, and it is happening to George W. Bush.

This week, the administration agreed to sit down with Iran and Syria at a conference on stabilizing Iraq. Two weeks ago, Bush agreed to provide aid to North Korea if it freezes its nuclear program. In February, the administration stepped in to revive peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians — something it declined to do for six years.

IRAQ CONFERENCE: U.S. may meet with Iran, Syria

The Bush administration has "come to the conclusion that there are limits to military power and that in diplomacy, it's often more necessary to talk to your opponents than your friends," says Richard Armitage, deputy secretary of State during Bush's first term.

On Wednesday, White House spokesman Tony Snow said Bush isn't changing positions.

"This is not a crack in the wall," he said of plans to meet with Iran and Syria. "It is another example, though, of the United States working diplomatically."

Bush's moves recall Reagan in 1986 after his administration was damaged by revelations it secretly sold weapons to Iran and used the money to fund anti-communist guerrillas in Nicaragua. Weakened by the Iran-contra scandal, Reagan shuffled his Cabinet and intensified arms-control talks with the Soviet Union.

Foreign policy experts say they see a new pragmatism in the Bush administration.

Bush's new flexibility is a result of his desire to salvage his Iraq policy and tamp down other crises around the globe, says Richard Haass, head of the Council on Foreign Relations. "It's ironic that what was a war of choice (in Iraq) has narrowed the administration's choices and forced it to adopt a more traditional foreign policy."

Personnel changes might have smoothed the way. When Donald Rumsfeld was Defense secretary, the Pentagon took on foreign policy roles that traditionally went to State Department diplomats. Now, "you have more of a team player" in Robert Gates, Rumsfeld's successor, says Bruce Riedel, a former National Security Council official. Gates "recognizes the importance of diplomacy and (sees) how overstretched his resources are," Riedel says.

Anne-Marie Slaughter, dean of the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs at Princeton University, says Vice President Cheney and the Pentagon have seen their influence wane. "The State Department is once again running foreign policy," she says.

In an interview Wednesday on CNN, Cheney dismissed that idea: "I get to give (Bush) my advice. And sometimes he takes it, sometimes he doesn't. That's always been the deal."

Conservatives say the administration's recent moves could embolden U.S. foes. North Korea's behavior has "gotten worse," and Iran is likely to speed efforts to build nuclear weapons, says Danielle Pletka, vice president at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank.

Recent administration moves include:

•North Korea. The United States and four other countries agreed to give North Korea fuel oil if it shuts down a program that has produced plutonium for nuclear weapons. The accord is similar to a 1994 pact Bush criticized when he came into office. Also, U.S. and North Korean officials meet next week to discuss steps toward normal ties after decades of hostility.

•Iran. The administration says it will join Iran and Syria at the Iraq conference this month. It has resisted talks with both and pushed sanctions and banking restrictions to isolate Iran.

•Middle East peace. Bush sought to isolate Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and declined calls to try to broker Israeli-Palestinian peace. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice now says Bush is determined to see progress toward a Middle East peace deal before leaving office.

"In the last two years of an administration, … you focus on what's doable," says Kenneth Duberstein, Reagan's last chief of staff. "You all of a sudden get realistic and pragmatic."

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

CAIRO, Feb. 23 — Ali Mezar has spent his life fishing a narrow, muddy patch of the Nile in this, one of the most crowded cities in the world. But Mr. Mezar has little contact with urban civilization. He sleeps in his boat, makes tea from the dirty Nile water and on good days earns a few dollars.

Not far away, on the shoulder of a busy avenue, Karim Sayed, 21, herds sheep and goats matted with urban filth. He spends his days staring into oncoming traffic, hoping to make a sale before the police move him or confiscate a sheep.

At the city's edge, in a packed neighborhood built entirely by its residents, Mina Fathy and his neighbors fix sewerage, water and electricity problems on their own because they say the government offers them virtually no service in such functions.

Cairo is home to 15 million and often described as the center of the Arab world, an incubator of culture and ideas. But it is also a collection of villages, a ruralized metropolis where people live by their wits and devices, cut off from the authorities, the law and often each other.

That social reality does not just speak to the quality and style of life for millions of Egyptians. It also plays a role in the nation's style of governance.

The fisherman on the Nile, the shepherd in the road and residents of so-called informal communities say their experiences navigating city life have taught them the same lessons: the government is not there to better their lives; advancement is based on connections and bribes; the central authority is at best a benign force to be avoided.

"Everything is from God," said Mr. Mezar, the fisherman, who was speaking practically, not theologically. "There is no such thing as government. The government is one thing, and we are something else. What am I going to get from the government?"

Cairo has been the capital of Egypt for more than 1,000 years, and sits where the dry sands of the desert lead to the fertile Nile Delta. Egyptian officials like to say that this is where modern bureaucracy was invented, where the mechanics of governance first took shape.

While the Egyptian government is the country's largest employer, it is by all accounts an utterly unreliable source of help for the average citizen. That combination, social scientists say, helps create a system that has stifled political opposition and allowed a small group to remain in power for decades.

One brick in the foundation of single-party rule has been public resignation. There is no widespread expectation that the authorities will give the common man a voice, and so there is rarely any outrage when they do not. The fisherman, the shepherd and Mr. Fathy all said that the most they could hope for from the government was that it stay out of their lives.

"We hope God keeps the municipality away from us," Mr. Sayed said as he sat in a wooden chair, surveying his fetid flock of goats and sheep with headlights streaming by.

Such a feeling of separation is one reason that the leadership has been able to clamp down on opposition political activities without incurring widespread public wrath, political analysts say.

"People see the government as something quite foreign or removed from their lives," said Diane Singerman, a professor in government at American University in Washington who has written extensively about Cairo. "Commuters to the city, or poor peddlers and working people, do not see the government as particularly interested in their lives, and they also see politics as quite elite and risky and something to stay away from."

Officials say part of the disillusionment comes from unrealistic expectations, a holdover from the heady days of Gamal Abdel Nasser, Egypt's leader from 1954 to 1970, when government jobs were deemed a right and cradle-to-grave care a promise.

Mr. Mezar and his cousin Muhammad Hassan fish the Nile just as their parents and their grandparents did, living in the bottom of their small wooden boats. Dark from the sun, hands callused from their oars, they are the image of Egypt, and they often smile and wave dutifully as tour boats motor up the river, with tourists snapping their pictures.

They dock their boats beneath a busy overpass, waking each morning at 6, filling their glasses with tea made from water scooped directly from the Nile. They worry that despite their fishing licenses, the police will demand their fish or write a ticket for some invented infraction.

"There is only despair," Mr. Hassan said as he slowly rowed while his son, Rageb, 22, stood barefoot on the front of the boat putting out the net. "It is all about connections. If you know someone, you get 20 jobs. If not, you get nothing."

He said they knew about bilharzia, the life-threatening parasite in the slow-moving waters on the edge of the Nile, but their priority is catching fish.

"We get checked for bilharzia," he said.

"Really?" he was asked.

"No, never," he replied, shaking his head.

There were four boats working the river one morning, including Mr. Hassan's. The crews were all relatives of his. No one expressed anger — or depression. Only resignation.

"I am sick of Egypt," Mr. Mezar said. "I like fishing, but you see, are there any fish? I would give all of this if the government gave me a job."

Cairo has grown like a living organism, swallowing up agricultural lands and villages as its population has ballooned. Nearly three-quarters of the population live like Mr. Fathy, in informal communities.

Mr. Fathy comes from Manshiet Nasser, a sprawling labyrinth of brick apartment buildings along trash-strewn dirt roads that is home to hundreds of thousands of people. Informal communities are not shantytowns, but neighborhoods that grew organically, without any urban planning. People simply built homes, some buying agricultural land, some squatting on desert land.

The nature of these communities has bred a sense of distance and alienation from the government, experts in Cairo's life say. The government only provided services when the neighborhoods reached a critical mass, when the numbers of people could no longer be ignored. Few have schools. Roads are so narrow that police trucks cannot enter. Electricity is pirated. Order is established by the community, independent from the authorities.

"My impression is that they think they are something different from the rest of the city," said Abdel Halim Ibrahim Abdel Halim, an urban planner and architect. "They feel like they provided housing for themselves, they control that housing."

Residents of Manshiet Nasser, which is on a plateau, often refer to those in the formal center of the city as "people who come from under," as Salah Ibrahim, 40, meant when he said, "People who come from under never listen to us." He said a road in front of his house had been flooded with sewage for days until, finally, the neighbors all donated money to have it repaired.

"Every house is on its own," said Mr. Fathy, who said he had paid a bribe of 2,000 pounds, about $350, when inspectors insisted that he tear down the third-floor apartment he was building on top of his parents' building. "Every house has to solve its own problems."

Sarkozy Outlines Foreign Policy For France (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 28 — The center-right presidential candidate Nicolas Sarkozy wants to toughen sanctions against Iran, keep Turkey out of the European Union, create an independent European defense strategy and have a friendly but not a submissive relationship with the United States.

Unveiling his foreign policy on Wednesday, Mr. Sarkozy, who is the interior minister and head of the governing party, the Union for a Popular Movement, called the American-led invasion of Iraq a "historic mistake" and thanked President Jacques Chirac for his "lucidity" in keeping France out of it.

But Mr. Sarkozy was vague about what the United States should do in Iraq. He warned that withdrawing American troops too soon would "lead to chaos" but said avoiding a withdrawal would lead the Iraqis to "react with more violence, and that would benefit the terrorists."

With a speech and a news conference on Wednesday, Mr. Sarkozy sharpened his message, subtly portraying himself as tougher and more reliable on national security than his main rival, the Socialist candidate Ségolène Royal.

He defined Iran as the most urgent issue he would face if elected, saying, "The idea of an Iran with nuclear weapons is unacceptable."

But he parted company with Ms. Royal, who has said Iran must be denied even a civilian nuclear program. Mr. Sarkozy branded her position as irresponsible, adding that France should help other countries build nuclear power plants, beginning with Algeria, its former colony.

Mr. Sarkozy enjoys a slight lead over Ms. Royal in the first round of the French presidential election on April 22, according to some opinion polls. Even so, a high level of voters have expressed only tepid support for either of them.

Without mentioning Ms. Royal by name, Mr. Sarkozy sought to create distance between them. He pledged to keep French military spending at 2 percent of the gross domestic product, suggesting that it was unfair that France and Britain were the only two members of the European Union to spend enough and make sacrifices for defense. He called it important, for example, for France to build a second aircraft carrier.

Ms. Royal, by contrast, said this month that France should take the money earmarked for the carrier and spend it on education and research instead.

At the time, Mr. Sarkozy criticized her proposal as a "curious idea," and Defense Minister Michèle Alliot-Marie, a Sarkozy supporter, called it "irresponsible."

In his remarks on Wednesday, Mr. Sarkozy said human rights would be a cornerstone of his foreign policy, adding that the president of France should speak out against abuses in China and Russia.

Ms. Royal, during a recent trip to China, seemed to compliment her hosts in saying, "Sometimes the justice is swifter than in France." The period between arrest and execution can be only weeks in China's repressive justice system, and she was criticized by human rights advocates and her political foes as naïve.

Since Mr. Sarkozy's trip last September to the United States, where he lavished praise on the country and was granted — at his request — a meeting and a photo session with President Bush, Mr. Sarkozy has sought to assure French voters that he will not bend to the will of America.

"I ask our American friends to let us be free, free to be their friends," he said Wednesday.

To underscore his independence from the United States, he cited his opposition to Turkey's entry into the 27-country European Union, which the Bush administration has strongly promoted.

"President Bush is very attached to the idea that Turkey become a member of the E.U.," Mr. Sarkozy said. "So you will judge my capacity for independence from the U.S. For me, it's no. Turkey is not meant to join the E.U., because Turkey is not a European country."

Ms. Royal has yet to devote an entire speech and news conference to foreign policy. Instead, she has found herself on the defensive for a number of offhand remarks in that field.

Last month, for example, she created a diplomatic firestorm when she shifted some of her positions along the way and suggested that she was sympathetic to independence for Quebec. Her comment was sharply criticized by Canada's prime minister, Stephen Harper, who said, "Experience teaches that it is highly inappropriate for a foreign leader to interfere in the democratic affairs of another country."

A few days later, a well-known French comedian and prankster, Gérald Dahan, trapped Ms. Royal by tape-recording a telephone call with her in which he feigned a Quebec accent and posed as the province's premier, Jean Charest. Mr. Dahan said Ms. Royal's comments on Quebec would be as damaging as if he were to support independence for the French Mediterranean island of Corsica.

"The French would not be against this, by the way," Ms. Royal responded in the recording, which was played on the radio. "Don't repeat that. It will create another incident in France. It's a secret."

Mr. Sarkozy pounced on her words, saying: "For me, Corsica is not a joke. It is the Republic."

Ms. Royal was also widely criticized during a trip to the Middle East in December in which she did not speak out when a Hezbollah member of the Lebanese Parliament compared Israel to Nazi Germany.

Mr. Sarkozy came under fire this week, not on foreign policy, but an issue much closer to home.

The satirical investigative weekly Le Canard Enchaîné reported in its current issue that Mr. Sarkozy had received close to $400,000 in rebates on the 1997 purchase and renovation of his apartment in Neuilly, an upscale Paris suburb, where he was mayor from 1983 to 2002.

The paper, citing local property transaction records, said Mr. Sarkozy had paid 12 to 35 percent less per square meter than his neighbors to Lasserre, the real estate development company that sold him the apartment and was granted a number of real estate permits in Neuilly over the years.

Mr. Sarkozy denied the allegation on Tuesday, adding that the regional tax department confirmed in 1997 that the purchase had been made at the market price.

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S. Judge Finds Padilla Competent To Face Trial (NYT)

By Deborah Sontag

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 28 — A federal judge found Jose Padilla competent to stand trial on terrorism conspiracy charges Wednesday, granting a significant victory to the government in the high-profile criminal case of a United States citizen who was initially designated an "enemy combatant" and held without charges.

After three and a half days of an intensely argued hearing, Judge Marcia G. Cooke of Federal District Court rejected the defense lawyers' request that Mr. Padilla be sent to a hospital for psychiatric treatment so that he could be "healed" from what they said was post-traumatic stress disorder caused during his three years and eight months in military detention.

"This defendant clearly has the capacity to assist his attorneys," Judge Cooke said, adding that Mr. Padilla's case was "unique" and that "he understands that."

Judge Cooke, who allowed limited testimony from brig officials during the competency hearing, said that her ruling should not be construed as a finding on Mr. Padilla's claims of mistreatment during his detention and interrogations at a military brig in South Carolina.

"Those claims are for another day," she said, referring to another pending motion by Mr. Padilla that the charges against him be dismissed because of "outrageous government conduct."

The threshold for legal competency is low, requiring a criminal defendant to have the capacity, on a basic level, both to understand the proceedings and to communicate with his lawyers. Most incompetency claims in federal court are denied, said Christopher Slobogin, an expert in law and psychiatry at the University of Florida, and most defendants found incompetent are clearly psychotic.

Mr. Padilla is not. Throughout the competency hearing, Mr. Padilla, wearing a tan prison jumpsuit and wire-rimmed glasses, appeared alert. When the brig officials testified Monday, he dropped his head and "hunkered down," as one of his lawyers described it, but at all others times he sat erectly and calmly, without displaying the tics and grimaces that his lawyers described as manifestations of his disorder.

Judge Cooke remarked on Mr. Padilla's attentiveness in court and noted that "everyone discussed that Mr. Padilla is polite almost to a fault."

His comportment, Mr. Padilla's lawyers argued, is not the problem. Rather, they said, the trauma of his interrogations — at least 87 videotaped interrogations have been turned over to them, indicating a substantial amount of questioning — had rendered him incapable to assist in his own defense. He refuses, they said, to discuss the facts of his cases, insisting that he has already told them everything when, they said, he has told them nothing.

Before she ruled this afternoon, Judge Cooke asked the government about that. "If the defendant refuses to discuss vast sections of his case, is that in and of itself not inability to assist counsel?" she said.

But prosecutors maintained that Mr. Padilla was capable of consulting with his lawyers and that any failure to do so was willful. John C. Shipley, an assistant United States attorney, said that Mr. Padilla was a principal source of information for his lawyers' accusations of mistreatment in military detention.

"It doesn't make sense that if the root of the defendant's hesitancy to talk" was his treatment in the brig, Mr. Shipley said, that the brig would be the only thing he discussed with his lawyers.

Mr. Padilla's lawyers said that they and their mental health experts only slowly elicited information about his time in military detention, largely by asking him yes and no questions.

The defense lawyers also said that Mr. Padilla opposed their efforts to have him found incompetent to stand trial, which they said was further evidence of his irrationality. He would rather spend his life in prison than spend a few months in a psychiatric hospital, they said.

With a trial scheduled for mid-April, Mr. Padilla and two other defendants are accused of participating in a "North American support cell" that provided money, goods and recruits abroad to assist "global jihad."

Suspected Al-Qaida Operative Competent To Stand Trial, U.S. Judge Rules (AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0138469

(AP) - MIAMI-A federal judge ruled Wednesday that suspected al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla is competent to stand trial on terrorism support charges, rejecting arguments that he was severely damaged by 3 1/2 years of interrogation and isolation in a military brig.

Padilla was in court when U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke announced her decision, but he showed no reaction.

"This defendant clearly has the capacity to assist his attorneys," Cooke said just hours after she finished four days of competency hearings.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen and Muslim convert, was arrested in 2002 in Chicago in what U.S. authorities initially claimed was a mission to set off a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major city. He was held without criminal charge after President George W. Bush declared him an enemy combatant.

Amid a legal clash over Bush's wartime detention powers, Padilla was added to a Miami terrorism support case in late 2005. That indictment does not mention the "dirty bomb" plot.

Defense attorneys and federal prosecutors declined to immediately comment on the judge's ruling.

Padilla's lawyers had asked Cooke to order that their client be treated for post-traumatic stress disorder, which they contend stems from years of isolation and interrogation while in military custody.

Cooke said testimony in the competency hearing showed that Padilla understands "legal nuances" of pretrial motions and noted that he had signed a document verifying the truth of allegations made by the defense that he was tortured and mistreated during his years in a Navy brig in Charleston, South Carolina.

"At some time, the defendant was able to discuss some things with his lawyers," Cooke said. "The defendant's situation is unique. He understands that."

Bush administration officials vehemently deny that Padilla was mistreated, and Cooke said her decision on competency should not be read as a ruling on those claims. "That discussion is for another day," she said.

Padilla is charged along with two co-defendants with being part of a North American terror support cell that provided money, recruits and supplies to Islamic extremists around the world. All three have pleaded not guilty and face possible life imprisonment.

A trial is set to begin April 16.

"Give him nothing more than any defendant deserves and receives in this country," Natale said.

A court-appointed psychologist who works for the U.S. Bureau of Prisons rejected the defense's claim that post-traumatic stress disorder impaired Padilla's ability to assist his lawyers. The psychologist concluded Padilla is competent, even if he has some anxiety and anti-social personality problems.

Prosecutors contended that Padilla, a Muslim convert, attended an al-Qaida camp in Afghanistan that included indoctrination on resistance if captured. Assistant U.S. Attorney John Shipley suggested that indoctrination was behind his choice not to cooperate on some issues.

"That is a decision made by this defendant. That doesn't mean he's incompetent," Shipley said. "The issue is whether the defendant has the capacity to assist." 2007-02-28T21:36:27Z

Judge Rules Padilla Is Competent To Stand Trial (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 28 -- A federal judge ruled Wednesday that Jose Padilla is competent to stand trial on terrorism charges, rejecting lawyers' allegations that torture inflicted during his military incarceration has rendered him psychologically unable to mount a defense.

The ruling leaves aside for now the question of whether Padilla, accused of being an al-Qaeda operative, was mistreated during his 3 1/2 -year confinement in the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., after being declared an "enemy combatant" by President Bush.

Instead, the ruling found that whether or not he was abused, Padilla is currently capable of understanding the legal proceedings and their consequences, and that he can assist his attorneys. That is enough under legal standards to find him fit for trial.

"This defendant is a knowing participant" in the proceedings, U.S. District Judge Marcia G. Cooke said.

In legal pleadings and an affidavit filed by Padilla's attorneys on his behalf, the defense has asserted that during his stay at the brig, the 36-year-old was subject to isolation in a 7-by-9-foot cell with no view to the outside world, was deprived of sleep, a clock and reading materials, and was hooded and forced to assume "stress positions" for long periods of time. He was also, they alleged, threatened with imminent execution.

While U.S. officials say Padilla was treated humanely, a pending defense motion asks that the charges against him be thrown out because of mistreatment.

"Through its illegal conduct, the government has forfeited its right to prosecute," according to the motion.

In ruling, Cooke said explicitly that the competency decision leaves open the questions raised by those allegations. "That discussion is for another day," she said.

The defense had argued that Padilla was unfit for trial because the alleged mistreatment made him too fearful or too distracted to assist in his own defense -- a defect that could render him legally incompetent.

Defense attorney Andrew Patel took the stand to testify that Padilla has consistently refused to review the taped conversations that are at the core of the prosecution case.

"We have gotten no useful information from Mr. Padilla, directly," he said.

A forensic psychiatrist and a forensic psychologist hired by the defense had depicted Padilla as "broken man" who suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder. Questions about the brig provoked sweating and involuntary facial grimaces, they said.

The technical director for the brig, while denying any knowledge of physical abuse, testified that at times Padilla has been deprived of a clock, a mattress and windows, and that on two occasions he was weeping.

All in all, the defense argued, Padilla is now unable to assist his attorneys.

In her ruling, however, Cooke disagreed, citing both his courtroom demeanor -- he appears attentive -- and his role in signing an affidavit alleging the torture. A Bureau of Prisons psychologist who spoke with Padilla also noted that he seemed very knowledgeable about key developments in the case and could discuss them.

Padilla appears "keenly aware" of motions in court, Cooke said, and "clearly has the capacity to assist his attorneys."

Legal experts noted that it is very difficult for defendants to make the case that they are incompetent to stand trial.

"The hurdle that a defendant has to overcome in a competency hearing is very high," said Carl Tobias, a professor of constitutional law at the University of Richmond who has studied terrorism cases since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. "Those motions are rarely granted and it shouldn't be a surprise that it wasn't granted here."

Terror Suspect Padilla OK To Stand Trial, Judge Rules (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

MIAMI -- Suspected al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla is competent to stand trial on terrorism charges because he understands the case against him and has shown himself capable of assisting in his own defense, a federal judge ruled Wednesday.

The decision by U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke was a victory for the government, which has alleged in a three-count indictment that Padilla was part of a North American terror cell that recruited, trained and supported Islamic militants seeking to carry out acts of violence.

Anthony Natale, lead attorney on Padilla's four-man public defender team, had argued a few hours earlier at the conclusion of a four-day hearing that Cooke should find his client unfit to proceed. Natale urged Cooke to send Padilla to a mental hospital where he could be treated for what the defense claimed are debilitating anxiety and Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder.

The defense had contended Padilla, a 36-year-old former Chicago gang member, was mentally damaged by the 3 1/2 years he was held without charges at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C. The lawyers say Padilla was deprived of human contact and subjected to dehumanizing stresses that amounted to torture.

Cooke prefaced her ruling by saying she might conduct another hearing at which she would take testimony on the torture allegations before Padilla's trial, set to begin April 16. The defense has moved for dismissal of the case on the grounds of "outrageous government conduct" during Padilla's time in the brig.

"That discussion is for another day," she said of the allegations of mistreatment. She also said her ruling Wednesday did not prejudice her potential consideration of Padilla's brig experiences.

The judge pointed to the October 2006 defense motion detailing the alleged abuses in military custody as evidence that the defendant comprehends the legal proceedings and can provide his lawyers meaningful information when he wants to.

"This defendant clearly has the capacity to assist his attorneys," she said. "He had to communicate something to his lawyers in order for counsel to file that motion."

Cooke also appeared to fault Padilla for failing to cooperate fully with three mental health professionals who attempted to conduct mental fitness tests. Two experts hired by the defense diagnosed Padilla with Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder, while the court-ordered psychological evaluator said the defendant was fit for trial and that any failure to collaborate with his lawyers was "volitional."

Padilla, in tan cotton prison garb, sandals and shackles, stood impassively as Cooke read her decision. He shook hands with Natale and gave him a rueful smile.

Padilla, a U.S. citizen of Puerto Rican ancestry who converted to Islam during a previous prison sentence, was arrested at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport in May 2002, when he returned from at least six years abroad, including time in Egypt, Pakistan and Afghanistan.

Then-Attorney General John Ashcroft accused Padilla of being part of a plot to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" on a U.S. city, and President Bush declared Padilla an enemy combatant. Padilla was sent to the brig, where he reportedly endured months of sensory deprivation followed by alternating extremes of light and darkness, silence and noise.

As the Supreme Court was pondering a ruling on the extent of the president's powers to hold a U.S. citizen indefinitely without charges, the government indicted Padilla for conspiracy and material support to terrorism in November 2005. He was transferred two months later from the brig to the federal court system.

The Jose Padilla Trial (NYT)

There were so many reasons to be appalled by President Bush's decision to detain people illegally and subject them to mental and physical abuse. The unfolding case of Jose Padilla reminds us of one of the most important: mistreating a prisoner makes it hard, if not impossible, for a real court to judge whether he has committed real crimes.

Mr. Padilla is a former Chicago gang member whose arrest in 2002 was touted by the Bush administration as the disruption of a high-level plot by Al Qaeda to set off a "dirty bomb" in the United States. Mr. Padilla was held without charge for three years and eight months in a Navy brig, his windows blackened, his every move watched. Then, rather than defend its actions before the Supreme Court, the White House declared a year ago that Mr. Padilla was no longer an illegal combatant, transferred him to civilian custody and filed conspiracy charges that have nothing to do with dirty bombs.

Yesterday, Judge Marcia Cooke of the Federal District Court in Miami ruled against Mr. Padilla's defense lawyers, who argued that his abusive confinement was so traumatic that he could not assist them in a trial. They had wanted to send Mr. Padilla to a hospital for treatment first.

That still leaves the far bigger question of whether Mr. Padilla was tortured, as he has claimed. For there to be a trial, Judge Cooke will have to rule that Mr. Padilla was not tortured, and she made a point of saying yesterday that her ruling on his competence was not a judgment on the torture claim.

At one point in the mental competency hearing, a prosecutor wanted to introduce what he said was a Qaeda manual instructing captured operatives to claim torture even if none had occurred. Judge Cooke refused, pointing out that there was no evidence that Mr. Padilla had ever heard of the manual, much less studied it. The government has yet to show evidence that Mr. Padilla was even a member of Al Qaeda.

The government's arguments at the hearing sounded ridiculous and shameful. Prosecutors said Mr. Padilla always seemed fine to his jailers, but it was his jailers who did things like standing on his bare feet with boots so they could shackle him. The brig psychologist testified that he had spoken to Mr. Padilla only twice, once when he was first detained, and two years later — through a slit in his cell door.

When a psychologist testified for the defense that Mr. Padilla was "an anxiety-ridden, broken individual," the prosecution said her tests were invalid — because the jailers had kept Mr. Padilla handcuffed throughout.

We will probably never know if Mr. Padilla was a would-be terrorist. So far, this trial has been a reminder of how Mr. Bush's policy on prisoners has compromised the judicial process. And it has confirmed the world's suspicions of the United States' stooping to the very behavior it once stood against.

President Convenes Bipartisan Terror Panel (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Despite initial wariness from Democrats, President Bush finally convened a bipartisan working group to advise him on terrorism, sitting down at the White House yesterday to discuss the deteriorating conditions in Afghanistan with senior lawmakers from both parties.

When he unveiled his new Iraq policy in January, Bush mentioned his interest in forming such a group as a way of improving relations with Congress. Democrats initially balked out of concern that Bush would be dictating the subject and the people present, congressional aides said.

What now appears to have emerged is a plan to have regular meetings to discuss key national security issues with an evolving cast of participants from Capitol Hill, according to congressional and White House aides. The first subject to be taken up was Afghanistan, where a resurgent Taliban movement is posing a strong challenge to the government led by Hamid Karzai and the American and European forces trying to help it stabilize the country.

As described by people present yesterday, the initial meeting lasted more than an hour and included presentations from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Vice President Cheney, who briefed lawmakers on his just-completed trip to Pakistan and Afghanistan.

Judge Rejects Request By Muslim Charity (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

A federal judge in Dallas has denied a request to declassify thousands of pages of FBI evidence in the prosecution of a Muslim charity, but said it was disturbing that a recently unsealed document falsely accused charity officials of anti-Jewish slurs.

In his ruling against lawyers for the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, U.S. District Judge A. Joe Fish concluded there was insufficient evidence to show the inaccuracies were part of a "widespread problem" with the government's evidence.

At the same time, Fish advised defense lawyers to return to court if they found more government summaries that were "significantly inaccurate or misleading."

The now-defunct Muslim charity and seven former officials face criminal charges alleging financial ties to the Islamic militant group Hamas, which the U.S. considers a terrorist organization.

Fish, agreeing with the government, said there was no justification for a defense request to declassify about 10 years' worth of surveillance based on the apparent fabrications found in the government's April 15, 1996, surveillance summary.

The document claimed that two Holy Land officials now facing trial made anti-Jewish remarks. But their supposed comments are not in the transcripts.

The alleged remarks included one Holy Land official calling Israel "the government of the demons" and telling a colleague, "Even Jesus Christ had called the Jews and their high priests … the sons of snakes and scorpions."

The judge said he found it disturbing that the government's summary included inflammatory language not found in the transcripts.

Defense lawyers and prosecutors had no comment Wednesday on the ruling.

In their motion, defense lawyers said they had recently received declassified summaries representing about 10% of the conversations recorded by the government in court-authorized surveillance. They worried that additional discrepancies could exist in the documents.

"During the limited period that [we have] had access to declassified transcripts, we have discovered other errors both technical and contextual," defense lawyers wrote in their motion.

They said additional errors included a document that was "summarized inaccurately" and misled them in assessing whether potential witnesses were likely to help or hurt the defense.

The Holy Land Foundation, once the nation's largest Muslim charity, was closed by the government five years ago. Its former officials are accused of providing money to overseas charities controlled by Hamas.

The defendants deny any links to terrorism or knowledge that charities they funded had ties to Hamas.

The defendants also noted that some of the overseas charities linked in the indictment to terrorists had been supported by numerous groups, including the U.S. Agency for International Development.

Judge denies request to unseal records but calls discrepancy 'disturbing'

A federal judge in Dallas has denied a request to declassify thousands of pages of FBI evidence in the prosecution of a Muslim charity but called it "disturbing" that one recently unsealed document falsely accused charity officials of anti-Jewish slurs.

In his ruling against lawyers for the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, U.S. District Judge Joe Fish concluded there was insufficient evidence to show the inaccuracies were part of a "widespread problem" with the government's evidence.

At the same time, Judge Fish advised defense lawyers to return to court if they find more government summaries that are "significantly inaccurate or misleading."

The now-defunct Muslim charity and seven former officials face criminal charges alleging financial ties to Hamas, which has been designated a foreign terrorist organization by the U.S.

Agreeing with the government, Judge Fish said there was no justification for a defense request to declassify almost 10 years' of surveillance based on the apparent fabrications found in the government's April 15, 1996, surveillance summary. The document claimed that two of the Holy Land officials now facing trial made remarks that are not in the actual transcripts of surveillance.

The alleged remarks included one Holy Land official calling Israel "the government of the demons" and telling a colleague: "Even Jesus Christ had called the Jews and their high priests ... the sons of snakes and scorpions."

The judge said he found it "disturbing" that the government summary included inflammatory language not found in the transcript.

But in their original motion, defense attorneys said they only recently had received declassified summaries representing about 10 percent of the conversations recorded by the government in court-authorized surveillance. They signaled that additional discrepancies might exist.

"During the limited period that [we have] had access to declassified transcripts, we have discovered other errors both technical and contextual," Holy Land lawyers wrote in their earlier motion.

The Holy Land foundation was closed by the government five years ago for allegedly serving as a fundraising front for Hamas. The defendants have denied any links to terrorism or knowledge that other charities they funded had ties to Hamas.

U.S. Won't Send CIA Defendants To Italy (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

BERLIN, Feb. 28 -- The State Department's top lawyer said Wednesday that the United States would refuse to extradite CIA officers who face kidnapping charges in Italy, warning that European criminal prosecutions of U.S. agents were harming transatlantic counterterrorism efforts.

An Italian court issued indictments against 25 CIA operatives and a U.S. Air Force officer Feb. 16, charging them with kidnapping a radical Muslim cleric in Milan four years ago. Although the Italian government has not made a final decision on whether to ask the United States to extradite the defendants, John B. Bellinger III, legal adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, said the request would be rejected regardless.

"If we got an extradition request from Italy, we would not extradite U.S. officials to Italy," Bellinger told reporters in Brussels, where he was meeting with European Union officials.

Bellinger's statement was the first time that a U.S. government official has directly addressed the Italian criminal investigation, which is expected to produce the first overseas trial of CIA officers involved in a covert counterterrorism operation.

The trial is scheduled to open June 8 in Milan. Italian prosecutors say they will try the American defendants in absentia, if necessary. Five Italian spies, including the former head of military intelligence, have also been charged.

In a separate case, a German court issued arrest warrants Jan. 31 for 13 CIA operatives accused of kidnapping a German citizen in Macedonia in December 2003. German authorities have said they are unlikely to make a formal extradition request to the U.S. government or go to trial. But the ongoing European criminal investigations and other probes into CIA activity on the Continent have soured relations with the Bush administration.

"I do think these continuing investigations can harm intelligence cooperation -- that's simply a fact of life," Bellinger said Wednesday. He also criticized a recent investigation by the European Parliament into CIA counterterrorism operations, calling the legislature's findings "unbalanced, inaccurate and unfair."

Many European lawmakers and human rights groups have accused the CIA of violating European sovereignty and international law by covertly apprehending and detaining terrorism suspects on the Continent. They have also criticized European intelligence services for taking part in the operations or failing to stop them.

"Instead of stonewalling investigations into its and other governments' illegal renditions activities, the United States should support its allies' efforts to bring perpetrators to justice," Jumana Musa, Amnesty International's U.S. advocacy director for domestic human rights and international justice, said in a statement. "The United States must recognize that it has obligations under U.S. and international law to seek accountability for agents who participated in activities that led to torture."

US 'will Not Hand Over CIA Agents To Italy' (FT)

By Sarah Laitner

Washington would refuse any demand by Rome to give up alleged Central Intelligence Agency operatives to face criminal trial on charges that the agency abducted terror suspects, a leading US official said.

John Bellinger, legal adviser to the US secretary of state Condoleezza Rice, said in Brussels: "We have not gotten that extradition request from Italy. If we got an extradition request from Italy, we would not extradite US officials to Italy."

An Italian judge last month ordered 25 alleged CIA operatives and the former head of Italy's military intelligence service to go on trial on charges of kidnapping an Egyptian iman in Milan in 2003 and taking him to Egypt for interrogation.

Mr Bellinger, who was in Brussels to meet European legal advisers, is the first senior US official to say publicly that CIA agents would not be sent for trial abroad.

The US faces continued criticism from many Europeans over its contentious practice of kidnapping terrorist suspects on foreign soil after the September 11 attacks on America. In January, prosecutors in Germany issued arrest warrants for 13 alleged CIA operatives in connection with allegations that a German citizen was abducted and then detained in a secret Afghan prison.

Last month the European parliament accused some European governments of turning a blind eye to the illegal transportation of alleged terrorists through their countries to face possible torture. The Strasbourg chamber said that the UK, Germany, Poland and some other member states allowed CIA flights to stop over without proper controls.

Mr Bellinger branded that study "unbalanced, inaccurate and unfair", and cautioned that European probes into US officials could be damaging. "I do think that these continuing investigations can harm intelligence co-operation," he said.

PATRIOT ACT:

Suit Demands Details On Secret Court's Wiretap Ruling (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, February 28, 2007

Group seeks to learn if program requires individual warrants

A privacy rights group sued the Justice Department on Tuesday to try to pry loose a ruling by a secret court that the Bush administration says approved its clandestine wiretapping program.

The suit, if it succeeds, should answer an important question about the future of the program: whether the court will require individual warrants, with specific evidence, before allowing the government to intercept phone calls and e-mails between Americans and alleged terrorists in foreign countries.

In December 2005, President Bush confirmed a New York Times report that he had authorized the National Security Agency four years earlier to eavesdrop on such communications without obtaining warrants from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as required by a 1978 law.

A federal judge in Detroit declared the program unconstitutional in August, a ruling the administration has appealed. In San Francisco, another judge is considering more than 40 lawsuits accusing telecommunications companies of illegally collaborating with the program by allowing the National Security Agency to intercept messages and examine customer records.

The Electronic Frontier Foundation, a San Francisco organization that represents AT&T customers in one of the lawsuits, sued Tuesday in Washington, D.C., seeking disclosure of a pivotal Jan. 10 ruling by a judge of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

The ruling's existence was disclosed Jan. 17 by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who told the Senate Judiciary Committee that the judge had approved the surveillance, after lengthy negotiations, and that the program was now operating under authority of the foreign intelligence court.

Gonzales did not say, however, whether the judge was requiring a warrant in each case or instead had given overall approval to the program. The attorney general has refused to make the order public, although the Justice Department sent copies to the federal judge in San Francisco and the appeals court reviewing the Detroit ruling.

The department also disclosed the order to selected members of Congress, including leaders of the House and Senate judiciary committees. Tracy Schmaler, spokeswoman for Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said Leahy would like to see a declassified version made public and is exploring the subject with the Justice Department and the White House.

In Tuesday's lawsuit, the Electronic Frontier Foundation argued that the public was entitled to learn details of the order under the Freedom of Information Act.

"While national security and law enforcement demand a limited amount of secrecy, Americans have the right to know the government's basic guidelines for this kind of invasive electronic surveillance of their personal communications," said David Sobel, a lawyer for the organization.

By random draw, the case was assigned to U.S. District Judge James Robertson, who resigned from the foreign intelligence court after the December 2005 disclosure that the administration had been conducting surveillance without court review.

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said he couldn't comment on the suit, but noted that orders of the foreign intelligence court have historically been classified. The Jan. 10 order "contains very sensitive information, including sources and methods" of intelligence, Boyd said.

But Sobel said federal law prohibits agencies from keeping entire documents secret if parts of them could be released safely. Whether the foreign intelligence court will require wiretaps for each surveillance is "the kind of question that could be answered without compromising any national security interest," he said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

TSA Union Fight Threatens Anti-terror Bill (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democrats in Congress are pushing to let airport screeners unionize for the first time since the government took over aviation security after the 9/11 attacks.

Their effort has provoked a clash with the Bush administration and Republican lawmakers that could scuttle attempts to enact one of the broadest homeland security bills since 9/11.

Labor leaders say unionizing Transportation Security Administration (TSA) screeners would strengthen security by improving working conditions and reducing high attrition and injury rates, which cause staffing shortages.

TSA leaders say security would suffer because the agency could not quickly reassign screeners to counter new threats.

President Bush might veto any bill that would let TSA screeners unionize. Spokesman Scott Stanzel said senior Bush advisers in the White House and Homeland Security Department, which oversees the TSA, would recommend a veto of such a bill.

A White House statement expressed strong opposition to union rights for screeners, saying unionization could jeopardize the agency's ability to give screeners new assignments.

Thirty-six Republican senators signed a letter Tuesday saying they would support a presidential veto. That's enough senators to uphold a veto.

The showdown comes as the Senate begins debate on proposals to improve aviation and rail security and terrorism prevention by enacting some recommendations of the 9/11 Commission.

Democrats who control the Senate want to pass a broad anti-terrorism bill in coming weeks that includes a provision that would allow the nation's 43,000 airport screeners union representation.

The Democratic-controlled House of Representatives included an identical provision in a 277-page homeland security bill that passed last month. The 9/11 Commission did not address unionization.

Screeners have been barred from collective bargaining since the TSA was created shortly after 9/11.

Most civilian federal employees can be represented by a union, and many TSA sister agencies in the Homeland Security Department have unions.

TSA Administrator Kip Hawley said he would lose flexibility if he needed union approval before changing screener duties or if he had to fight a union to fire a negligent screener. "If we want to bring in new (security) equipment or move equipment, that's subject to negotiation and delay," Hawley said.

Hawley said unionization would cost the agency $160 million to hire labor lawyers and set up collective bargaining.

The nation's largest federal labor union says the TSA's scenario is a misleading scare tactic. A union would not block security procedures or training requirements but would ensure they were implemented fairly, said Mark Roth, a lawyer for the 600,000-member American Federation of Government Employees, which wants to represent screeners. "They can change screener duties, but we can make sure people get a fair opportunity to be trained to meet new qualifications," Roth said.

Roth said union representation could improve morale and reduce TSA injury and turnover rates, which are among the highest in the federal government.

Federal labor unions negotiate working conditions and are generally barred from negotiating pay and benefits, which are set by law. Federal law allows agencies to "take whatever actions may be necessary to carry out the agency mission during emergency."

States Get Extra Time On Launch Of 'Real ID' (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu And Stephen Barr

The Bush administration will allow states to postpone the planned May 2008 launch of a program to toughen security requirements for driver's licenses by up to 19 months, in response to complaints about the projected $11 billion cost and potential disruptions, congressional and Department of Homeland Security officials said yesterday.

The retreat came as the White House and the Democratic Congress headed for a showdown over a broad counterterrorism bill to implement many of the remaining recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission, which called for ways to make it more difficult to obtain fraudulent identification. President Bush threatened to veto the overall bill if the Senate joined the House in extending union protection to 45,000 federal airport screeners.

"The Administration vigorously disagrees with these provisions . . . which were not recommended by the 9/11 Commission," the White House said in a statement. Reducing the Transportation Security Administration's flexibility to deploy workers and meet new threats "would reduce travelers' security," the statement said.

As the Senate began debate on the bill yesterday, eight senators supported a push by Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine) to postpone the driver's license program by two years. They blamed the administration for failing until a scheduled announcement today to spell out what states must do to comply with the law, which was passed nearly two years ago.

Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) said the program, known as Real ID, was an unfunded federal mandate that would force governors and legislatures into unpopular choices such as raising taxes or tuition, or diverting money from education or health initiatives.

"We are for the first time in history creating a national ID card, with all the ramifications of that," Alexander said. "Let's make sure we know what we're doing."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff is expected this morning to lay out long-awaited requirements for states to standardize information to be included on licenses, verify applicants' citizenship status, and check information such as birth certificates and driver histories with other state and federal databases.

Only IDs that meet the new standard will be acceptable for federal purposes such as boarding airplanes or entering courthouses.

A senior Homeland Security official, speaking on the condition of anonymity pending the official release, said that although the Real ID law set a May 2008 deadline, the administration is interpreting that as requiring states to be able to begin issuing compliant IDs by that time. They will be allowed to replace all 245 million licenses held by Americans on a "reasonably prompt basis" over five years.

States that could justify their requests for more time would be granted waivers, the official said. Although details were still being worked out and could change, two congressional GOP sources said DHS would in effect set a start date at the end of 2009, similar to Collins's proposal.

The fight presaged a difficult two-week debate over reforms backed by the panel that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Earlier this week, 36 Republican senators lined up behind Bush's veto threat, enough to defeat any override attempt. A similar battle in 2002 delayed creation of the Homeland Security Department.

Addressing reporters, sponsor Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) noted that the bill included $3.3 billion for emergency communications, $3.1 billion a year for five years for risk-based grants to states, and stronger rail, aviation and port security measures.

"Is it worth stopping all the improvements of homeland security, adopting the recommendations of the 9/11 commission that have such bipartisan support . . . for one provision that gives quite moderate to weak employee rights, frankly, to people who work every day as screeners?" Lieberman said.

Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) proposed a deal to give TSA workers "very basic" rights, such as whistle-blower protections, a spokeswoman said, which TSA chief Kip Hawley said could be acceptable.

But John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, said workers would not settle for such changes.

Border Patrol officers and customs agents within the Homeland Security Department, and Capitol Police and state and local police and firefighters, enjoy collective bargaining rights, Gage said. Workers from TSA reported injury and illness rates in 2006 that were six times the 5 percent average for all federal employees, and an attrition rate 10 times the 2.2 percent average for federal civilians, he said.

Transit Security Requires Chaotic Approach (USAT)

By Frank J. Cilluffo And Laura P.

USA Today, March 1, 2007

From Moscow, Madrid and Mumbai to London, Tokyo and Paris, trains and subways have provided ideal targets for terrorists. Given the low security measures, high numbers of passengers, and mass transit's critical economic significance, attacks on these transport systems potentially have the biggest impact for the lowest cost.

In response to the 2005 attacks on the London Underground and buses that killed 52 people, British authorities enhanced their security. The measures include evacuation plans for all 275 stations; regular multiagency emergency drills; staff training in evacuation and safety procedures; and randomly screening passengers and their packages.

Most U.S. subways have implemented some measures such as closing public restrooms and removing trash bins, and more than two thirds of rail systems have completed risk assessment exercises. But the U.S. government has not formalized rail security standards, identified "best practices," or completed an overall rail security strategy, three things Congress has called on it to do.

How do we prevent what appears to be inevitable? One possible solution is to create security plans that can be executed with a high level of unpredictability and flexibility — a strategy of chaos. Rather than copy the air transport model by imposing a police presence on all trains or screening all passengers and packages, rail security plans should emphasize random and frequent security searches. Chaotic tactics could thwart terrorists' attempts to plan and execute attacks.

No number of screenings, canine teams, special security teams, cameras or sensors will prevent terrorists from devising ways to circumvent security measures. Besides creating a lumbering security regime that would result in commuter gridlock, any such scheme imposed on rail systems would require an infinite amount of funding. There is no such thing as zero risk, but we can certainly displace risk by using a strategy of chaos.

A strategy of chaos does not mean security "on the cheap." House homeland security committee Chairman Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., notes that for every $9 we spend per passenger we spend on aviation security, we spend only one cent per passenger on rail security. The 2008 federal budget request doesn't improve the picture. The president's proposal for securing subways and all other U.S. rail transit is less than a quarter of the amount of money requested for air security. We must increase our investment in the nation's surface transportation security plans.

Even with more funding, though, we will never have an ironclad guarantee that our 11.3 million daily commuters will remain out of harm's way. This is where the commuting public can become a strategic asset. We must redouble efforts toward a public awareness campaign that will educate riders on how to spot suspicious behavior — and what to do about it.

Congress is right to highlight the need to increase funding for our rail security, but it takes more than money to protect everyone all the time. A strategy of chaos would transform our security efforts from reactive to proactive — deterring predictable attacks on our subways and trains.

Add to that a greater public awareness, and we can beat the terrorists at their own game.

A family member of a September 11 victim says Senate Democrats invited him to Washington then snubbed him yesterday after he criticized a bill adopting 9/11 commission recommendations.

"They made me sit in the hallway for 40 minutes for nothing," said Bruce DeCell, a former New York City police officer whose son-in-law was killed at the World Trade Center on September 11.

He was invited by the Senate Democratic Steering and Outreach Committee to represent victims' family members at a lunch and press conference that included Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg of New Jersey.

Mr. DeCell, a board member of the World Trade Center United Family Group and vice president of the 9/11 Families for a Secure America, said he was asked to wait in the hall for his turn at a press conference but ended up waiting until it was over.

"I personally don't care if I'm at the press conference or not," he said. "If they don't want me, they could tell me, and I would just go home."

Thomas Russell, director of the steering committee, later called and apologized, saying he was "being pulled in too many directions and he forgot to come and get me," Mr. DeCell said.

Mr. DeCell called the explanation "disingenuous."

"If there were 20 of us and he forgot one, I'd understand it," he said. "I was the only family member who traveled down here for this."

Opting out

Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican, said yesterday he will advance a bill that will let states opt out of President Bush's No Child Left Behind education law.

"We're going to provide an alternative" to the five-year-old-law, Mr. Hoekstra said at a Heritage Foundation forum. "We think this is the direction to go."

Mr. Hoekstra said Republicans sold out their principles by allowing No Child Left Behind to become law in the first place, because now that it's in place it will only grow in both funding and regulations. "We are on the doorstep of having a national federal curriculum," he said, calling this possibility "devastating."

The act — which Mr. Bush and some top lawmakers are working to renew this year — aims to have all students proficient in reading and math by 2014 by requiring states to test children annually and to set standards that schools must meet each year.

Mr. Hoekstra's bill, to be introduced next week, would allow state leaders to declare that their state is responsible for educating its own children, thereby freeing the state from No Child Left Behind mandates.

Mr. Hoekstra said it's needed, since there's already pressure to expand the law. He noted that even a conservative — Rep. Zach Wamp, Tennessee Republican — teamed up with fitness guru Richard Simmons yesterday to advocate adding physical education to No Child Left Behind.

Ridge and McCain

Former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge will serve as national co-chairman of Republican John McCain's presidential exploratory committee, the campaign said yesterday.

Mr. Ridge, a former two-term Pennsylvania governor, served as first head of the Department of Homeland Security from 2003 to 2005.

"What sets John apart is his ability to form coalitions around a common, principled cause. Our country is at a crossroads, and John McCain is the leader who fundamentally knows what it takes to move us forward and keep us safe," Mr. Ridge said.

Campus crusade

Conservative activist David Horowitz continues fighting political correctness on America's college campuses, and will bring the battle to Washington this weekend with his second annual Academic Freedom Conference.

The conference Saturday and Sunday at the Omni Shoreham Hotel, sponsored by Students for Academic Freedom (SAF), will follow on the heels of the three-day Conservative Political Action Conference, which begins today at the same location.

Former Sen. Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania Republican, will give Saturday's keynote address at the SAF conference, which also will feature panel discussions with student activists from across the country.

On Sunday, Mr. Horowitz — whose new book, "Indoctrination U.," chronicles his campaign for fairness in academia — will debate Cary Nelson, president of the American Association of University Professors, on the topic, "Political Indoctrination and Harassment on Campus: Is There a Problem?"

"In the past year, we have succeeded in persuading two universities, Pennsylvania State University and Temple University, to adopt new academic freedom protections, which — for the first time — give students explicit academic rights," Mr. Horowitz said. "These are major victories, but it is crucial that we address not only how far we have come, but how far we have yet to go."

Group fined

A conservative independent group that ran millions of dollars in ads against Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry in 2004 will pay $750,000 to settle charges that it violated federal campaign laws.

The penalty, announced yesterday by the Federal Election Commission (FEC), is the third-largest in the history of the commission, which regulates election money. The FEC's six commissioners approved the settlement unanimously, the Associated Press reports.

The group, Progress for America Voter Fund, raised nearly $45 million in 2004, making it the best-financed Republican-oriented group in that campaign. The FEC said that it "failed to register and file disclosure reports as a federal political committee and accepted contributions in violation of federal limits."

Benjamin Ginsburg, an attorney for the Progress for America Voter Fund, said the group was not admitting guilt. He blamed the FEC for not setting clearer guidelines for independent groups that seek to influence elections.

In December, the FEC settled cases against three similar groups — liberal and conservative — that acted in a like fashion.

Award winners

Accuracy in Media (AIM) will honor Michelle Malkin and Mark M. Alexander for outstanding contributions to journalism in a ceremony today during the American Conservative Union's 2007 Conservative Political Action Conference.

The Reed Irvine Accuracy in Media Award is named for AIM's founder, Reed Irvine, who was America's first media watchdog.

Mrs. Malkin is a syndicated columnist, author, Fox News Channel contributor and a blogger. Mr. Alexander is executive editor and publisher of the Patriot Post (www.patriotpost.us).

Mrs. Malkin will receive the Reed Irvine Accuracy in Media Award for Investigative Journalism in recognition of her work in three 2006 columns on illegal immigration — "Racism gets a whitewash," "Reconquista is real" and "'La Raza' schools: Your tax dollars at work."

Mr. Alexander's May 12, 2006, piece, "Pollaganda — media polls as instruments of propaganda," earned him the Reed Irvine Accuracy in Media Award for Grassroots Journalism.

Terrorists Being Moved To Terre Haute Federal Prision Complex (THTS)

By Sue Loughlin, The Tribune-Star

Terre Haute Tribune-Star, March 1, 2007

Unit opened last year, currently has 17 inmates

TERRE HAUTE — The U.S. Justice Department has opened a new unit at the medium-security prison in Terre Haute to monitor communications of its inmates more closely, which could include lower-risk offenders convicted of or associated with terrorism, a Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman said.

The Washington Post has reported that the unit houses “a hodgepodge of second-tier terrorism inmates, most of them Arab Muslims, whose ability to communicate with the outside world has been tightly restricted.”

The self-contained unit opened in December and has about 17 inmates, although that number eventually could expand to 90, said Traci Billingsley, Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman.

The so-called “Communications Management Unit,” or CMU, “isn’t a terrorist unit,” she said.

The purpose of the CMU “is to provide increased monitoring of inmate communication in a self-contained unit. It assists in regulating and monitoring communication between inmates and those in the community,” she said.

Those convicted of or associated with domestic or international terrorism “may be candidates for this unit,” Billingsley said.

It eventually will house a variety of inmates, including sex offenders who try to communicate with victims or inmates who try to conduct illegal activity by phone or mail.

The unit is located in an area that formerly served as death row. Death row has been moved to the new high-security facility in the Federal Correctional Complex.

Prisoner advocates are raising concerns that most of the inmates in CMU so far are of Middle Eastern descent or Muslim faith, which could represent racial profiling.

Billingsley said she didn’t know inmates’ race or religion, and “that would not be a factor in placement,” she said.

The most dangerous, high-risk terrorists in the federal system likely would be housed at the ADMax or “supermax” facility in Florence, Colo., she said. According to the Washington Post article, the supermax facility houses al-Qaeda operative Zacarias Moussaoui.

The Washington Post article and another Internet publication say that among those housed in the CMU are five members of the so-called Lackawanna Six, a group of Yemeni-Americans from upstate New York who attended an al-Qaeda training camp. They pleaded guilty to charges of providing material support to al-Qaeda, according to a U.S. Department of Justice news release.

The defendants were sentenced to terms ranging from seven to 10 years in prison, according to the 2006 news release.

Billingsley said she could not confirm identities of prison inmates in the unit.

Telephone, mail and in-person communications of CMU inmates are closely monitored, and some advocates say the measures are too restrictive and perhaps unconstitutional. All inmate conversations, both by telephone and in-person, must be conducted in English unless otherwise negotiated.

Under the CMU program, telephone communications must be conducted using monitored phone lines, be live-monitored by staff, are subject to recording and must be in English. All letters must be reviewed by staff prior to delivery or sending; those written in non-English are subject to delays because they first must be read and translated.

Visits must be non-contact only, live-monitored, subject to recording and English only. If either party speaks non-English without prior approval, the call or visit will be terminated.

The only exception to the procedures is for privileged attorney-client communication, which cannot be monitored.

Communication is far more restricted than in the inmates' previous prison facilities, critics say. Visits are limited to two-hour visits twice a month, they say. Telephone might be limited to perhaps two, 10-minute calls per week, whereas before, inmates may have been allowed up to 300 minutes per month.

A Bureau of Prisons document states that "in no event will the frequency or duration of telephone calls placed by D-Unit inmates be limited to less than one telephone call per month of at least three minutes' duration."

According to the Washington Post article, the bureau has come under criticism in recent months for failing to monitor terrorist inmates' communications adequately.

The Post article refers to a Justice Department inspector general report in October that found "three terrorists imprisoned for the 1993 World Trade Center bombing had sent nearly 100 letters to alleged terrorists overseas from the maximum-security facility in Colorado."

Meanwhile, the National Prison Project at the American Civil Liberties Union is monitoring what is happening in the CMU unit, said David Fathi, staff counsel.

Right now, the Prison Project has only limited information about the CMU, who is housed there and how it operates, he said.

"Any time people of a certain ethnic or religious group are singled out for unfavorable treatment, obviously it's cause for concern," Fathi said.

The Bureau of Prisons legally is allowed to monitor communications between prisoners and family, friends or other outsiders, all except for attorney-client communication, he said.

But if that monitoring instead "turns into restricting or cutting off communication, it could violate the First Amendment rights of prisoners and those on the outside who want to communicate with them," Fathi said.

Howard Kieffer, a Santa Ana, Calif., defense attorney, said he has a client in the CMU unit whose communications have been severely limited.

Kieffer is executive director of Federal Defense Associates, a legal group that assists inmates in post-conviction defense matters. He also has an Internet-based listserv focused on federal prisons.

The CMU inmates are being treated differently than other inmates, Kieffer contends, and, "There is no legal authority for it whatsoever," he said.

He maintains the CMU was not implemented through a process that calls for public notice and an opportunity for public comment.

Billingsley said the bureau does have the authority to monitor communications of inmates and she disagreed that any violations of procedures or law have occurred.

In the case of CMU inmates, greater monitoring of their communication with the community is necessary "to protect the safety, security and orderly operation of the bureau facilities, and protect the public," she said.

Kieffer suggests the inmates have been denied the rights of due process and equal protection. Most of the inmates are of Middle Eastern descent, and many also are American citizens, he said.

New Orleans Residents Rush To Join Lawsuit (USAT)

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, March 1, 2007

New Orleans residents who were hurt or whose homes were damaged by Hurricane Katrina are scrambling to beat a deadline today to file claims against the Army Corps of Engineers.

Thousands of people descended on the corps' office Wednesday in New Orleans to file claims that accuse the corps of being responsible for levee failures that flooded New Orleans.

If the claims are denied, the victims then can take part in a lawsuit demanding compensation for losses. Joseph Bruno, one of several attorneys representing victims, says he expects more than 100,000 to file claims.

Debbie Simon, a corps spokeswoman, said it expects the total to be around 60,000 claims.

Bruno said the sudden rush to file is due to several factors. It's been difficult to inform people of the deadline because so many New Orleans residents are displaced around the country. Many still in New Orleans are living in trailers or new locations.

DOJ_NMG_0138481

And many others held off until they realized their insurance companies and government agencies were not paying them what they felt they were entitled to.

"It's been sheer, unmitigated hell," Bruno said.

Victims who miss today's deadline could be spared, however, if a judge grants an extension to the deadline at a court hearing scheduled for Friday. Lawyers representing victims in the lawsuit are asking for a 6-month extension.

Bruno says that there are two acts under which Katrina victims can sue the corps: a maritime law and a federal torts claim.

The deadline for the tort claim is Aug. 29 — the two-year anniversary of Katrina. A claim under the maritime law must be submitted by today.

Bruno is requesting the extension because of the confusion leading up to today's deadline. He said he didn't realize the corps was going to enforce today's deadline until he received a letter from the corps dated Feb. 20, Mardi Gras.

He said he realizes that people must understand their legal rights. "But this is different," he said. "This is a disaster of incredible proportion."

Charles Brown, 47, turned in his claim earlier this week after learning about the deadline Sunday.

"A lot of people aren't going to get their claims in," said Brown, who has been living in a government-issued trailer since his Gentilly home was damaged by the storm.

Judge Is Urged To Back Deal On Hurricane Damage Claims (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

GULFPORT, Miss., Feb. 28 — Addressing a skeptical federal judge, Mike Moore, a lawyer who helped engineer a settlement with State Farm, argued Wednesday that the deal should be approved partly because it could put hundreds of millions of dollars into the hands of victims of Hurricane Katrina by the end of the year.

The alternative, Mr. Moore and other proponents of the settlement told Judge L. T. Senter Jr. of Federal District Court, would be individual trials, which could stretch out several years with the outcomes far from certain.

Lawyers involved in the settlement were before Judge Senter on Wednesday to argue the merits of a settlement with State Farm that would reopen 36,000 previously closed claims of Mississippi homeowners whose homes were damaged by the hurricane.

The central issue has been whether the insurers are responsible for damage caused by extensive flooding. The insurers say their policies never provided coverage for any kind of flooding. In many cases, storm victims say, the insurers, especially State Farm, refused to pay claims if the damage was done by a combination of wind and water.

Judge Senter, saying he wanted to learn more about the details of the settlement and to hear from homeowners who have complaints about State Farm, had convened what he called a “hybrid hearing” that had some of the flavor of a town meeting. At times it was raw and emotional.

One woman, Sheron Weiss, said she had been so distressed at the loss of her home and the refusal of State Farm to pay her that she had “contemplated suicide more than once.”

The judge, saying he had a duty to protect storm victims, had been unwilling to endorse the settlement because of concerns that it favored State Farm.

A lawyer for State Farm, W. Scott Welch, a partner in a firm in Jackson, Miss., said the agreement was a result of “months of arms-length negotiations.”

Some lawyers questioned whether the negotiators for policyholders, led by Richard F. Scruggs, had gone easy on State Farm. They pointed out that the settlement was part of a two-part arrangement.

In the first segment, Mr. Scruggs settled 640 lawsuits against the insurance company for $80 million. Then, he and the others began negotiating for the reopening of the 36,000 closed claims. The deal provides for State Farm to pay a minimum of $50 million to the policyholders. Some lawyers suggested that Mr. Scruggs was more concerned about the 640 lawsuits than the larger group.

Mr. Scruggs said, “We felt we had tilted the playing field greatly in favor of the policyholders.”

Mr. Scruggs and Mr. Moore have been friends for years. When Mr. Moore was the attorney general in Mississippi, he worked with Mr. Scruggs in the 1990s to start litigation against tobacco companies that led to a $248 billion settlement involving 29 states. In the negotiations with State Farm, Mr. Moore served as intermediary between Mr. Scruggs’s group, State Farm and the current attorney general, Jim Hood. He recently joined the Scruggs team.

Mr. Scruggs and Mr. Moore estimated that the settlement could result in payments of up to $600 million.

Most of the 36,000 who requested that their claims be reopened, Mr. Moore said, would receive additional money. He said he had calculated increases on several individual policies, including those on the homes of two of his sisters.

During the negotiations, some participants said State Farm insisted upon working out the settlement involving 36,000 policyholders after they had concluded the deal closing the 640 lawsuits. The insurer's concern, participants said, was that once the $80 million payment on the lawsuits became public, the 36,000 storm victims might try to overwhelm State Farm with new lawsuits.

In court on Wednesday, Mr. Moore said that publicity about State Farm's handling of claims had given it "a credibility problem" and he was confident State Farm would pay what arbitrators decided was fair for policyholders.

Lawyers for State Farm insisted that the company had worked to resolve claims fairly.

Under the agreement, State Farm will make new offers of payment to those who ask for a review of the claim. If the policyholder is not satisfied, the policyholder can request binding arbitration, which will be paid for by the insurance company.

Return To New Orleans (editorial) (WP)

AMONTH after neglecting to mention New Orleans or the Gulf Coast in his State of the Union address, President Bush heads today to the city crippled by Hurricane Katrina. He's certain to get an earful during his listening tour of the region, which will start in Mississippi. But if the Crescent City's revival is to go from a crawl to a gallop, Bush must use the bully pulpit of the presidency to energize all levels of government. Despite $89 billion from the federal government to rebuild the devastated Gulf Coast, New Orleans's recovery has been slow. Painfully slow.

According to "The Katrina Index: Tracking Recovery of New Orleans & the Metro Area," a monthly report from the Brookings Institution and the Greater New Orleans Community Data Center, public transportation is stagnant, "with only 17 percent of pre-Katrina buses in operation." More than half of the city's schools -- 56 percent -- remain closed. And rebuilding money from Baton Rouge under Louisiana's "Road Home" program seems to be distributed one coin at a time. Only 632 applications had been approved out of the 107,739 on file as of Feb. 12. Guarding against fraud is commendable, but it does not excuse the continual delay in helping those who lost everything and are eager to get on with their lives.

That's just the beginning of the challenges facing New Orleans. Murders, robberies and carjackings are some of the horrors visited upon a people who have suffered enough. Fear and uncertainty about the future have contributed to the acceleration of the departure of the middle class and educated professionals, who were already bidding the city adieu before Katrina blew ashore in 2005. And the population that has been left behind -- half of what it once was -- needs meaningful employment.

Solving these problems not only takes vision, it takes leadership. From the beginning, Mr. Bush wisely insisted that local officials plan and control their own destiny. Yet that does not absolve him of any role in fulfilling a vow he made to New Orleans in his speech in Jackson Square: "This great city will rise again." A presidential push is needed to tamp down partisan bickering and old rivalries among local, state and federal officials and to quash conspiracy theories that the decision not to rebuild flooded housing projects is an attempt to ethnically cleanse New Orleans.

One specific way Mr. Bush could show leadership is by directing the Federal Emergency Management Agency to waive the requirement that Louisiana contribute 10 percent to meeting disaster recovery costs; the federal government has issued similar waivers to other jurisdictions, including New York City after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. Cutting that bit of red tape would allow the freed-up money to be used for other rebuilding purposes.

WAR NEWS:

Democrats To Attach Add-ons To Iraq Bill (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, March 1, 2007

While Democrats try to restrict how President Bush can spend the $100 billion he wants for Iraq, they also hope to load his measure up with $10 billion in add-ons — from aid for avocado growers to help for children lacking health insurance.

Lawmakers also hope to add money for drought relief in the Great Plains, better levees in New Orleans and development of military bases that are closing down.

The expected battle with the White House over the add-ons is getting far less attention than debate over Iraq, but it could reveal a lot about how much Democrats will be able to rewrite the Republican president's budget later this year.

Bush has yet to veto a spending bill, and Democrats are gambling he'll sign the Iraq measure despite objections to spending he didn't seek. Republicans, meanwhile, may be reluctant to vote against the package since it contains funds for U.S. troops overseas.

Lawmakers from the Great Plains are pressing for about $4 billion in disaster aid for farmers suffering under drought conditions.

The California delegation is demanding help for citrus, avocado and other Central Valley farmers facing $1.2 billion in losses from a devastating January freeze. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., is a powerful ally in the effort to win the region unemployment, food and housing aid.

Gulf Coast lawmakers want $1.3 billion above the $3.4 billion requested by Bush for hurricane relief. Northwest lawmakers are desperate for about $400 million to extend payments to rural counties hurt by cutbacks in federal logging.

And governors are pressing for $745 million to address a shortfall in the State Children's Health Insurance Program that threatens to deny health coverage for about 500,000 children in 14 states. House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis., promised Tuesday that SCHIP money will be added to the Iraq bill.

Obey also has promised to add $3.1 billion for local communities affected by military base closings and for redeployment of 12,000 troops stationed in Germany and South Korea to domestic bases. To free funds for Democratic initiatives, that money was left out of a spending bill approved earlier in February.

Both Democrats and Republicans are pushing extra spending into the war funding bill as they seek to advance domestic priorities that would probably stall if advanced on their own.

That's not what the White House says should happen.

"This supplemental is about emergency spending for the global war on terror and we need to make sure we stay on that track," said budget office spokesman Sean Kevelighan.

Added House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio: "Our focus must be on supporting our troops in harm's way — without strings attached — not on using a military spending bill as an excuse to fund pork-barrel projects and other unrelated projects."

Bush and GOP leaders on Capitol Hill managed to keep prior war funding bills largely free of such budgetary add-ons when Republicans controlled Congress. Now that Democrats are in charge, the party's leaders are eager to use the cost of the war as leverage to force Bush to accept spending — such as aid to farmers — that he has successfully killed in the past.

"It's starting to become a train onto which a lot of baggage is being thrown that has got nothing to do with the war or really legitimate emergencies," said Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H.

Countered Obey: "We will only fund what is necessary."

Whatever is added to the bill in the House is likely to grow in the freer-spending Senate.

Democrats Plan To Fund Domestic Agenda In War Bill (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, March 1, 2007

House Democrats plan to pick a fresh fight with the White House with an unannounced plan to add billions of dollars in spending for their domestic priorities to President Bush's $99.6 billion emergency war spending bill.

The programs being eyed by Democratic leaders, including $700 million for health care for poor children, could boost Bush's war proposal by 10 percent or more, sources in both parties said.

The White House wants Congress to stick with what Bush requested -- money for ongoing military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, repair and replacement of damaged equipment and an increase in the size of the nation's deployable military force.

But Democrats plan to follow the same strategy Bush has used for years to get his priorities funded: packaging appropriations for key projects separately from the overall budget and tying them to money for troops in the field.

Democratic leaders also see this emerging strategy as a way to encourage their liberal members to vote for the supplemental budget bill, rather than risk the party being portrayed as anti-military, and to remind the president that Congress is an equal branch of government.

"He has competition now," said one Democratic leadership aide.

The House Appropriations Committee will take up the bill next week, with a floor vote scheduled for the following week. The likely additions, which two sources said could run from $10 billion or more, include funds to help states pay for the State Children's Health Insurance Program to provide low-cost health insurance for families and children. A shortfall in federal funding for the program was one of the biggest complaints of the nation's governors who met at the White House on Monday.

The Center on Budget and Policy Priorities says 14 states face a total deficit for the program of $700 million. The states are Alaska, Georgia, Illinois, Iowa, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, New Jersey, Rhode Island and Wisconsin.

Funds for relief from crop disasters may also be included in the Democratic package. Most of the add-ons are directly related to the military and homeland security, such as money to help with the fallout from base closings and for veterans' hospitals to pay for traumatic brain injuries, a Democratic aide said. Such injuries have been unparalleled in this war, in part because of advanced field hospitals that keep soldiers alive when otherwise they would have died.

Democrats said they would pay for the new funding priorities with cuts or revenue enhancements elsewhere, but would give no specifics.

Sean Kevelighan, a spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget, said the White House will urge Democrats not to try the additions.

"To include non-related add-ins in what is clearly designed to provide troops with the resources they need, when they need them, would only delay the process and in turn delay these vital resources," he said. "These types of things would create debate and take us off the overall intention of the supplemental."

$4B To Sweeten Iraq Bill (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, March 1, 2007

House Democratic leaders will add nearly $4 billion for farmers to a bill funding military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan to attract conservative Democrats concerned that the measure would wrongly constrict President Bush's power as commander in chief.

Democrats may also add money for children's health insurance in the hope of winning the votes of Republicans such as Illinois Reps. Mark Kirk (R) and Judy Biggert (R), whose home state faces a $240 million deficit in its State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP).

Rep. Collin Peterson (D-Minn.), chairman of the House Agriculture Committee and a senior member of the Blue Dog Coalition of some 45 conservative Democrats, said, "I don't think the supplemental will pass if we don't" add disaster-relief funds. Without farm-relief funds the Iraq-Afghanistan bill would lose "quite a few" Blue Dog votes, said Peterson. "They'd lose mine," he added.

Republican House leaders anticipated such sweeteners. At yesterday's weekly meeting of the House Republican Conference, Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) urged colleagues not to be lured by money for agriculture and health insurance, said two lawmakers who attended the meeting.

A lawmaker who attended a meeting of Blue Dogs Tuesday said half of the conservative Democrats who were there raised concerns about language that Defense Appropriations subcommittee Chairman John Murtha (D-Pa.) said he would include in the supplemental.

Murtha said he would include several requirements: giving soldiers returning from the war at least a year of rest before redeployment; limiting the Pentagon's ability to extend enlistments, the so-called stop-loss policy; and stopping the Pentagon from extending combat tours.

Murtha also said his bill would enforce equipment and training standards for troops.

Conservative Democrats met before the whole House Democratic Caucus convened to discuss war funding. Lawmakers at the second meeting failed to reach agreement because liberal lawmakers demanded that strict conditions be attached to funding while conservatives argued against interfering with Bush's powers of command.

"I don't think we should be interfering with military strategy," said Rep. John Tanner (D-Tenn.), a leading Blue Dog, when asked about Murtha's proposed restrictions.

House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.) has said he may add waivers to the military bill that would allow the Department of Defense to circumvent Murtha's proposed restrictions, according to press reports.

But Murtha has not yet agreed to including these.

Rep. Bill Young (R-Fla.), ranking Republican on the Defense Appropriations subcommittee, said he and Murtha discussed the details of the supplemental funding bill Tuesday. Murtha said he would include his restrictions and did not mention waivers, Young said. Young told Murtha he opposed the restrictions.

If Republican members of the Appropriations Committee and a significant number of Blue Dogs oppose the bill, it may not pass the House, seriously embarrassing the Democratic leadership.

Additional agriculture spending could make it harder for conservative Democrats from rural districts to oppose the war-funding bill. Murtha and Peterson said farm-relief funds would be added.

Peterson cited $4 billion to pay for disasters such as droughts, floods, frosts and snowstorms that affected farmers in about half of all states in 2005 and 2006. In California, farmers lost four-fifths of their orange crop to frost, he said. But farmers could only apply for relief for one of the two years, he added.

Murtha said Blue Dogs have not told him directly of their concerns, but extra agriculture funds could keep them from defecting. Another senior Democrat on Appropriations agreed that "it would help."

Murtha said he and Young reached agreement on military funding levels. The supplemental would include at least $93.7 billion for troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. Appropriators may grant requests to allocate an extra billion for Afghanistan, which would boost the defense total to $94.7 billion, he added.

Prospects for extra children's health insurance funding were less certain, Murtha said. Appropriators may also include $3.4 billion Bush has requested for Hurricane Katrina recovery costs.

Murtha, Obey, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif,), Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and other Democrats met yesterday in an office off the House floor to discuss the supplemental.

As reporters converged on Murtha after the meeting, Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) waved his arms at the lawmaker to remind him of the new watchword: "Consensus."

"Don't talk to the press," said Emanuel half-jokingly as he tried to catch Murtha's attention.

But Murtha has remained steadfast about putting restrictions on the president.

"We will have three restrictive amendments," he said.

Democratic Leaders Revamp Anti-war Plan (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, March 1, 2007

House Democratic leaders are developing an anti-war proposal that wouldn't cut off money for U.S. troops in Iraq but would require President Bush to acknowledge problems with an overburdened military.

The plan could draw bipartisan support but is expected to be a tough sell to members who say they don't think it goes far enough to assuage voters angered by the four-year conflict.

Bush "hasn't to date done anything we've asked him to do, so why we would think he would do anything in the future is beyond me," said Rep. Lynn Woolsey, D-Calif., one of a group of liberal Democrats pushing for an immediate end to the war.

Democratic protests to the war grew louder in January after they took control of Congress and Bush announced he planned to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Earlier this month, House Democrats pushed through a nonbinding resolution opposing the buildup.

Since then, Democrats have been trying to decide what to do next. Some worried that a plan by Rep. John Murtha to restrict funding for the war would go too far. Murtha, D-Pa., is extending his support to the revised proposal.

The tactic is more likely to embarrass Bush politically than force his hand on the war. He would have to sign repeated waivers for units and report to Congress those units with equipment shortfalls and other problems.

In the Senate, a group of senior Democrats wants to repeal the 2002 measure authorizing the war and write a new resolution restricting the mission and ordering troop withdrawals to begin by this summer. But Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Iraq would have to wait until the Senate finishes work to improve homeland security.

"That would mean we would hold off the Iraq legislation for a matter of days, not weeks," he said.

The House Democratic proposal brought a sharp response from Republicans on Wednesday.

Rep. Adam Putnam, R-Fla., called the plan a "fig leaf" to distract the public from what he said was Democrats' ultimate goal of cutting off funds for troops in combat.

"We support full funding for our troops who are in harms way — without strings attached," said Putnam, R-Fla., after emerging from a closed-door conference meeting.

As Democrats met behind closed doors to discuss their options Tuesday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the Bush administration would talk to leaders from Iran and Syria on stabilizing Iraq.

Rice announced U.S. support for the Iraq meeting, to be held in Baghdad next month, at a Senate hearing in which Democrats pressed her and Defense Secretary Robert Gates to explain what progress is being made in the Baghdad security crackdown and how soon U.S. troops will be coming home.

The decision to engage Iran and Syria on the war in Iraq is a major departure for U.S. policy. The bipartisan Iraq Study Group in December recommended U.S. dialogue with Iran and Syria, but until now the administration has resisted that course.

Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, Republican co-chairman of the panel, welcomed the shift in a speech Tuesday night. But he went further, urging the administration to include Syria in Mideast peacemaking with Israel and the Palestinians.

Baker and his Iraq Study Group co-chair Lee Hamilton, a Democrat, are expected this spring to participate in a new study on constitutional war powers. Baker will co-chair the independent panel along with Warren Christopher, who was President Clinton's secretary of State.

Dennis Ross, a former U.S. Middle East negotiator, noted that Rice and other officials had taken pains to stress that the talks were an Iraqi initiative, which he said the administration might be using as cover to downplay suggestions of a major policy shift.

"This is a way for the administration to have discussions under a different umbrella but in a way in which they can say that they are not changing course," said Ross, a senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East policy.

The administration said its decision to take part in the Iraq conference did not represent a change of heart, although the White House has accused both Iran and Syria of deadly meddling in the war.

"We've always been inclined to participate in an Iraqi-led conference," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said.

Dems: Murtha Upstaging Pelosi (POL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Politico, March 1, 2007

To put it bluntly, as the former Marine is wont to do, Rep. John Murtha is rankling some of his fellow Democrats who worry his outspokenness sometimes upstages even Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

The Pennsylvania Democrat has long charted his own course in dealings with the press and congressional leaders. But now after three decades in the House, he's a national figure and his independent streak and sometimes fiery rhetoric are causing wider rifts for Democrats.

A day before the House voted on a resolution disapproving of the president's troop "surge" plan last month, Murtha turned to a liberal Web site to preview his plans to block the president's deployment of an additional 21,500 troops into Iraq. And his statements overshadowed the ongoing floor debate and fueled Republican charges that Democrats were laying a foundation to cut off war funding.

Murtha's plan was "overexposed before it was exposed," said Rep. Earl Pomeroy (D-N.D.), a member of the conservative Blue Dog Coalition. "It was grist for talk shows even before the members knew about it. It made it very difficult for that plan to get off the ground now."

"I was not keen on him stepping on Nancy's message," Cooper said. "The headline was not what we do here (in Congress) but what he was doing there" on the Web site.

The speaker, a California Democrat, and other members of her leadership team had carefully crafted their public relations strategy to depict the House war vote as a simple repudiation of the president's surge strategy, not a harbinger of future intentions to scrub funding for the war.

But Murtha's comments to the liberal MoveCongress.org, done without the leaders' knowledge, undermined the approach, drew attention away from the Democrats' message and ultimately gave Republicans a reason to vote against the resolution.

"It was a big blunder. People are galvanized against the Democratic plan without even knowing what it is," said a former Democratic aide.

Tuesday night, Murtha formally presented his plan, as provisions for the $93 billion emergency wartime spending bill, to an increasingly divisive Democratic caucus.

His allies call his approach straightforward, contending the former Marine is doing what he's always done: speaking plainly and letting the chips fall where they may.

"Jack marches to his own drummer, yet he's a great member of Pelosi's team, as everybody knows," said Rep. Michael E. Capuano (D-Mass.), a Murtha ally.

"I'm glad that some of my friends aren't involved in such a Kabuki dance," Capuano said. "If that's what people want, that the only things that get done are fully scripted. I've never witnessed a democracy that works that way …The legislative process is messy."

Murtha raised eyebrows in another instance last May when, during a routine news conference on Iraq, he launched into a tirade about an incident in Haditha, Iraq, in which he charged that Marines had "killed innocent civilians in cold blood." The comments provoked a media frenzy that made some of his Democratic colleagues uneasy.

"Yeah, he's unvarnished and sometimes gets out there first, but it doesn't mean he's wrong," said a Democratic aide sympathetic to Murtha.

When Murtha does get out ahead of other Democrats, Pelosi is usually able to rein him in. For instance, he called off his public campaign for majority leader last summer after Pelosi suggested to him that it would be distracting.

"There's one person who can manage Murtha and that's Nancy Pelosi, but a lot of times it's after the fact," the aide said. "He doesn't do nuance very well."

Murtha and Pelosi work well together in spite of his mixed record on party loyalty. Both have enthusiastically backed each other in leadership races: Murtha supported Pelosi in her 2001 bid for Democratic whip, and Pelosi memorably endorsed Murtha for majority leader in November.

The two often confer on strategy, but Murtha can still veer off script.

His detractors say that Murtha's style is too headstrong for today's partisan political climate. At the very least, they say, he should consult leaders before creating a splash in the press.

"A huge part of the problem is lack of communication," said a Democratic aide.

Murtha, though, has never been one to blindly defer to leadership. When Democrats were in the minority, he was known for cutting appropriations deals with former Republican Rep. Tom DeLay (Texas), so enraging Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.), then ranking member on the appropriations panel, that Obey would storm into leaders' offices fuming that Murtha had "gone and made a deal with the devil," according to a former Democratic aide.

Some political observers say that Murtha's style hearkens back to another political era -- one in which lawmakers spent less time framing their actions for the press, and individual members, especially committee chairmen, enjoyed more autonomy. Members did not rely so much on press secretaries nor did they formulate elaborate messaging plans.

Indeed, Murtha, chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, spends little time consulting his staff. Inquiries to appropriations aides will often elicit the same response that members sometimes utter: "Only Jack Murtha knows that."

"He's an old bull, remember that," said the former Democratic aide. "He comes from the old school when members did everything from one to another. He's also a military guy; he leads and everyone follows."

War Debate Keeps The House's Only Iraq Veteran Front And Center (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Fresh-faced and young, Patrick Murphy normally would have fallen into the category of unknown freshman legislator elbowing to make a name for himself.

But attracting attention has been no problem for Murphy.

The Pennsylvania Democrat happens to be the only member of Congress who is a veteran of the war in Iraq, a distinction that has swiftly catapulted him to Washington's front lines of politics and policy with little effort.

Senior members turn to the 33-year-old for policy guidance. Generals are eager to brief him one-on-one. Murphy delivers moving speeches on the floor about the 19 paratroopers he served with who died in Iraq. And he stood shoulder to shoulder with Speaker Nancy Pelosi at a news conference, emotionally talking about flawed U.S. policy.

"Sometimes I feel like the weight of the United States military in Iraq is on my shoulders," Murphy said in an interview in his office this week. "I really have to push myself to focus on my district, this is so consuming."

On Monday, he returned from his first trip back to the Iraq since his 2003-2004 tour, and he said he found conditions there painfully similar or worse. "It feels like Groundhog Day all over again there," he said. "Before it was like, 'It'll take time, it'll take time.' Well, now we're four years later and everyone was unanimous: We need a political and economic solution, and all we have is a military solution."

Murphy was among a dozen veterans of the Iraq war who ran for Congress last year, but only he won a seat. Murphy, a captain, was a paratrooper with the Army's 82nd Airborne Division. He has co-sponsored legislation calling for a 12-month timeline for redeploying U.S. troops from Iraq and allowing for some troops to remain to provide basic force protection and training of Iraqis.

He said he repeatedly heard from officers and soldiers that the United States isn't doing enough to get the Iraqis to step up and assume more responsibility for their country's defense and for combating insurgents.

"I asked one of my former students what's going on, and he said, 'Sir, if the Iraqis don't get off the sidelines, we'll be here forever,' " Murphy said. "They are frustrated because they know what it takes to win there. We are not putting appropriate pressure on the Iraqis."

Asked whether any of the troops were skeptical of him because of his stance on the war, he said those he encountered were nothing but encouraging.

"I'm not necessarily antiwar. I'm anti-failure," he said. "There's a difference."Lose a Member, Gain $5 Million?

There's much chatter in the House halls these days about the possible departure of Rep. Marty Meehan, an eight-term Massachusetts Democrat who is on a list of three finalists to become chancellor of his alma mater, the University of Massachusetts at Lowell.

Although the well-liked Meehan would be missed by many of his colleagues, the vultures are circling -- and not just for his seat. The real buzz is over what he would do with his bulging campaign war chest, which, as the saying goes, he can't take with him. Well, certainly not for himself.

Federal reports show that Meehan had a handsome $5,119,677 cash on hand as of December -- a figure that caught the eye of those who would certainly like to put it to use for Democratic causes. At one point, Meehan was mentioned as a possible successor to Sen. John F. Kerry, which would account for the stout bankroll. According to the Center for Responsive Politics, money from lawyers, lobbyist and business interests made up the lion's share of his contributions last year.

One thing is fairly certain, though: If Meehan does retire, whatever he decides to do with the money will be very public, given that one of his signature issues has been campaign finance reform.

Meehan would have three options to move the money as a chunk: give the $5 million to the Democratic National Committee, give it to a charity, or create a personal political action committee. Any other political destinations for the money would be subject to campaign finance restrictions.

A spokesman for Meehan said the House member hasn't thought about the future of the money because his own future is undecided. He hasn't been offered the university post and he hasn't decided whether he would accept the job.

Meanwhile, more people are lining up for Meehan's seat than are advising Hillary Clinton. Among them: Niki Tsongas-- wife of the late U.S. senator Paul Tsongas, who once represented the district in the House.

But like we said, Marty hasn't even gotten the job yet.Better Care Sought for 'Wounded Warriors'

Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) will today introduce a Dignity for Wounded Warriors Act to mandate that wounded soldiers receive proper treatment at decent facilities when they return from war. The legislation comes after a Washington Post series on deplorable conditions for veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

Among other things, the bill calls for a Wounded Warrior Oversight Board appointed by Congress, 24-hour bilingual hotlines, federal protections for the jobs of family members who are caring for recovering service members, and establishment of a zero-tolerance policy for pest infestation at medical facilities.Ted Stevens: In Shape but 'Out of Luck'

Yes, that was Sen. Ted Stevens at National Airport on Sunday taking charge and flinging bags off a stalled conveyor belt to help other passengers and, of course, find his own bag. "He looked quite good and in shape for a man of 83 in the middle of the night lifting bags," said fellow traveler Joe Mendelson, who worked alongside Stevens.

When the music stopped, however, neither man had a bag. "Well, I guess we're [expletive] out of luck," the senator said.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Former Secretaries of State James A. Baker III and Warren Christopher will head a private, bipartisan panel to study a lingering and gnawing national question: Who does the Constitution say has the power to begin, conduct and end wars?

The dispute over the authority to wage war has historically divided presidents, members of Congress and scholars. Through the years, the White House gradually has assumed increased control of U.S. war-making, and it has arisen again amid the shrill debate in the new Democratic-controlled Congress over President Bush's war buildup in Iraq.

Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., headed the Iraq Study Group that made recommendations last December to the Bush administration on Iraq war policy.

The Iraq panel, which was authorized by Congress, achieved wide notice as Bush was considering how to reshape the U.S. role in Iraq, and its findings have been embraced by many members of both parties. Bush ended up deciding to send extra troops to the war zone — essentially ignoring the panel's recommendation that the U.S. remove its combat troops by early next year.

The war powers study is sponsored by the private Miller Center of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia.

Among its 12 members are Baker, who served under the first President Bush; Christopher, who was in the Clinton administration; Hamilton; former Attorney General Edwin Meese, who was also on the Iraq Study Group; and Brent Scowcroft, a former national security adviser.

Commission Will Consider Conflict Over War Powers (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz
The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

After having tried to sort out the Iraq war, the former secretary of state and the former Indiana congressman are turning to another seemingly intractable conflict -- the more-than-two-century-old battle between the White House and Congress over who should take responsibility for starting and stopping wars.

The two elder statesmen, who co-chaired the Iraq Study Group last year, were named yesterday to a new panel being sponsored by the Miller Center of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia. The National War Powers Commission intends to come up with recommendations for how Congress and presidents can best exercise their respective war powers granted by the Constitution.

The list of other panelists offered up by the Miller Center was further evidence of the revolving-door nature of commission life in Washington. In addition to Hamilton and Baker, the new panel includes another veteran of the Iraq Study Group, former attorney general Edwin Meese III.

It also includes another member of the Sept. 11 commission, former senator Slade Gorton (R-Wash.). Baker will co-chair the new commission with former secretary of state Warren Christopher, who is a commission veteran himself, having chaired the blue-ribbon group that looked into the Los Angeles Police Department after the Rodney King riots.

In a brief interview yesterday, Hamilton said he thinks lawmakers are looking more and more to former officials serving on such commissions because of their inability to find common ground on thorny public issues. "The extreme partisanship of the environment leads former officials to try to build consensus," he said. "We are hopeful we can still make a contribution."

"And of course," Hamilton added. "we work cheap."

The Senate's Forgotten Iraq Choice (NYT)

By Lincoln D. Chafee
The New York Times, March 1, 2007
Providence, R.I.

AS the presidential primary campaigns begin in earnest, the Iraq war is overshadowing all other issues, as it did during the midterm elections. Presidential candidates who were in the Senate in October 2002 are particularly under the microscope, as they are being called upon to justify their votes for going to war.

As someone who was in the Senate at the time, I have been struck by the contours of the debate. The situation facing the candidates who cast war votes has, to my surprise, often been presented as a binary one — they could either vote for the war, or not. There was no middle ground.

On the contrary. There was indeed a third way, which Senator James Jeffords, independent of Vermont, hailed at the time as "one of the most important votes we will cast in this process." And it was opposed by every single senator at the time who now seeks higher office.

A mere 10 hours before the roll was called on the administration-backed Iraq war resolution, the Senate had an opportunity to prevent the current catastrophe in Iraq and to salvage the United States' international standing. Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, offered a substitute to the war resolution, the Multilateral Use of Force Authorization Act of 2002.

Senator Levin's amendment called for United Nations approval before force could be authorized. It was unambiguous and compatible with international law. Acutely cognizant of the dangers of the time, and the reality that diplomatic options could at some point be exhausted, Senator Levin wrote an amendment that was nimble: it affirmed that Congress would stand at the ready to reconsider the use of force if, in the judgment of the president, a United Nations resolution was not "promptly adopted" or enforced. Ceding no rights or sovereignty to an international body, the amendment explicitly avowed America's right to defend itself if threatened.

An opponent of the Levin amendment said that the debate was not over objectives, but tactics. And he was right. To a senator, we all had as our objectives the safety of American citizens, the security of our country and the disarming of Saddam Hussein in compliance with United Nations resolutions. But there was a steadfast core of us who believed that the tactics should be diplomacy and multilateralism, not the "go it alone" approach of the Bush doctrine.

Those of us who supported the Levin amendment argued against a rush to war. We asserted that the Iraqi regime, though undeniably heinous, did not constitute an imminent threat to United States security, and that our campaign to renew weapons inspections in Iraq — whether by force or diplomacy — would succeed only if we enlisted a broad coalition that included Arab states.

We also urged our colleagues to take seriously the admonitions of our allies in the region — Egypt, Jordan, Kuwait, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Turkey. As King Abdullah of Jordan warned, "A miscalculation in Iraq would throw the whole area into turmoil."

Unfortunately, these arguments fell on deaf ears in that emotionally charged, hawkish, post-9/11 moment, less than four weeks before a midterm election. The Levin amendment was defeated by a 75 to 24 vote. Later that night, the Iraq War Resolution was approved, 77 to 23. It was clear that most senators were immune to persuasion because the two votes were almost mirror images of each other — no to the Levin amendment, aye to war. Their minds were made up.

It was incomprehensible to me at the time that the Levin amendment received only 24 votes. However, there were some heroes, like Paul Wellstone, Democrat of Minnesota, who even in the midst of a very difficult re-election campaign voted to slow the march to war. And then there was the moving statement by Robert Byrd, Democrat of West Virginia, in support of the Levin amendment and against the administration-backed resolution: "This is an unprecedented and unfounded interpretation of the president's authority under the Constitution of the United States — not to mention the fact that it stands the charter of the United Nations on its head."

Americans are gravely concerned about Iraq, and yearn for leadership to stabilize the situation there and gradually end United States involvement. Calling on presidential hopefuls to justify or recant their vote authorizing the president to take us to war almost misses the point.

The Senate had the opportunity to support a more deliberate, multilateral approach, one that still would have empowered the United States to respond to any imminent threat posed by Saddam Hussein. We must not sidestep the fact that a sensible alternative did exist, but it was rejected. Candidates — Democrat and Republican — should be called to account for their vote on the Levin amendment.

Iraq Deserves One More Chance (WSJ)

By Michael O'Hanlon

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

Despite the earlier pledge of congressional Democrats not to challenge funding for the war in Iraq this year, key members of the House and Senate are considering robust and binding responses to the conflict -- most specifically to President Bush's surge strategy. Congress is within its constitutional rights to do so. But in its understandable response to a failing mission and an impatient American public, its approach is unproductive. Rather than force a showdown with Mr. Bush this winter and spring, Congress should give his surge strategy a chance -- while preparing for the real fight this fall.

The House has expressed its disapproval of the decision to increase American forces in Iraq by up to 30,000 troops as implied by the president's new strategy. The Senate, despite a majority in favor of taking a similar approach, has been unable to do so due to procedural rules that have allowed the minority to impede a vote.

More significant, however, are the new ideas in the works. Jack Murtha, a military veteran and longstanding pro-defense Democrat, is considering using his perch as chairman of the defense subcommittee on appropriations to make it very hard for Mr. Bush to send more troops to Iraq. Mr. Murtha would demand they have every element of their proper equipment inventory, training preparation, and proper rest between deployments before being sent abroad, allowing no cutting of corners despite the state of emergency in Iraq.

A number of key senators would revoke the authorization Congress gave Mr. Bush to confront Saddam in 2002, replacing the original war resolution with a new mandate permitting only a much more constrained American effort, focused on training Iraqis and getting our own forces home. Some of these U.S. officials may be further emboldened by the Blair government's recent decision to reduce British forces in Basra -- and to return them home rather than redeploy to Baghdad.

Mr. Murtha's approach may be good for those troops not yet deployed or redeployed to Iraq, but much less so for those already there who need help -- not to mention for the prospects of the overall mission, with all of its important implications for regional and American security. Furthermore, the proposal to rescind the war authorization seems, almost five years after the fact, largely irrelevant. Members of Congress had access to much the same classified intelligence on Iraq as did the administration prior to the 2003 invasion. The claim that Mr. Bush misled them and the country while making the case for war (even if partly true) does not seem reason enough to justify such a measure.

But the larger question here is of what our policy should be today. By that measure, the congressional debate is off tune. Many of the main themes now being discussed guarantee a dialogue of the deaf between the Congress and the president, with each side jockeying for political position and public support rather than working together to devise a game plan for Iraq for the crucial next year.

In fairness to the Democrats and a number of their Republican congressional colleagues, they have every reason to feel bold. Politics is a contact sport, after all. And with the nation's uniformed men and women in peril, waging a losing fight, there is every reason to play rough. After six years of being largely shut out of policy making by the Bush administration, and suffering the consequences of Karl Rove's zero-sum approach to politics and patriotism, they have had enough.

The Democratic plans are defensible if one concludes that Iraq is already irrevocably and completely lost. On this assumption, the administration's desire to try and salvage something from the situation -- even if just to mitigate the degree of our defeat -- is no longer realistic. Furthermore, any legislative maneuver that can embarrass Mr. Bush or even start forcing him to reduce our commitment seems justifiable.

Nevertheless, Congress's overall efforts are misguided for one fundamental reason: We cannot yet be sure that the situation in Iraq is totally hopeless. It is indeed bad, very bad, and the Bush administration has done a poor job with a war that it chose to launch at a time and place of its choosing. But there still may be a glimmer of hope -- if not to "win," then at least to achieve some minimum level of stability.

While those claiming that Iraq is already destined for all-out civil war, genocide and disintegration may in the end have their predictions confirmed, that does not mean such an outcome is inevitable. There is still hope of preventing a war with millions killed, the establishment of a major al Qaeda sanctuary in western Iraq, and a regional conflagration going beyond the country's borders.

There are good reasons to give the war effort, now almost four years old, another six to nine months before concluding that the current strategy should be discarded and a much different one -- involving far fewer (if any) foreign forces -- adopted. First, the new surge strategy being implemented by Gen. David Petraeus, while still insufficiently resourced, is much more consonant with classic counterinsurgency doctrine than anything the coalition has tried to date. Second, Iraq's Nouri al-Maliki government, while disappointing on balance, is less than a year old and may still improve. Third, and relatedly, the Democratic victory in the U.S. last fall is still fresh -- meaning that Iraqi political leaders are still digesting its significance. Some of them may be shocked into a greater sense of urgency now that they realize the American commitment to their country is finite and waning.

Robert Gates, Condoleezza Rice and Gen. Petraeus have all indicated that the new strategy should show progress by this summer if it has any chance to be successful. While there will likely be considerable debate over how much progress would be enough to warrant its continuation at that point, we should be able to agree that the violence must decline substantially. Currently, with 4,000 civilians killed and another 100,000 fleeing their homes per month, the country is being torn apart. If these numbers do not drop substantially within six months or so, it will then be time to move on.

Patience makes sense, for now. Congressional critics should, whether they personally support the surge or not, tolerate it for a few more months. It would be better to spend their time evaluating its progress, developing proposed "Plan B" options (such as Sen. Joseph Biden's plan for federalism), and contemplating proper political and legislative strategies to force a fight with Mr. Bush if necessary come the fall, when a new fiscal year begins and a new budget for the war will again be needed. But for now, war critics should, however begrudgingly, watch and wait.

Security Crackdown Nets Insurgents, Weapons, Iraqi Officials Say (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

A top Iraqi military official announced today that authorities have killed more than two dozen militants, arrested hundreds of others and seized huge caches of weaponry in the last week, declaring that a 3-week-old security crackdown was working even as car bombs, mortar attacks and shootings continued to claim lives around the country.

The announcement by Brig. Gen. Qassim Atta Musawi comes as many Iraqis are expressing a growing impatience with the U.S.-Iraqi security push. Iraqis overwhelmingly want the plan to work and are frustrated by multiple daily attacks that have continued even as they have put up with neighborhood raids, house-to-house searches and vehicle stops. Government officials say the effort is still in its early stages.

"We are sensing that the trust of the people has started increasing with the Iraqi forces and they are cooperating better now," Musawi said at a news conference to announce results and new safety measures. "The level of the terrorists' activities in general witnesses a noticeable decrease."

A car bomb at a wholesale market in the mixed south Baghdad neighborhood of Bayaa killed 10 people and injured 21 others this morning.

In downtown Baghdad, two police officers were killed and four injured in a gun battle with attackers after a suicide bomber tried to drive a pick-up truck loaded with propane tanks into a police station.

Five civilians were killed in south Baghdad by mortar and roadside bomb attacks.

Musawi, the Iraqi military official, said authorities were introducing further security precautions, including precluding motorists from parking cars along main streets, and said 24-hour hotlines were being established for citizens to report suspicious activity. He said the government would soon receive sonar imaging equipment that would help authorities detect bombs planted in cars.

Since the new plan began two weeks ago, he said, authorities have killed 70 militants and arrested 450 known militants and 370 suspects. The effort has also resulted in the rescue and release of 17 kidnapping victims, he said.

While supporting the plan, some Iraqi leaders say it will not work unless it is carried out in combination with more comprehensive efforts at economic stimulation and political reconciliation.

Security enforcement "will not be successful if it is done alone, because it needs the other two sides to be successful," said Izzat Shabandar, a member of the secular Iraqi National Slate party in parliament.

Soldiers Shift To Baghdad Outposts (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 28 -- American soldiers are leaving their sprawling fortress-cities and establishing many small outposts in the capital's most violent neighborhoods in a major tactical shift under the two-week-old Baghdad security plan.

Informed by counterinsurgency theory that calls for placing units full-time among the people they want to sway, U.S. troops are using their new bases to work with their Iraqi counterparts, uncover more battlefield intelligence and reinforce, by their sustained presence, the message that they will not allow militants unfettered freedom of movement.

But along with these advantages, American soldiers say these outposts pose new risks to their own safety and require pulling soldiers off patrols to protect their lodgings. The threats became apparent this month when a car bomb exploded at a U.S. outpost in Tarmiyah, north of Baghdad, killing two U.S. soldiers and wounding 29 others.

At a new U.S.-Iraqi base in the Jamiyah neighborhood of western Baghdad, a platoon of American soldiers guards the front gate and watches from the rooftop.

"These little combat outposts, they are more exposed: Your routes in here are very limited, and they're definitely watching us," Staff Sgt. Marcel Weaver, 35, said of the insurgents operating in the neighborhood around the base. A grenade "attack is coming, I can guarantee that."

U.S. soldiers have opened 15 of about 30 planned "joint security stations" in the capital. They have also set up an unspecified number of smaller "combat outposts." U.S. military spokesmen did not respond to requests for information about how many such outposts are operating in Baghdad or how many times they have been attacked.

Early Sunday, the U.S. Army battalion commander for the Jamiyah base gathered his top staff inside the station's control room, in what used to be a wedding hall, and discussed the distressing trend of violence just outside their base. The day before, a few hundred yards from the front gate, insurgents blasted rocket-propelled grenades at an Iraqi-guarded checkpoint, followed the barrage with small-arms fire, then detonated two car bombs when American troops rushed to respond.

"What is it about this checkpoint that makes it such a magnet?" asked Lt. Col. Dale Kuehl, the battalion commander, studying a large aerial map of western Baghdad. "Why does it always get attacked?" he asked again, prodding his staff.

His soldiers answered that the recent arrival of Iraqi and U.S. soldiers in the embattled Sunni neighborhood had created an enticing target for insurgents. Kuehl agreed that the ambush may have been designed to draw out the Americans. "Yes, they probably have determined that we are here, and this would have been the route we would have taken to get out," he said.

Later that day, two mortar rounds landed about 50 yards outside another outpost the battalion had set up in a defunct shopping mall in the Adil neighborhood. The blasts struck a Humvee, deflating three tires. At a third new post, in a police station in the al-Khadraa neighborhood, soldiers have faced gunfire and a series of roadside bombs planted amid the trash along the one route to the base.

"I'm sure we're under surveillance, and I'm sure they're looking for our weak points, and that's for every one of these outposts," said Kuehl, who commands the 1st Battalion, 5th Cavalry Regiment, attached to the 1st Infantry Division. "We will never finish building the force protection around this place. It's got to be thought through every day and rehearsed."

The soldiers planned to erect new concrete blast walls on the northern and southern flanks of the two-story headquarters this week. Kuehl has instructed his soldiers to assume the perspective of the enemy and practice, or "red-team," ways to attack the compound. Up on the rooftop, soldiers are stationed at four sandbagged machine-gun turrets every hour of the day.

"I guess it is a little scary," said Pvt. Peter Lahoda, 22, as he gripped an M240 belt-fed machine gun in a turret that has been shot at three times from the street below. Positioned next to him was a life-size mannequin dressed in U.S. military fatigues, its middle fingers extended, that is used as a decoy for gunmen on the street. He said the attacks are often drive-by shootings, fired from a car's back seat or from holes punched in the trunk. "Up here, you're definitely organic to what's going on. You see VBIEDs, you see explosions like 200 meters away," he said, using a military abbreviation for car bombs.

The concern over security at the station imposes limits on one of its central missions: cooperating with Iraqi security forces. Iraqi soldiers at the station are prohibited from entering an operations room where U.S. soldiers discuss classified information. They are not allowed on the roof where Americans watch over the neighborhood. They live on the first floor while Americans inhabit the second. While certain information is shared with the Iraqi army leadership, the lower-ranking soldiers are kept out of briefing sessions, largely because the Americans are suspicious that information will be passed on to insurgents.

"There's a potential for a leak," said Capt. Ramiro Roldan, 25. "We tell them we're going to set up our vehicles at this location to cordon and search an area, there's a potential that we might get a VBEID attack there."

"We just came here, and we can't trust them so much," said Sgt. Freddie Torres.

It has been only a month since the battalion moved into the building, which had been occupied by Iraqi security forces. The Americans cleaned up a horrid tableau of human feces, trash and dead cats littering the premises.

Some American soldiers say the days patrolling the streets and nights drinking tea and playing dominoes with the Iraqis have fashioned a fledgling camaraderie. The Americans also have grown closer to one another while enduring the spartan lodgings -- sleeping on cots, living without showers or toilets, burning their waste -- that feel far removed from the buffet dinners and air-conditioned gyms on the Camp Liberty base, near the Baghdad airport, they left behind.

"Liberty's like being in Kuwait," Torres said. "If we stayed at Liberty the whole time, then we're not bringing the fight to them. This at least gives us an intimidation factor, knowing we're out here on the grind ready to take it to them."

Kuehl said he believes that over time, operating out of smaller bases will be safer for his soldiers as the neighbors grow to appreciate their backyard policemen and act as an alarm system about impending trouble.

"We're going to get more information, and when we get that information, we can target better, and if we target better, we can get more bad guys off the street and we don't hurt the locals while we do it," he said. "And the other part of getting out here, and I think it's something we've missed in the mission for a while . . . is our purpose to protect the people."

U.S. commanders say they choose the location of the security stations and combat outposts based on where soldiers can most disrupt the insurgency. Kuehl said he moved a platoon into the second floor of the al-Khadraa outpost to stop insurgent weapons traffic through the area.

In the first 10 days since soldiers moved in, drive-by shooters have taken potshots and at least four bombs have exploded on the road outside the entrance, said Lt. Brian Larsen, 23, the platoon leader.

"As far as force protection measures go, this place needs improvement," said Sgt. 1st Class Kenneth Chaney.

The soldiers have stacked sandbags in their bedroom windows and draped green netting over their gun positions, and they are making plans to install light fixtures outside and raise the exterior walls by several feet to limit the risk from gunfire.

Sitting on his bunk inside the police station, Sgt. James Simpson, 30, of Atlanta, said grunts like him are prepared for the threats surrounding them.

"It's definitely more exposed, but that's the risk we take," he said. "The safest thing for everybody is to hurry up and beat these guys."

Saddam Ammo Still Kills Troops (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

WASHINGTON — Four years after the Iraq war began, the country remains awash in Saddam-era munitions that provide key ingredients for homemade bombs used against U.S. troops, according to administration documents and military officials.

More than $1 billion has been spent to clear about 15,000 sites of the unsecured weapons. To clear the remaining 3,391 sites, the Pentagon says it needs a portion of a $1.2 billion request for items to protect U.S. troops in Iraq.

Improvised explosive devices that use the munitions have killed or wounded thousands of U.S. troops. Defense Secretary Robert Gates estimates that 70% of U.S. casualties in Iraq stem from IEDs.

"Insurgents use munitions from stolen caches to construct IEDs," according to the Pentagon's budget request released last month.

Hundreds of buildings, in-ground bunkers, warehouses and buried caches also contain uncleared ammunition, the Pentagon budget request shows. The Army Corps of Engineers runs the munitions-clearance program.

The problem of unsecured munitions was obvious soon after the fall of Saddam Hussein in spring 2003, Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I. said.

DOJ_NMG_0138494

Reed, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee and former Army officer, said there weren't enough U.S. troops in Iraq to destroy the weapons. The munitions include bullets, artillery shells and missiles.

"It should have been taken care of immediately," Reed said.

Eliminating the munitions is a huge task, said Bill Sargent, who runs the munitions-clearance program for the Army Corps of Engineers.

More than 400,000 tons of weapons have been destroyed, and 19,000 tons have been set aside for the Iraqi army, he said.

"There's no telling how many soldiers and Iraqi civilians that we've saved by the amount of stuff we're taking off the streets," Sargent said.

Munitions experts plan to have all major weapons sites in Iraq secured by April, Sargent said. They'll then move to smaller sites.

Allied troops find new ammunition sites in Iraq every day, Sargent said, which makes it hard to get exact details on how much loose ammunition remains.

It might be impossible to stem the supply of materials for IEDs because Iraq has so many weapons, said John Pike, director of military think tank GlobalSecurity.org.

Saddam "never wanted to run out of bullets," Pike said. "And he never did."

Local Sheik In Ramadi Adds Detail On Attack (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño And Naseer Mehdawi

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 28 -- A community leader in the western Iraqi city of Ramadi provided additional information Wednesday about a deadly car bombing earlier this week that U.S. officials said did not occur.

Raad Sabah al-Mukeilef, a sheik who said he lives about 500 yards from where the bomb exploded Monday, said in a telephone interview Wednesday that he believes members of the Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq set off the bomb near a playground after being unable to get past a checkpoint that leads to his house, which is near a government building.

Children, ages 4 to 17, were playing soccer when a man at the wheel of a small truck pulled up next to the checkpoint, he said.

"He came in a pickup," Mukeilef said. "Instead of coming in my street, he did it in a small park for children." Mukeilef said he has participated in a U.S.-backed group of sheiks opposed to Sunni insurgents.

Mukeilef's account corroborated information provided Tuesday by Col. Tariq al-Alwani, the security supervisor in Anbar province in western Iraq. Both men said the blast killed 16 children and three women, one of whom died Wednesday from her wounds. Ramadi is the provincial capital.

A U.S. military official denied on Wednesday that children had been killed in a bombing in Ramadi. The U.S. military said it detonated a seized cache of explosives Tuesday elsewhere in Ramadi, injuring at least 30 civilians who were struck by flying glass and debris because military officials misjudged the power of the explosives. Some initial news reports indicated that children playing soccer at that location had been killed.

"We ran this down," said Rear Adm. Mark Fox, a top military spokesman in Iraq, at a briefing Wednesday. "There was no second blast and there were not 18 children killed. The soccer field that was touted in the erroneous report was across the street from the structure that was in the controlled detonation."

Mukeilef and Alwani said the detonation and the truck bombing occurred in separate parts of the city.

Another military official responded Wednesday night to an inquiry about the new accounts of Monday's bombing by reissuing the news release about Tuesday's "controlled" cache detonation.

Mukeilef said no U.S. military personnel responded to the bombing scene. News of Monday's blast traveled slowly because most reporters have fled Ramadi, a Sunni insurgent stronghold, fearing for their safety.

"We are very isolated," he said. "We don't have any media."

On Wednesday morning, another car bomb killed 10 people in southwest Baghdad in the Bayya district, according to Lt. Col. Salam Hanoun, a spokesman for the Iraqi Interior Ministry. The blast also wounded at least nine people and set cars and shops on fire.

Also Wednesday, the U.S. military said an American soldier was fatally shot Tuesday in western Baghdad.

Meanwhile, Syrian and Iranian officials confirmed they will attend a regional security conference in Baghdad on March 10, the Associated Press reported. The conference will include American representatives. U.S. officials have accused Syria and Iran of exacerbating violence in Iraq. The conference opens a door to diplomatic talks between Washington and representatives of those two countries.

Sunnis - Not Shiites - Biggest Threat To U.S. Troops (MCT)

By Drew Brown

WASHINGTON - Sunni Muslim insurgents remain by far the biggest threat to American troops in Iraq, despite recent U.S. claims that Iran is providing Shiite Muslim militia groups with a new type of roadside bomb, a review of American casualty reports shows.

While U.S. military officials have held briefings to publicize their concerns about the potent bombs known as explosively formed projectiles (EFPs) or penetrators, casualty reports suggest that such weapons in the hands of Shiite militias are responsible for a relatively small number of American deaths.

U.S. officials have said that attacks with such weapons increased 150 percent in the past year. But a review of bombings by location shows that less than 10 percent of attacks that killed at least two American service members in the past 14 months were in areas where Shiite militias are dominant.

Those reports show that fewer than half the bomb attacks on heavily armored U.S. vehicles such as Abrams tanks and Bradley Fighting Vehicles were in areas where Shiite militias dominate.

While it's difficult to know which armed group planted a bomb, analysts say the casualty numbers show that U.S. officials are exaggerating the importance of EFPs, which military officials say have been used only by Shiites.

"There were relatively few American deaths from explosively formed penetrators until recently, but you can say the same thing about attacks on helicopters or chlorine attacks," said Loren Thompson, a defense analyst with the Lexington Institute, a policy research group in Arlington, Va. "The fact of the matter is that the insurgents, both Sunni and Shiite, are becoming a lot more sophisticated in their tactics. Explosively formed penetrators are only one part of that, and they are not a particularly important part."

Pentagon officials say the issue is important because the Iranian government appears to be involved.

"I think the issue is not whether or not materials and supplies are coming from Iran - they are - but rather how far up the Iranian leadership is involved," said Bryan Whitman, the Pentagon's chief spokesman.

U.S. military officials accuse Iran of supplying Shiite militants with EFPs, which fire a molten slug of metal that can punch through the thickest American armor, including tanks and other vehicles designed to withstand heavy blasts. The officials say the bombs have killed at least 170 U.S. and allied service members and wounded more than 620 since they were first discovered on the battlefield in mid-2004.

Those officials have declined to provide other information about the bombs' use, including when and where the explosions that killed Americans took place. They say that such information would tip off the enemy to its successes.

Roadside bombs have killed at least 1,150 Americans since the war began, according to Coalition Casualty Count, a Web site that tracks coalition casualties in Iraq and Afghanistan. Of those, 496 died from Dec. 1, 2005, through Jan. 31 of this year.

U.S. military officials point to the discovery of a weapons cache in a Shiite village near Baqouba, about 40 miles from Baghdad, as the latest evidence that Iran is supplying Shiite militants with weapons.

On Monday, the Defense Department posted a video of the discovery on the Web and American officers in Baghdad displayed weapons seized in the raid, including rocket-propelled grenades, 120 mm mortars and 122 mm rockets that they said bore markings that proved the weapons were made in Iran last year.

The find also included artillery rounds, land mines, detonation cord, triggering devices, C-4 explosives and more than 140 metal discs, which U.S. military officers said were components for making EFPs.

Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, the No. 2 commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, said earlier this week that the weapons clearly were linked to Iran.

"The mortar tubes were made in Iran," he said. "We know that the pieces of the explosively formed projectiles, the machine pieces, were made in Iran. So we know they're being developed and brought into Iraq."

Odierno said on CNN this week that he was convinced that the EFP materials were coming from Iran.

"We have tried to see people replicate them here in Iraq, and they have not been able to do it," he said. "The machining required, the materials that are required, we think absolutely are coming from Iran, and you saw the big cache we found just the other day - almost 140 of these could be produced from that cache that we found."

Odierno said Iran's al Quds commando force was involved either in training or supplying Shiite groups, but the full extent of the Iranian government's involvement remains unclear.

Analysts say the evidence is far from clear that Iran could be the only source for the bomb components.

"Explosively formed penetrators are not some exclusive franchise for the Iranians," Thompson said. "They are fairly common around the world."

Explosively formed penetrators are also known as shaped charges. The warheads were developed after World War I to penetrate tanks and other armored vehicles. Rocket-propelled grenades and antitank missiles are conventional examples. Shaped charges also are used in the oil and gas industry.

John Pike, the executive director of GlobalSecurity.org, an online clearinghouse for military, intelligence and homeland-security information, said that while designing a shaped charge would require expertise, fabricating the devices was simpler, requiring only skill in using metal-machining tools.

"These are not factory-produced munitions," he said.

Asked who'd have the expertise to manufacture a shaped charge, Pike cited "people who had worked with explosives in the petroleum industry." In Iraq, he said, "there would be a fair number of those."

Roadside bombs have been the No. 1 killer of U.S. service members in Iraq for years, though the numbers were dropping last year compared with the year before until October, when they shot up sharply, according to the Coalition Casualty Count Web site. December was the deadliest month of the war for roadside bombs, with 67 American deaths, nearly half of which were in Baghdad.

Overall, however, the number of U.S. deaths from IEDs in 2006 was up less than 6 percent from the year before; 419 last year compared with 397 in 2005, according to Coalition Casualty Count.

The spike in the last quarter of the year corresponded with an increased use of explosively formed projectiles during the same period, according to American defense officials. Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said on the Senate floor recently that 90 percent of the EFPs detonated in Iraq had been used in Baghdad.

U.S. military officials say EFPs are more dangerous than other types of roadside bombs because they typically produce more casualties.

American casualty reports show that the deadliest roadside-bomb attacks of the war have occurred in predominantly Sunni areas or areas with mixed ethnic and religious populations.

Of the 81 roadside bomb attacks that killed two or more soldiers from December 2005 through January 2007, one-quarter occurred in western Iraq, which is predominantly Sunni, and nearly two-thirds took place in Baghdad and other ethnically and religiously mixed areas, the reports show. Fewer than 10 percent were in predominantly Shiite areas.

Of the 10 fatal bomb attacks on M1 Abrams tanks in the same period, four were in Baghdad and four in Anbar province, a mostly Sunni area. One each occurred in Balad and Taji, which have large Sunni populations and big U.S. bases.

Of the 11 fatal attacks on Bradley Fighting Vehicles during that period, four were in Baghdad. Four were in Taji, and one each occurred in Ramadi, Balad and al Muqdadiyah, all of which have large concentrations of Sunnis.

The three worst attacks on Bradleys were in Taji: Three American soldiers died in a roadside bombing Feb. 22, three in an attack last April 11 and four in a bombing Aug. 27.

US Post-Iraq Invasion Policies 'Incompetent': US Diplomat (AFP)

AFP, March 1, 2007

The US policy in Iraq following the 2003 invasion was "incompetent, foolish, dubious," the new US coordinator for Iraq's economic development said Wednesday.

Ambassador Timothy Carney told NPR radio that the US policy to exclude Iraqis from governing the country in the two years following the invasion was "an enormous foolishness" which contributed to the deterioration of security and lengthened the conflict in the country.

"We don't need to go into detail on that, but I think words such as incompetent, foolish, dubious in all of its aspects are the most charitable way to look at that period," he said.

Carney went to Iraq shortly after the March 2003 invasion to manage the country's industry and minerals ministry, but quit after two months and became an outspoken critic of US occupation policy.

"The major failing of policy and operations in 2003 was the failure to invite Iraqis into our councils. We actually thought we could govern this country," he told NPR.

"It was enormously costly in terms of time, and consequently in terms of our and Iraqi blood and the blood of many of our allies."

"What an enormous foolishness that was."

Carney, recently named by the White House to return to oversee rebuilding of the country, said he was appalled by the deterioration in the security situation since he was first there.

But he said he thought the United States still had a chance to achieve some if not all of its policy goals in the country.

"The Iraqis I've met with remain the very same smart, imaginative, creative and impatient people whom I met in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0138497

"It's for those reasons that I continue to believe that this effort can come out to the benefit of Iraq, perhaps not realizing all of the policy goals the United States seeks here, but certainly far more than we deserve, given the way we approached this in 2003 and 2004."

Iraq Carney Finds New Role: Reconstructing Iraq (NPR)

Morning Edition, February 28, 2007 · Diplomat Tim Carney left Iraq three years ago — angry and outspoken about United States policy there. Now the administration has asked him to return as the economic coordinator.

It's a surprise invitation for an official who has said that the U.S. was not listening to Iraqis after the invasion, and formulating policy in isolation from the people it affected.

Carney is a veteran diplomat; over the last three decades, he has served in Cambodia, Haiti and Sudan, among other posts. In his return Baghdad news conference, he stood by his earlier criticism of administration policy in Iraq.

"In 2003, the coalition, notably the United States, failed to invite Iraqis into our councils," Carney said. "And that failure is what has led to the situation in which the country finds itself today."

It's a situation where U.S. federal oversight agencies say billions of dollars in aid was wasted. But Carney says the situation is improving.

"The big difference now is that Iraqis are inviting us into their councils to try to help use our resources to actually get things done," Carney said.

As economic coordinator, Carney will juggle a dizzying, and often overlapping, list of U.S. funding organizations, including USAID, the U.S. Treasury, the U.S. Army Corp of Engineers and others.

But with American reconstruction money drying up, Carney's biggest job will be to help Iraqis spend their own money, primarily from oil revenues.

Despite the deteriorating state of the country's electricity system, road networks and other public services, the ministries have managed to spend as little as 15 percent of their budgets.

The reasons are numerous, including problems finding companies to work under dangerous conditions, a lack of skilled contracting officers and U.S. anti-corruption programs that have intimidated bureaucrats.

"This is still a relatively new government. This government needs to demonstrate convincingly to the Iraqi people that they are governing for the benefit of all Iraqis," Carney said.

In part, Carney will rely on the State Department's "provincial reconstruction teams," known as PRTs.

The PRT program was launched a year ago to help the Iraqi government function better. There are 10 branch offices around the country.

Because of security concerns, the Baghdad PRT is a well-guarded office inside the heavily fortified Green Zone. If getting into the office is difficult, getting out to meet the Iraqi officials they want to help is even more so.

Each time he wants to leave, Deputy Director Bob Ruck has to organize an elaborate security convoy.

"We're trying to teach governance right now two hours at a time," Ruck said. "You get in a convoy, you drive down there, you meet with them, you leave; it's frustrating."

Ruck wants to place staff full time in key government offices. But security is an issue standing in the way of staff integration.

The program has also been criticized for not having people with the right backgrounds on staff. Baghdad PRT Director Joe Gregoire admits the State Department has had trouble hiring skilled people to work on PRTs.

"The problems is finding people who are very specific to certain subject matters," Gregoire said. "[Like] real business development [people], as you would expect from people who might be working for the Department of Commerce."

President Bush proposed last month doubling the number of teams, saying such civilians are now central to American efforts.

But just filling the jobs of the original PRTs is a challenge. U.S. officials say expanding them will take until the end of the year, at least. By then officials hope the risks will not be as great as they are now.

Death Penalty Gets A 2nd Global Look (WT)

By Betsy Pisik, The Washington Times

DOJ_NMG_0138498

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

NEW YORK -- The senior U.N. human rights official yesterday said she senses a global interest in revising the death penalty, triggered in part by the public execution of former Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein.

Louise Arbour, the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, said she does not expect to see a "spontaneous uprising or outcry" against capital punishment, but she does perceive a willingness among governments to consider restricting the death penalty -- or at least opening up the opaque process.

"I sense that this year there is an opportunity to move towards abolition in some countries, moratorium in others and transparency in some which still surround the application of the death penalty with secrecy," Mrs. Arbour told reporters here yesterday.

"The call for abolition is rarely the result of a spontaneous enlightenment. It is usually triggered by an event in countries that have the courage to face their own shortcomings," she said. "This event is sometimes a demonstrated wrongful conviction."

The executions in Iraq of Saddam and two of his associates "may have created an environment in which people are asking a lot of serious questions" about the need for a review of capital punishment, she said.

Saddam was hanged in December. Shouting and jeering by Shi'ites at the execution, which was caught on a cell-phone camera, drew condemnation from President Bush and other world leaders. When Saddam's half brother Barazan Ibrahim was hanged in January, his head was severed.

Mrs. Arbour was pragmatic on whether her agency could make inroads in the United States, where capital punishment is administered by states and appears to have popular support.

She indicated that she would not be bringing up the matter with the U.S. government or courts the same way her office does in other, more receptive countries.

"If the courts are willing to listen to us, we are not going to shy away," Mrs. Arbour said. "It depends on our own capacity to make a contribution in a case where the advocacy of international standards are not likely to be advanced by others."

Mrs. Arbour, a former Canadian justice and a prosecutor for the international criminal tribunals for Rwanda and Yugoslavia, is a tough-minded and plain-spoken advocate for what she sees as basic human rights.

The official U.N. position is that it respects the domestic laws of member states. However, Mrs. Arbour and others in the human rights sphere say that all people have the right to life, a de facto repudiation of capital punishment.

The Web site of the U.N. special rapporteur for extrajudicial, summary and arbitrary executions, Philip Alston, notes, in part: "Given that the loss of life is irreparable, the Special Rapporteur ... emphasizes that the abolition of capital punishment is most desirable in order fully to respect the right to life. He also wishes to mention that, while there is a fundamental right to life, there is no such right to capital punishment."

According to Amnesty International, 88 nations and territories have explicitly outlawed the death penalty, while 69 permit capital punishment for crimes of varying degrees of severity from rape to treason.

The European Union has shelved capital punishment, while the United States, Iran, Iraq, China and South Korea are among those that impose it.

U.S. Knew Of Threats As Cheney Visited Base (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa And Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 28 — NATO and American forces knew that a suicide bomber was at large in the Bagram area before the suicide bomb attack on Tuesday that killed 23 people at the main gate of the United States air base where Vice President Dick Cheney was staying, a NATO spokesman said Wednesday. But despite the vice president's presence, the Afghan police chief in the area said he had not been informed of the possible threat.

"We know for a fact that there has been recent intelligence to suggest that there was the threat of a bombing in the Bagram area," the spokesman, Col. Tom Collins, said at a news briefing in Kabul.

"It is clear there are suicide bombers' cells operating in this country," he said. "There are some operating in the city of Kabul and, as our intelligence suggests, they had the capability in the Bagram area."

The Afghan police chief of Bagram district, Muhammad Salem Ehsas, said Wednesday that he had been unaware of any threat of a suicide bomber in the area, suggesting a lack of coordination between the security forces on the ground even while Mr. Cheney was present.

Afghan police officers guard the outer gate at the Bagram air base, and it is possible that they let the bomber through to the second gate, which is operated by American soldiers and other members of the international military force. Commander Ehsas said it was also possible that the bomber gained access to the American gate through the residential areas near the base.

At least 19 Afghan workers, including a 12-year-old boy, were killed in the blast, as were a South Korean soldier, an American soldier, an American civilian contractor and the bomber, the military said in a statement. Many of the workers were lined up outside the gate, waiting to clear the security checkpoint before going to work inside.

Mr. Cheney spent the night at Bagram unexpectedly after heavy snow prevented him from getting to a meeting with President Hamid Karzai at the presidential palace in Kabul. Mr. Cheney was at the base when the bomber struck at 10 a.m. Tuesday, but he continued on to Kabul to meet President Karzai at midday as planned.

The Taliban claimed responsibility for the blast and said it had been aimed at Mr. Cheney, and even named the bomber, saying he came from Logar, a province south of the capital, Kabul. But Colonel Collins said that their claim was "absurd" and that the timing of the bombing could have been just a coincidence.

"Their claim is simply going for more psychological impact on the population," he said. "Clearly what they have done here is simply killing more innocent people."

Afghanistan has been hit by more than 100 suicide bombings in the past year, and many have appeared to be opportunistic attacks, where the bombers had been walking, loitering or driving around looking for a target, usually a foreign military convoy. Others have approached military bases and government buildings on foot and set off their explosion at an entrance.

The American military is conducting the investigation of the bomb blast, said Colonel Collins, the spokesman for the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force, or ISAF.

"Unfortunately, we do expect more attacks," he said. "And the enemy knows that they cannot defeat Afghan National Security Forces and ISAF forces in the conventional sense, so we do expect them increasingly to go after soft targets, which means civilians."

Mr. Ehsas said he also believed that it was more likely that the bombing was an opportunistic attack against the civilians lined up at the gate. "I don't think it was connected to Cheney's visit," he said. "The aim was the people in the crowd."

Threat To Bagram Was Known (WP)

By Jason Straziuso

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

KABUL, Feb. 28 -- Intelligence reports indicated that the Taliban had the ability to carry out suicide attacks near the main U.S. base in Afghanistan even before a deadly bombing during a visit by Vice President Cheney, NATO said Wednesday.

Col. Tom Collins, the top spokesman for NATO's force in Afghanistan, said suicide bomb cells were present in the capital, Kabul, just 30 miles south of Bagram air base.

A policeman helps a relative of one of at least 23 people who were killed in a suicide bombing Tuesday near Bagram air base, the main U.S. installation in Afghanistan. The blast occurred when Vice President Cheney was inside.

"We know for a fact that there has been recent intelligence to suggest that there was the threat of a bombing in the Bagram area," Collins said. "It's clear that there are suicide bomber cells operating in this country. There are some in the city of Kabul."

Tuesday's bombing killed at least 23 people, including two Americans, outside Bagram while Cheney was meeting with officials inside. The Taliban, an Islamic militia that ruled most of Afghanistan until the U.S.-led invasion in 2001, said the attack was aimed at Cheney, but officials said it posed no real threat to the vice president.

The attacker never tried to penetrate even the first of several U.S.-manned security checkpoints at Bagram, instead detonating his explosives among a group of Afghan workers outside the base.

"The Taliban's claims that they were going after the vice president were absurd," Collins said.

Collins said it was unclear whether the Taliban had really known of Cheney's visit, or if the timing of the attack was a coincidence. The last suicide bombing at Bagram was in June 2006, when an attack aimed at a U.S. convoy wounded two Afghans near a market area outside the base.

U.S. Ambassador Ronald E. Neumann said he did not believe that the Taliban had responded to Cheney's presence, given that he arrived on Monday and stayed the night only because bad weather forced him to postpone a meeting with Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

"I just have not seen the ability to react that quickly, to grab your handy-dandy latest suicide candidate, who is usually not your brightest fellow around, and get him mobilized and get him up to the gate," Neumann said. "It strains credulity for me."

Pakistan Denies Hosting Bin Laden, Camps (AP)

By Munir Ahmad

DOJ_NMG_0138500

Pakistan on Wednesday rejected a claim by the U.S. intelligence chief that Osama bin Laden and his deputy were hiding in northwestern Pakistan, and that al-Qaida was setting up camps near the Afghan border.

President Gen. Pervez Musharraf, however, acknowledged that foreign militants were in Pakistan's tribal regions along the Afghan border and warned them to leave, the state-run news agency reported. It was not clear from the report whether Musharraf named any particular militants.

Musharraf spoke a day after new U.S. intelligence chief Mike McConnell told a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing that al-Qaida is trying to set up training camps and other operations in Pakistan tribal areas near Afghanistan.

"It's something we're very worried about and very concerned about," McConnell said. U.S. intelligence officials believe that bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, were trying to establish an al-Qaida base in the region, he said. McConnell noted the camps are in an area that has never been governed by any state or outside power.

"We deny it," Interior Minister Aftab Khan Sherpao told The Associated Press, referring to McConnell's remarks.

Sherpao told The Associated Press there were no al-Qaida training camps in his country and U.S. officials had not provided any intelligence suggesting there were.

On a visit to Pakistan on Monday, Vice President Dick Cheney met with Musharraf to seek his aid in foiling an anticipated spring offensive by the Taliban and al-Qaida against coalition forces in Afghanistan.

Cheney was accompanied by Deputy CIA Director Stephen Kappes, suggesting that the U.S. officials were prepared to buttress their allegations about al-Qaida operations with intelligence data.

Musharraf told Cheney that Pakistan was already doing all it could to fight the militants, his office said.

Musharraf vowed Wednesday to take "stiff action" to expel foreign militants from Pakistan's mountainous border regions, the Associated Press of Pakistan news agency reported.

"People have come there from outside. They are living in our mountains and spreading terrorism not just in Pakistan but in the entire world," APP quoted Musharraf as saying at a public meeting in the southern Sindh province.

"These people are putting Pakistan in danger. These people should leave and go, otherwise we will have to deal with them and we are dealing with them," APP quoted him as saying.

U.S. officials are concerned about a peace deal Pakistan signed with tribal leaders of the North Waziristan region in September. In that agreement, the tribes promised to respect the authority of the Pakistani government and curtail cross-border attacks by militants.

In return, Musharraf returned some of the tribes' weapons, released some prisoners and withdrew from posts inside North Waziristan.

At Tuesday's hearing, Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, said the tribes have not abided by most terms of the agreement. McConnell added U.S. intelligence believes al-Qaida's training and related capabilities increased as a result of the deal.

Musharraf's office confirmed that during the meeting, Cheney expressed concern that al-Qaida was "regrouping" in the tribal areas and that the vice president "called for concerted efforts in countering the threat."

Sherpao insisted Pakistan was "fighting the scourge of terrorism in the best interest of Pakistan."

Musharraf is a key ally of the United States in its fight against Islamic militants.

Taliban Official: Bin Laden Is Alive (AP)

AP, March 1, 2007

A senior Taliban commander says Osama bin Laden is alive and in contact with leaders of Afghanistan's Taliban insurgents, according to an interview aired on British television.

Mullah Dadullah said he had not met bin Laden since the fall of the Taliban regime after the U.S.-led invasion of Afghanistan in 2001, but said "we know he's still alive."

"He's not yet martyred. Such information would be easy to get — his comrades stand shoulder to shoulder with us. They keep us informed," Dadullah said in an interview broadcast Wednesday by Channel 4 News.

The authenticity of the information could not be confirmed. Channel 4 did not say how it had obtained the footage, and it was not known when or where Dadullah made the comments, which were translated into English.

Dadullah, commander of Taliban operations in eastern and southeastern Afghanistan and a trusted associate of Taliban leader Mullah Omar, said bin Laden met outsiders rarely. Dadullah did not comment on bin Laden's whereabouts.

"Only his comrades see him; we exchange messages with each other to share plans," Dadullah said. "We also go to the battlefield together. We actually meet very rarely, just for important consultations. It's hard for anyone to meet Bin Laden himself now, but we know he's still alive."

Dadullah said the Taliban had "hundreds more" suicide bombers ready to attack NATO forces in Afghanistan. NATO commanders have said they believe the Taliban plans a spring offensive against alliance troops in the country.

Keep Pressuring Musharraf (LAT)

SINCE 9/11, THE United States has been trapped in an increasingly loveless marriage with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. Like many a miserable mate, the Bush administration has been known to rue the failings of its partner in private. Yet it has always defended Musharraf in public, arguing that whatever his shortcomings, the alternative is far worse.

Such forbearance may be changing. For the first time, the Bush administration this week let Islamabad know, through Vice President Dick Cheney, that it is unhappy with Pakistan's performance in fighting the resurgent Taliban. And it hinted that if things don't improve, the White House might not be able to keep the Democratic-controlled Congress from cutting U.S. aid to Pakistan.

This burst of candor is long overdue — and so is an overhaul of U.S. policy toward Pakistan. Musharraf, who ousted an elected government in a 1999 coup, has received between $8 billion and $10 billion in direct U.S. aid since 9/11 (and perhaps almost as much in covert aid) yet shows no signs of winning the war against Islamic extremism or of advancing democracy in Pakistan. On the contrary, his hold on power exists in part because of his unholy alliance with Islamist legislators.

President Bush and Congress have been willing to ignore these problems so long as Pakistan was seen as an indispensable ally in the struggle against Al Qaeda and the Taliban, was rolling up the Abdul Qadeer Khan black-market nuclear operation and appeared to be improving relations with India. But Islamabad's failed peace deal in North Waziristan, an escalation in cross-border attacks into Afghanistan and reports of Taliban bases in the tribal areas on Pakistani territory have made that bargain less satisfying. Congress is considering placing conditions on aid.

Meanwhile, the Pakistanis are having their own doubts about the marriage. They believe that the U.S. is just using them in the war on terror and will dump them as soon as they're no longer needed. And they say they are being blamed for NATO's failure to curb the Taliban inside Afghanistan — a weakness highlighted by the suicide bombing Tuesday outside Bagram air base during Cheney's visit.

The U.S. has a profound interest in the welfare of this strategic Muslim state with nuclear weapons. But what is the purpose of sending $80 million a month in "coalition support" to a Pakistani military that is not willing to fight in the tribal areas? Some conditions need to be imposed on U.S. aid, and some of the aid needs to be redirected to education, development and the building of democracy, including political parties, so that popular alternatives to Musharraf can one day emerge.

Supporters of the status quo say pressuring the politically fragile Musharraf risks his fall and the rise to power of a radical Islamic regime with nuclear weapons. This is unlikely. The Islamists have never gotten more than 11% of the vote, and fared badly in the last (albeit rigged) municipal elections. But the U.S. could increase the likelihood of Islamist success if it continues to allow Musharraf to repress the moderate opposition while making deals with the Islamists.

The U.S. may well be destined for a long marriage of convenience with Pakistan. But its spouse need not necessarily be named Musharraf.

US Troops In Philippines Defy Old Stereotype (CSM)

By Simon Montlake

ZAMBOANGA, PHILIPPINES

When US troops arrived in the southern islands in December 2001, a decade after closing its bases in the Philippines, critics assailed the move. They predicted a return of permanent US camps in its former colony, and a repeat of the sleazy bars and clubs still surrounding its former bases near Manila.

More alarming to US ears were dire warnings of resistance from Muslims whose island communities were to be rid of militants by US-assisted Philippine troops. Observers warned that the foreign presence could inflame the situation, as well as revive memories of a bloody US military campaign in the early 1900s to subdue Muslim-inhabited Mindanao.

Today, these warnings mostly ring false. About 450 US soldiers are still here, based inside Philippine military command centers in Zamboanga and the nearby island of Jolo. But the expected nightlife boom hasn't happened. Nor have militants taken the fight to the foreigners deployed here, though a US serviceman died in a bomb attack on a restaurant in 2002.

US officers say their small footprint in Mindanao, as well as a focus on joint development projects and counterinsurgency training of the Philippine Army, have smoothed their path. But further challenges lie ahead as US troop, and their Philippine counterparts who are notorious for human rights abuses, continue pursuing Muslim insurgent cells on the islands.

One measure of the US approach can be found on Basilan, where US troops first deployed in 2002. At the time, the extremist group Abu Sayyaf had turned the island, a 30-minute ferry ride from Zamboanga, into a no-go zone with a string of abductions, bombings, and beheadings.

Commander Steve Kelley, a naval engineering reservist, says it was a tough mission. "It wasn't a warm welcome," he recalls. But humanitarian projects, including the construction of an 80- kilometer (50-mile) coastal road and a series of mobile clinics, won residents over. "It was a huge turnaround," he says. Local officials say the improved security has restored normalcy.

Muchtar Muarip, a contractor who worked on the US-funded road, says that the civil outreach convinced some Muslims of their benign intentions. "The US troops promoted development projects that awakened the mind of people in Basilan. It showed that if other people were concerned [about them], they should be concerned," he says.

Mr. Muarip says that his brother, a Muslim who favors adoption of sharia Islamic law in Mindanao, is skeptical of US largesse and rejects the deployment in the Philippines. Other critics say that the arrival of US troops, whatever their intentions, stirs anxiety among Muslims.

"The face of the US in our area is the face of an American soldier, so any good that they do is neutralized by fear of the American military," says Amina Rasul, co-founder of the Philippine Council for Islam and Democracy and scion of a prominent royal family here.

National hackles were also raised by a highly publicized trial of a US marine convicted on Dec. 4 of raping a Philippine woman in 2005. After Lance Cpl. Daniel Smith was sentenced to 40 years in prison, a row erupted over US insistence that he remain in their custody pending an appeal. When the court balked, the embassy vowed to cancel a joint military exercise. Ultimately, the Philippines caved; the exercise begins this week.

Lawyers for the victim protested the handover, and the blunt wielding of US leverage, such as military aid that has totaled more than $300 million since 2002. US officials argue, however, that their request was explicitly ensured in a treaty.

While US forces reaped a degree of goodwill in Basilan through their civil-outreach programs, Jolo may prove more testing. Denied sanctuary on Basilan, Abu Sayyaf has since regrouped on this island, where a US-backed Philippine military offensive against the group is now under way. Also on the run in Jolo are Indonesian militants whom US officials have linked to the 2002 Bali nightclub bombings. The jungle-clad hills hold bitter memories of a US occupation in 1898 that met fierce resistance for more than a decade.

Zain Jali, a spiritual adviser to an insurgent group that signed a 1996 peace deal, says distrust of the Philippine Army and its US advisers runs deep. "In the mind of the people, Americans are their enemy, their historical enemy," he warns.

US officers deployed on Jolo say such attitudes appear to be softening, as humanitarian programs with the Philippine Army and civilian-aid projects bear fruit. USAID has funneled $300 million into Mindanao since 1996.

Dems Seek Testimony From Fired Attorneys (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 1, 2007

Democrats are moving to compel some of the eight U.S. attorneys who have been ousted to tell their stories publicly, under oath, after a federal prosecutor claimed he was fired for political reasons.

A House subcommittee is slated to vote Thursday on subpoenas for four of the eight dismissed U.S. attorneys. The Senate Judiciary Committee, meanwhile, will send letters to those fired before voting next week on compelling their testimony, according to officials with both panels.

The prosecutors have privately told both committees that they would not testify voluntarily but would honor a congressional subpoena, according to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and an official close to the House subcommittee on commercial and administrative law.

House subcommittee Chairwoman Linda Sanchez said her panel will vote on subpoenas for fired prosecutors Carol Lam of California, David Iglesias of New Mexico, H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Arkansas and John McKay of Washington.

"In order to get the full picture of why these U.S. attorneys were fired, we need to hear from the Justice Department and the U.S. attorneys themselves," said House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich.

Schumer, in a telephone interview Wednesday with The Associated Press, said: "If they say they won't come voluntarily, Senator Leahy will authorize subpoenas." The Senate panel is expected to vote on whether to issue the subpoenas next week, said Tracy Schmaler, spokeswoman for Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said the positions are "too important to be politicized." One of the dismissed U.S. attorneys is from Reid's home state.

Spurring the developments was a new report that one of the eight, New Mexico's David Iglesias, claims to have been forced out after refusing a request by two congressmen to rush an indictment that might have helped Republicans in the 2006 election. In the story and a subsequent interview with the AP, Iglesias refused to identify the members of Congress.

The Justice Department staunchly denied the charge that Iglesias or any of the eight federal prosecutors were dismissed for political reasons.

"The suggestion that David Iglesias was asked to resign because he failed to bring an indictment ... is flatly false," Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said in a statement. "This administration has never removed a United States attorney in an effort to retaliate against them or inappropriately interfere with a public integrity investigation."

As to why Iglesias was dismissed, Roehrkasse said: "We made our decision not to further extend his service based on performance-related concerns."

Federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president and can be fired for any reason — or none at all.

But Democrats say the eight firings — some without cause, according to the Justice Department — indicate the Bush administration is using a new provision in the Patriot Act to reward political allies with coveted jobs as U.S. attorneys.

The new provision, enacted a year ago with the reauthorization of the Patriot Act, removes a time limit within which appointees to such posts must be confirmed by the Senate. Democrats say that's a Bush administration effort to get around the confirmation process.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has said he intends to submit the name of every nominee to vacant U.S. attorney posts to the Senate for confirmation.

Still, Democrats tried to revive a bill Wednesday that would reimpose the time limit. An objection by Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., killed the measure. On Wednesday, its sponsor, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., tried to attach it as an amendment to an omnibus bill to tighten the nation's homeland security. Kyl was again expected to block the measure, his spokesman said.

The Justice Department says a 120-day limit isn't enough time for an appointee to be recommended by home-state senators, nominated and confirmed.

But raising the issue on the Senate floor allowed Feinstein to read a news story into the record that fueled the matter anew Wednesday.

In Wednesday's editions, McClatchy Newspapers quoted Iglesias as claiming that two members of Congress contacted him in the weeks before the 2006 election to ask about an investigation of a kickback scheme. He said the members, whom he refused to identify, appeared eager to see an indictment just before the elections.

Corruption charges against two previous state New Mexico treasurers — both Democrats — became an issue during the election; further charges could have helped the Republicans. Iglesias, a Republican, refused to name the members of Congress in the report because he feared retaliation, according to McClatchy Newspapers. Contacted by the AP, Iglesias said: "I've got nothing further to say about that."

The Justice Department's Roeherkasse said that the U.S. Attorneys Manual calls on federal prosecutors to notify the agency of any calls from members of Congress.

"We are unaware that anyone in Main Justice (department headquarters) was notified of any conversations between U.S. Attorney Iglesias and members of the New Mexico Congressional delegation," Roehrkasse said.

Earlier Wednesday, Iglesias' last day on the job, he told reporters at a news conference in Albuquerque, N.M., that the Bush administration's call for his resignation came without warning and was rooted in politics — not performance.

"This episode came like a thief in the night," he said of the Dec. 7 request for him to step down. He added, "Obviously, I tripped some wire."

Associated Press writers Jennifer Talhelm in Washington and Sue Major Holmes in Albuquerque contributed to this report.

Ex-Prosecutor Says Politics Was Motive For Dismissal (NYT)

By David Johnston

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — David C. Iglesias, who was dismissed as the United States attorney in New Mexico, has said he believes that he was ousted because he resisted pressure before the 2006 elections to bring corruption charges against a Democrat in his state, a Democratic senator said on Wednesday.

Mr. Iglesias has told Congressional aides that two federal lawmakers had separately called him in mid-October asking about the status of an inquiry involving a statehouse construction contract and a former Democratic state lawmaker, Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York said in a statement Wednesday on the Senate floor.

Mr. Schumer did not identify the lawmakers who made the calls either by name or party affiliation, but he suggested that they wanted Mr. Iglesias to move quickly with indictments before the November elections to help Republicans.

Mr. Iglesias is one of eight United States attorneys known to have been dismissed in recent months by the Justice Department. Each had been appointed by President Bush during his first term, but Democrats have criticized the removals as politically motivated. Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, said in a floor statement that the firings represented an effort "to bring political operatives into these offices."

Mr. Iglesias's account of the calls was first reported on Wednesday by the McClatchy Newspapers, which said the prosecutor would not identify the lawmakers because he feared retaliation. But in that report, he described the contacts as "appalling."

Justice Department officials said politics was not a factor in Mr. Iglesias's ouster. "The suggestion that David Iglesias was asked to resign because he failed to bring an indictment over a courthouse construction contract is flatly false," said Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman. Mr. Roehrkasse added, "This administration has never removed a United States attorney in an effort to retaliate against them or inappropriately interfere with a public integrity investigation."

The former United States attorneys were not given explanations for their dismissals at the time of their removals, but senior Justice Department officials have said that most were asked to step aside because of job performance problems — an accusation that has angered several and that some have publicly denied.

Mr. Iglesias could not be reached on Wednesday. But The Associated Press reported that at a news conference in Albuquerque on Wednesday, his last day in office, Mr. Iglesias said his dismissal was unrelated to his office's work.

"I know it's not performance-related," Mr. Iglesias told The Associated Press. "I know it's not misconduct. What does that leave? Politics."

Democrats on the House Judiciary Committee said they would invite Mr. Iglesias and some of the other ousted prosecutors to appear before the panel, even though some have said privately that they would not testify unless they were subpoenaed. Democratic lawmakers have questioned the Justice Department's motives because such dismissals are unusual and because six of the eight prosecutors, including Mr. Iglesias, had received favorable job evaluations.

A Justice Department review of Mr. Iglesias's job performance, dated November 2005, concluded that he was "respected by the judiciary, agencies and staff" and had a strategic plan that "complied with the department's priorities."

Other ousted prosecutors had similarly positive evaluations. A March 2006 performance review of John McKay, who was removed from the United States attorney's office in Seattle, found him to be "an effective, well regarded and capable leader." A December 2003 review of Paul K. Charlton, who was ousted as the top federal prosecutor in Arizona, concluded that he was "well respected" by his staff, American Indian nations, local law enforcement and the judiciary "regarding his integrity, professionalism and competence."

Fired U.S. Attorney Says Lawmakers Pressured Him (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

A political tempest over the mass firing of federal prosecutors escalated yesterday with allegations from the departing U.S. attorney in New Mexico, who said that two members of Congress attempted to pressure him to speed up a probe of Democrats just before the November elections.

David C. Iglesias, who left yesterday after more than five years in office, said he received the calls in October and believes that complaints from the lawmakers may have led the Justice Department to fire him late last year.

Iglesias also responded to allegations from Justice officials that he had performed poorly and was too often absent, citing positive job reviews and data showing increasing numbers of prosecutions. He also noted that he is required to serve 40 days a year in the Navy Reserve.

Iglesias declined to name the lawmakers who called him, but he said in an interview: "I didn't give them what they wanted. That was probably a political problem that caused them to go to the White House or whomever and complain that I wasn't a team player."

Iglesias's allegations were met with strong denials from the Justice Department yesterday but prompted the Democratic-controlled House and Senate judiciary committees to announce that they would issue subpoenas for testimony from Iglesias and other fired prosecutors if necessary. Iglesias said he would not testify unless subpoenaed.

Spokesmen for Rep. Steve Pearce (R-N.M.) and the state's two Democratic lawmakers, Sen. Jeff Bingaman and Rep. Tom Udall, said the lawmakers and their staffs had no contact with Iglesias about the case. The offices of New Mexico's two other Republican lawmakers, Sen. Pete V. Domenici and Rep. Heather A. Wilson, did not respond to repeated requests for comment.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse called Iglesias's allegations "flatly false." Roehrkasse said that Iglesias should have reported any calls from lawmakers, as required under department guidelines.

"The administration has never removed a U.S. attorney in an effort to retaliate against him or inappropriately interfere with a public-integrity investigation," Roehrkasse said.

In briefings about the firings on Capitol Hill, Justice Department officials had said that Iglesias was the target of complaints from members of Congress, according to several sources familiar with the meetings, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to discuss personnel issues. The Justice briefers did not specify the nature of those complaints, the sources said.

Iglesias, 49 and the son of a Baptist minister, is a Navy Reserve commander whose role as a defense lawyer in a famous military hazing case was the basis for the Tom Cruise character in the movie "A Few Good Men." He held a news conference in Albuquerque yesterday, in which he said that he was fired for political reasons.

Iglesias was among seven U.S. attorneys notified by phone on Dec. 7 that they were being fired without explanation. An eighth prosecutor, in Little Rock, also was removed in December, to make room for a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove.

The charges by Iglesias added a new dimension to the ongoing controversy over the fired prosecutors, at least four of whom were presiding over major public-corruption probes. Although other fired prosecutors have publicly defended their records, they have never alleged that political pressure related to an ongoing criminal investigation played a role in their dismissals.

In addition to Iglesias's probe of Democrats, fired prosecutors in Arizona, Nevada and California were conducting corruption probes involving Republicans at the time of their dismissals.

"These are extremely serious and very troubling allegations coming from a man of great integrity," said Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), who has been leading a Senate Judiciary Committee inquiry into the firings. "They call into question every other firing. We will continue to pursue this until we get to the bottom of what happened and pass legislation to prevent it from ever happening again."

The dismissals have angered Democrats and some Republicans on Capitol Hill, in part because they followed a little-noticed change in federal law that lets Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely. Legislation has been introduced in both houses to repeal the provision.

Justice officials have acknowledged that they did not fire Bud Cummins from his Little Rock post for cause but have said the others were ousted for "performance-related" reasons. Records show, however, that at least six of the prosecutors, including Iglesias and Cummins, received mostly positive job evaluations before they were forced out.

In an interview Tuesday, Iglesias said the two lawmakers called him about a well-known criminal investigation involving a Democratic legislator. He declined to provide their party affiliation, but his comments indicated the callers were Republicans.

New Mexico media outlets reported last year that the FBI and the U.S. attorney's office in Albuquerque had opened a probe into allegations involving former Democratic state senator Manny Aragon and government construction projects in Bernalillo County. No charges have been filed in the case.

Iglesias said the lawmakers who called him seemed focused on whether charges would be filed before the November elections. He said the calls made him feel "pressured to hurry the subsequent cases and prosecutions" but said he did not receive similar contacts from anyone in the executive branch. He acknowledged he made a mistake by not reporting the calls to the Justice Department.

Referring to the calls, Iglesias said: "I suspect that was the reason I was asked to step down, but I don't know that I'll ever know."

Iglesias said other criticisms of his performance by the Justice Department "are demonstrably untrue statements." He added: "We all have a right to defend our honor. I felt like my honor and the honor of my office was attacked."

Iglesias produced statistics showing that his office's immigration prosecutions had risen more than 78 percent during his tenure and said the office prosecuted record numbers of narcotics and firearms cases as well.

Iglesias cited a January 2006 letter from Michael A. Battle -- the Justice official who fired him -- commending him for "exemplary leadership in the department's priority programs." A November 2005 evaluation obtained by The Washington Post also said Iglesias was "experienced in legal, management and community relations work and was respected by the judiciary, agencies and staff."

Former deputy attorney general James B. Comey, now general counsel for Lockheed Martin, this week praised Iglesias as "one of our finest and someone I had a lot of confidence in as deputy attorney general."

But Roehrkasse said Justice "had a lengthy record from which to evaluate his performance as a manager, and we made our decision not to further extend his service based on performance-related concerns."

Political Interference Is Alleged In The Sacking Of A U.S. Attorney (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor, McClatchy Newspapers

WASHINGTON - Congressional leaders said Wednesday that they'd seek testimony from several U.S. attorneys who were summarily fired by the Bush administration, hours after the top federal prosecutor in New Mexico alleged that he was fired because of political interference.

Democrats in both the House of Representatives and the Senate vowed to hold a new round of hearings to determine if partisan politics played a role in the firings of eight U.S. attorneys across the country. The House is set to vote Thursday on whether to issue subpoenas to four of the prosecutors. The Senate Judiciary Committee plans to ask the U.S. attorneys to testify voluntarily before it decides whether to subpoena them.

The controversy flared up early Wednesday afternoon after David Iglesias, the departing U.S. attorney from New Mexico, told McClatchy Newspapers that he believes he was forced out because he refused to speed up an indictment of local Democrats a month before November's congressional elections.

Iglesias said that two members of Congress called separately in mid-October to inquire about the timing of a federal probe of a kickback scheme. They appeared eager, he said, for an indictment to be issued before the elections in order to benefit the Republicans. He refused to name the members of Congress because, he said, he feared retaliation.

Two months later, on Dec. 7, Iglesias became one of six U.S. attorneys who've been ordered to step down for what administration officials have called "performance-related issues." Two other U.S. attorneys also were asked to resign.

Iglesias, however, had received a positive performance review before he was fired and said that he suspected he was forced out because he resisted the pressure and didn't indict anyone before the election.

"I believe that because I didn't play ball, so to speak, I was asked to resign," Iglesias, who stepped down Wednesday, told McClatchy.

A Justice Department spokesman denied hearing of any congressional interference in the investigation and said Iglesias wasn't fired because of the case.

"The suggestion that David Iglesias was asked to resign because he failed to bring an indictment over a courthouse construction contract is flatly false," said Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman. "This administration has never removed a United States attorney in an effort to retaliate against them or inappropriately interfere with a public integrity investigation."

Roehrkasse said the department has encouraged federal prosecutors to go after corruption cases leading to a number of high-profile corruption indictments.

Justice Department officials have defended the firings of the U.S. attorneys as legitimate administrative decisions meant to improve the workings of the attorneys' offices. Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told the Senate last month that most of the forced resignations were motivated by "performance-related" reasons.

However, McClatchy Newspapers reported last month that five out of the six attorneys that McNulty mentioned had received positive job evaluations.

Iglesias acknowledged that he had no proof that the pressure from the members of Congress prompted his forced resignation. But he said the contact violated one of the most important tenets of a U.S. attorney's office: Don't mix politics with prosecutions.

"I was appalled by the inappropriateness of those contacts," Iglesias said of the calls.

U.S. attorneys are appointed by the president in a political process that includes Senate confirmation. But as soon as they assume office, they're expected to refrain from being politically active and to resist the urge to allow their political leanings to affect the outcomes of cases.

Iglesias said the two members of Congress not only contacted him directly, but also tried to wrest details of the case from him. Iglesias wouldn't comment on the case to McClatchy, but the local media have reported on aspects of the investigation, including allegations that a former Democratic state senator took money to ensure that an $82 million courthouse contract would go to a specific company.

Congressional questions about ongoing cases are supposed to go through the Justice Department's Office of Legislative Affairs to avoid the appearance of impropriety.

Local media had reported that Iglesias' office might issue an indictment before the elections.

Iglesias said he refused to tell the lawmakers when any indictment would be issued, although he'd decided that the investigation needed more time.

He said he now regrets that he didn't report the calls to the Justice Department, as required by policy.

DOJ_NMG_0138507

"I thought it would blow over," he said. "But I was wrong."

Democrats have described the midterm firings of the Republican-appointed U.S. attorneys as unprecedented and questioned whether the firings were politically motivated to root out moderates and install candidates loyal to the administration.

"I called this meeting because we pledged to do everything we can to get to the truth of what could be brazen abuse of power by the Bush administration," said Rep. Linda Sanchez, D-Calif., the chairwoman of the House judiciary subcommittee that'll vote on the subpoenas.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., took to the Senate floor Wednesday afternoon to question the Bush administration's rationale for the firings.

"Clearly, the performance of these U.S. attorneys was not a reason to fire them," Feinstein said.

The decision to fire the U.S. attorneys first came under scrutiny earlier this year after Senate Democrats discovered that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales could use a little-noticed change in the Patriot Act to fill vacancies with interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite terms without Senate approval.

Iglesias and former U.S. attorneys Carol Lam in San Diego, John McKay in Seattle and Bud Cummins in Arkansas could be subpoenaed to testify before the House subcommittee. Iglesias said he would testify only if he were subpoenaed.

Iglesias' allegation raises new questions about the firings and appears to undermine the theory that the administration singled out moderate Republicans. Iglesias, a former military lawyer whose work helped inspire the Tom Cruise character in the movie "A Few Good Men," describes himself as a social conservative who strove to implement the administration's policies. Iglesias also was the first Hispanic to serve as U.S. attorney in his state in decades.

"I represent three huge voting blocks of the Republican party," he said. "I don't know why they would let someone go with those political credentials who has demonstratively done a good job."

Jude McCartin, a spokeswoman for Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., said she hadn't heard of the allegations and couldn't comment on them.

"It wasn't us - that's all I can say," she said.

Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., didn't contact Iglesias about the courthouse investigation, Pearce spokesman David Host said.

Rep. Tom Udall, D-N.M., also didn't call about the case, said Marissa Padilla, Udall's spokeswoman.

Domenici wasn't facing re-election in November, but the state's two other Republicans, Pearce and Wilson, were up for election. Both won, but Wilson beat her opponent by only 875 votes out of nearly 211,000.

Senators Seek Testimony Of Ex-prosecutors (USAT)

By Traci Watson

USA Today, March 1, 2007

The Senate Judiciary Committee plans to compel some of the eight U.S. attorneys who have been ousted to tell their stories publicly under oath after a federal prosecutor claimed he was fired for political reasons, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said. He said some of the prosecutors have privately said they won't testify voluntarily but would honor a congressional subpoena. The panel will vote on subpoenas next week, said Tracy Schmaler, a spokeswoman for Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.

One of the eight, David Iglesias of New Mexico, said he was forced out after refusing a request by two congressmen to rush an indictment that might have helped Republicans in the election in 2006.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the Bush administration has never removed a prosecutor "to retaliate against them or inappropriately interfere with a public integrity investigation." Iglesias was let go "based on performance-related concerns," Roehrkasse said.

House Republicans are challenging Speaker Nancy Pelosi's appointment of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., to the Homeland Security Committee. Republicans cite an FBI report that says agents who raided Jefferson's home found $90,000 in alleged bribe money in his freezer.

House Republican Leader John Boehner said Democrats booted Jefferson off the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, "so it is difficult to comprehend how they can approve" of him being on a committee "with access to America's most sensitive and closely guarded intelligence information."

Brian Kennedy, spokesman for Boehner, quoted federal security clearance guidelines that say "conditions that could raise a security concern and may be disqualifying" include an "allegation or admission of criminal conduct," regardless of whether the person was charged.

New NASA space vehiclewill be delayed for months

NASA chief Michael Griffin said the vehicle to replace the aging space shuttle would be delayed four to six months because of budget problems. Its earliest launch would be in 2015, he told a Senate subcommittee on space. President Bush ordered NASA to retire the shuttle in 2010 and launch a successor ship no later than 2014, creating a four-year span in which the United States would have no means for sending humans into space.

Las Vegas Review-Journal, March 1, 2007

Beyond packing boxes and a pat on the back, it's hard to know what to give a U.S. attorney who's getting the shove from his superiors.

There's the obligatory rubber chicken farewell lunch and a plaque. And the folks around the office can take up a collection for some golf balls or a Target gift certificate. But I'm guessing that nothing would bring a smile to the face of a federal prosecution chief on his last day in office like an indictment on a juicy case-fixing scheme involving doctors and lawyers.

Advertisement

At least, that's the sense I get on this, the final day on the job for U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden.

Not only have witnesses recently been invited to answer questions in front of the grand jury, but the word is the doctor-lawyer investigation has reached a turning point -- coincidentally at the time Bogden can use an appropriate send-off.

In recent weeks, the names of legal/medical consultant Howard Awand and personal injury attorneys Robert Vannah and Robert Eglet have surfaced in the local media as subjects of interest in the FBI inquiry. Sourced speculation has placed a second set of physicians in the government's camp as politically penitent cooperating witnesses.

A well-placed insurance industry source said he expected movement in the case this week.

With multimillion-dollar jury awards and suspicious coziness between the players and some local judges, the case holds a world of intrigue.

But it's by no means the only bell-ringing business to emanate during Bogden's tenure. The public corruption investigation involving former topless bar mogul Michael Galardi, the charges stemming from the deadly Hells Angels-Mongols brawl at the Laughlin River Run, and the Crazy Horse Too investigation are three of the more notorious cases handled by his office.

There have been mixed results and a few embarrassments, but no one can say the U.S. attorney's office under Bogden failed to take a swing at the ball. Even his enemies and critics in the legal community give him that.

For no good reason any credible source can name, Bogden was unceremoniously sacked a few weeks ago in an apparent bit of nervous housecleaning by the Department of Justice.

Beyond a respectable win-loss record in prosecuting some of the biggest federal cases in recent Las Vegas history, Bogden can take solace in the fact that he's not alone. Six other Western U.S. attorneys were also notified that their services were no longer needed.

Because the Department of Justice and the Bush administration have done such a terrible job spinning this case, the terminations have given rise to several theories, all of them unflattering to the suits in Washington.

There's the belief that some of those being ousted weren't willing enough to use the death penalty.

And there's the hypothesis that they were terminated because they failed to carry the anti-illegal immigration banner high enough to suit the administration.

Although San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam's office handled fewer illegal immigration cases than it previously had, it was also her office that scored devastating convictions of corrupt Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham and the San Diego phase of the Galardi political fixing case.

Then there's the one about letting those solid veteran prosecutor/administrators go to bring in a group of well-connected neophytes whose resumes would benefit from a line stating "U.S. Attorney."

It's an intriguing thought, and when Karl Rove intimate Tim Griffin recently replaced H.E. "Bud" Cummins in the Eastern District of Arkansas, Senate Democrats roared charges of political cronyism. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, who said Bogden had done a "remarkably good job," had a field day with the issue.

Those Republican appointees will have to be confirmed by a Senate committee dominated by Democrats. The cronies could end up looking like kamikaze pilots.

As of Monday, federal sources still had heard nothing about a possible replacement for Bogden. Will Attorney General Alberto Gonzales wait until the day Bogden leaves to name his replacement?

Through it all, Bogden has taken the high road, maintained his composure, and commented little on the turn of events.

For now, the real reason behind the decision to let him go remains unclear.

An indictment in the doctors-lawyers case would be the best parting present Bogden could receive.

It's harder to gift-wrap, but it sure beats golf balls.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

U.S. To Charge At Least 1 In Trading Probe (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Federal authorities plan to file criminal and civil charges as early as today against one or more UBS employees for providing traders with advance notice of stock-rating adjustments in exchange for cash payments, according to sources familiar with the case.

The charges mark the latest attempt by the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission to stanch the flow of improper tips to traders, including hedge funds and private equity firms, who seek to collect information that helps them profit in advance of notable corporate announcements.

Representatives for the U.S. Attorney's Office in the Southern District of New York and the SEC declined to comment yesterday on the months-long probe, as did a spokesman for UBS. The possible charges were reported by the online editions of BusinessWeek.

Sources briefed on the case spoke on condition of anonymity because the charges had yet to be publicly filed. The sources said at least one UBS worker had provided multiple traders with tips that UBS analysts had decided to upgrade or depress their ratings on a stock. Access to such information before it is disseminated to the public could allow a favored group of traders to profit at the expense of average investors.

Earlier this year, the SEC's Office of Compliance Inspections and Examinations requested a wide batch of trading data from investment banks and brokerage firms from the third quarter of last year in an effort to determine whether brokers may be passing inside information to hedge funds, which pay steep fees.

Former McGuireWoods Partner Arrested On Fraud Charges (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, March 1, 2007

A former New York law firm partner who allegedly made almost $18 million trading in the securities of his clients has been arrested on fraud charges.

Louis W. Zehil, until Feb. 16 a partner in the New York office of Richmond, Va.'s McGuireWoods, allegedly used his position as issuer's counsel in seven private placement transactions occurring between January 2006 and last month to accumulate millions of discounted shares, absent the sale restrictions such discounts generally entail. He allegedly sold the stocks at a vast profit.

Zehil, 41, now faces up to 20 years in prison and millions in fines on fraud charges brought by the Southern District U.S. Attorney's Office. He is also facing a civil suit brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission, which is seeking disgorgement of his allegedly ill-gotten gains.

The ex-partner was arraigned Wednesday before Southern District of New York Magistrate Judge Henry Pitman but not required to enter a plea. He was released on a $250,000 personal recognizance bond. Andrew M. Lawler, Zehil's lawyer, declined to comment on the case Wednesday.

The case has unfolded swiftly. According to the criminal complaint issued Wednesday, Zehil's actions were first uncovered by a McGuireWoods associate, who reported them to firm management on Feb. 9. The firm then conducted an internal investigation, contacted clients, sought Zehil's resignation and referred the matter to the SEC.

"The actions described in today's filings are totally inconsistent with the high standards of ethics and integrity that are the very foundation of our firm," McGuireWoods chairman Richard Cullen said in a statement Wednesday. He added that Zehil had apparently acted on his own benefit and that the 750-lawyer firm would continue to cooperate with authorities in the matter.

A onetime Navy lieutenant, Zehil joined McGuireWoods' 35-lawyer New York office as a partner in 2004. He had previously been an associate in the New York office of Jones Day. A 1995 Columbia Law School graduate, Zehil also previously worked in New York for Hale and Dorr and White & Case.

Zehil specialized in representing small companies in so-called reverse mergers and PIPE (private investment in public equity) transactions. In the former, small companies go public by merging into publicly traded shell corporations. Reverse mergers are often financed through PIPE transactions in which investors in the new entity are allotted blocks of discounted shares, the sale of which are restricted for a period of time.

Such shares are supposed to bear a restrictive legend. But Zehil, hired as counsel to seven companies participating in PIPE transactions, allegedly sent opinion letters to the companies' stock transfer agents directing them to issue shares without such legends to two investment groups, Strong Branch Ventures IV and Chestnut Capital Partners II.

According to prosecutors, the sole shareholders in these two entities were Zehil and his wife. When confronted by McGuireWoods, Zehil allegedly admitted issuing the opinion letter but denied ownership of either the Strong or Chestnut groups. But prosecutors say Zehil was the only person authorized to trade their securities and that he had personally directed the transfer of millions of dollars for his personal benefit, including the purchase of real estate and jewelry, the services of an interior decorator and a country club membership.

Through Strong and Chestnut, Zehil allegedly purchased large blocs of discounted shares, which he was then free to sell immediately. According to the SEC, the partner netted about $17.8 million from a series of stock sales, the most recent of which took place earlier this month. The SEC claims Zehil still had almost 3 million unsold shares at the time he was caught.

The seven small companies Zehil was representing were Gran Tierra Energy Inc.; Foothills Resources Inc.; MMC Energy Inc.; Alternative Energy Sources Inc.; Ethanex Energy Inc.; GoFish Corp.; and Kreido Biofuels Inc. Most were involved with either energy exploration or the development of renewable energy sources. GoFish operates a video Web site similar to the more well-known YouTube.

McGuireWoods spokesman William Allcott said Wednesday that the firm had discussed the matter at length with all of the companies.

"We have been very gratified by the support of our clients who recognize this was a complete aberration," he said.

Though previously listed on the firm's Web site as a partner in its New York office and only admitted to practice in New York, Zehil was a resident of Ponte Vedra Beach, Fla., who also frequently worked out of McGuireWoods' Jacksonville, Fla., office.

The SEC charges that the Strong and Chestnut investment groups both used Zehil's Florida address.

Enron Broadband Charge Will Be Pursued By Justice Department (HC)

By Kristen Hays, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, March 1, 2007

The Justice Department will seek to preserve through an appeal one of five jury convictions won last year against the former finance chief of Enron's broadband division, according to a court filing.

Prosecutors filed a notice this week saying they will appeal U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore's late January decision to erase Kevin Howard's conviction of falsifying books. That appeal would go before the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which already tossed out convictions in a separate Enron case because of the same issue that prompted Gilmore to wipe Howard's record clean.

Gilmore threw out all five convictions that prosecutors won against Howard in a retrial last year. His first trial alongside four other ex-broadband executives ended in 2005 with a few acquittals and jurors hung on dozens of other counts.

Last year, the government conceded that Howard's four convictions of conspiracy and wire fraud should be erased because they were unlikely to stand up on appeal.

Prosecutors based that concession on an August 2-1 ruling from a 5th Circuit panel that overturned most convictions of four former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives in a 2004 Enron-related trial.

In that ruling, the panel said prosecutors improperly presented jurors with a theory that the executives deprived Enron of their honest services when they helped push through a deal that the government said was a loan disguised as an asset sale.

Prosecutors in Howard's case used the same honest services theory in a case about the sale of future profits in a video-on-demand deal from which Enron booked immediate earnings. But they argued the fifth conviction of falsifying books was unspoiled by using the theory and should stand.

Gilmore tossed out that conviction along with the others because she said an instruction she gave to jurors — at prosecutors' request — tied it to one of the tainted counts.

SEC Details McAfee Plan For Options (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle And Siobhan Hughes

DOJ_NMG_0138511

The former chief executive of McAfee Inc., George Samenuk, knew about a change to a 2002 stock-option grant made in his favor by a subordinate, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission complaint filed yesterday in federal court.

The complaint charged Kent H. Roberts, McAfee's former general counsel, with fraud for his alleged role in options manipulations at the computer-security software vendor. It follows a criminal indictment of Mr. Roberts handed up Tuesday.

The complaint notes that Mr. Samenuk, who wasn't charged by either the grand jury or the SEC and wasn't identified by name in either complaint, participated in email traffic in which the manipulated grant was discussed.

"George Samenuk hasn't been charged, and we don't expect him to be," Elliot Peters, Mr. Samenuk's lawyer, said in a statement.

On Jan. 15, 2002, the compensation committee of McAfee's board approved a grant of 420,000 options to purchase shares at that day's closing price, $27.19, the SEC complaint says. That day, Mr. Roberts sent an email to Mr. Samenuk and another executive confirming the grant and its price, it says.

The next day, the SEC charges, shares of the Santa Clara, Calif., company fell, and Mr. Roberts sent a note to Mr. Samenuk and the second executive: "Let's price the 420,000 option shares at today's closing price of $25.43." That change would have a big effect, increasing Mr. Samenuk's potential profit from the grant by $739,200. (Mr. Samenuk was paid $714,922 in salary in 2001.)

The next week, according to the SEC, Mr. Samenuk wrote back to the two executives: "On January 16 it appears that the stock price finished at $25.43...is this the price that the new options will be set at?? Is that the low for those days after the Board Meeting??"

Mr. Roberts, the SEC said, replied that the figure was "the right price." According to the agency, Mr. Roberts wrote up false board minutes saying that the grant was intended to be made Jan. 16.

Mr. Roberts' lawyer, Stephen Neal, wrote in a statement that he intends to "vigorously defend against the charges against Mr. Roberts," but he didn't comment further.

In his statement, Mr. Samenuk's lawyer, Mr. Peters, said: "The Company's General Counsel determined what was the 'right price.' The paperwork Mr. Samenuk signed relating to this grant (which was not exercised) showed the higher price of $27.19." It isn't clear why the paperwork would show a higher price. The company's securities filings record the lower one.

The McAfee case is one of about 140 being investigated by federal authorities who are probing whether companies retroactively picked favorable stock-option-grant dates to enrich their executives.

Is The S.E.C. Changing Course? (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — In his first year as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, Christopher Cox confounded both supporters and detractors by taking a more moderate and nuanced position than they had predicted on a variety of regulatory issues, based on his record as a conservative Republican lawmaker.

In recent weeks, however, Mr. Cox has begun to send signals, both directly and through aides, that he may be swinging the pendulum more toward business and Wall Street interests and against investor groups.

Some investor advocates and securities law experts say that Mr. Cox, by not pushing for tighter regulation of hedge funds and by urging the Supreme Court to adopt a tougher standard for investors in lawsuits, has begun moving closer to the business view that the administration overreacted to the corporate scandals that began with the collapse of Enron in 2001.

They have also criticized his recent decision to appear at the Chamber of Commerce in two weeks just as it is to issue a report criticizing the Bush administration and the S.E.C. for being too hard on companies.

“You look at a parade of items and it begins to look to me like this commission is starting to take an historic shift away from investor interests,” said James D. Cox, a law professor at Duke University.

The S.E.C. chairman strongly disputes that view, noting, for instance, that his appearance before the chamber should not be perceived as a change in the tilt of the agency.

“The United States government has an agency that services business and it is the Department of Commerce,” he said. “Our role is to be the investors’ advocate. I want to make sure that every company understands that so long as they treat their investors well, the S.E.C. will be friendly to them.

“And if they attempt to drive a wedge between the interests of investors and the interests of management,” Mr. Cox added, “we will be their relentless adversaries.”

It has not been easy to pigeonhole Mr. Cox. As an influential congressman from Orange County in California, he sponsored a measure to loosen accounting standards for stock options granted to senior executives and another making it harder for investors to sue companies.

But soon after he arrived at the commission in the summer of 2005, Mr. Cox advanced investor-friendly rules to make executive pay packages more transparent. He announced that he would continue to support the initiatives of his predecessor, William H. Donaldson, who ran up against a powerful Wall Street constituency with a great deal of clout in the Bush administration when he sought to regulate hedge funds and mutual funds more tightly.

And Mr. Cox initially disappointed some business groups that had urged him to dilute the force of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, the post-Enron legislation that tightened accounting and governance rules, on small companies.

In an hourlong interview this week, Mr. Cox challenged the criticism that he is retrenching from any of that, saying that he has responded to court decisions and budget constraints but that he remains committed to protecting investors.

Moreover, he said that he sharply disagreed with the view, put forward by several business groups in recent months, that tough regulation was making American markets less competitive and driving companies issuing stock to overseas exchanges.

"The inference that some have drawn that this competition is caused by regulation is wrong," Mr. Cox said. "Some have made the case that our strong regulation and enforcement are indeed the cause of the opposite, of our strength. At the Securities and Exchange Commission it is our intent to make those observations true."

But his critics still contend that signs of back-pedaling have begun to emerge.

After the commission suffered a legal setback on tightening hedge fund regulation, Mr. Cox decided to neither appeal the decision nor seek to overturn it. Instead, he abandoned the effort begun by Mr. Donaldson to force all of the firms in the $1 trillion hedge fund industry to be registered and open their books to government examiners. The commission has embarked on a more modest effort to raise the financial qualifications for investing in such funds.

After a second court opinion that questioned the commission's decision to require mutual funds to have independent chairmen, officials said they did not expect the agency to resurrect the proposal.

Earlier this month, the commission filed a brief with the Supreme Court asking the justices to adopt a legal standard that would make it significantly more difficult for investors to sue corporations for fraud.

And it was announced this week that Mr. Cox will be a keynote speaker when the United States Chamber of Commerce holds a daylong conference to issue a long-awaited report recommending that the government relax its criminal pursuit of corporations, limit the civil liability of accounting firms, and water down the corporate and accounting rules that were written in response to the collapse of Enron and other scandals.

Senior Democratic and Republican lawmakers will be at the event, but for the commission, it will represent an awkward appearance.

Over the last five years, the chamber has been a powerful nemesis of the agency, viewing it as a major impediment to its antiregulatory agenda, repeatedly suing the S.E.C. over its rules and heavily lobbying Congress to overturn them.

But to some investor groups and corporate law experts, Mr. Cox's appearance is reflective of a broader political dynamic at the commission, created 73 years ago in the depths of the Depression to police the nation's stock markets, protect investors and keep corporate America honest.

"His presence before the chamber is appalling, and you are beginning to see a real shift into a new high gear," said Barbara Roper, director of investor protection at the Consumer Federation of America.

Lately, Ms. Roper said, the tide has begun to turn as the Bush administration enters its final years in office and business groups have complained that the administration had overreacted to a series of corporate scandals that have now faded from the headlines.

It is possible "that we simply misread him," Ms. Roper added, but "as you know, there has been enormous pressure from the business community for some kind of life as they know it pre-Enron and the way it is supposed to look in a Republican administration."

Mr. Cox promised an active pro-investor agenda for the coming year. He said it would include a rewriting of one set of regulations to make fees of 401(k) programs more transparent. In response to local financing scandals, most recently in San Diego, he also plans to begin rewriting the disclosure and accounting rules governing the way cities raise money through bond offerings.

He seemed uncomfortable when asked about his decision to appear before the Chamber of Commerce as it prepared to lobby for less regulation, although he noted that the conference would include the participation of a number of other senior S.E.C. officials, along with Democratic and Republican lawmakers.

He also said that his appearance should not be seen as an endorsement of the chamber's broadly deregulatory set of recommendations, which he said he had not seen.

Mr. Cox, 54, was appointed by President Bush in June 2005 to replace Mr. Donaldson, who abruptly resigned after alienating powerful Wall Street and business interests by embracing some investor causes. Mr. Donaldson sought unsuccessfully to overhaul the way mutual funds are governed, force greater disclosure of hedge fund operations and give institutional shareholders more of a say in the election of directors.

Signaling the prospect of some significantly divisive votes in the coming months, Mr. Cox said that he was not driven to seek consensus or unanimity among the commission's polarized members. Asked about the observations by some that he is driven by consensus, he replied: "That has been oft repeated, but it's not my approach."

He said that after listening to one another, "there is no requirement that we all have to agree," suggesting that he was girding for some policy differences to become public.

Indeed, that seems almost inevitable if the agency is to advance a new agenda.

The agency's longest-serving member, Paul S. Atkins, is a libertarian who has been critical of some rules and has fought both in public and behind the scenes with the agency's two Democrats, Annette L. Nazareth and Roel C. Campos. The fifth commissioner, Kathleen L. Casey, recently joined the agency. Even though she has little record, officials say she has emerged as an important ally of Mr. Atkins.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Jury Withdraws Question As Deliberations Continue (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The first question from jurors at the perjury trial of ex-White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby prompted a lot of head-scratching Wednesday but shed little light on their progress.

The jury, now down to seven women and four men, stumbled briefly over legal language in one of the five counts against the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney but resolved the issue quickly and continued deliberating. They went home Wednesday evening without a verdict.

The jurors had sent a note to the judge seeking clarification late Tuesday at the end of their fifth day of deliberations.

U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton and nearly a score of defense lawyers and prosecutors spent part of Tuesday evening in their offices and a portion of Wednesday morning in court puzzling over what the jurors were asking and how to respond. Judge Walton remained uncertain, so he sent the jurors a note late Wednesday morning asking them to clarify their question.

By that time, the jurors had resolved their difficulty on their own and moved on. "After further discussion, we are clear on what we need to do," the jury wrote back. "No further clarification needed. Thank you. We apologize."

This episode set off a welter of speculation among lawyers and reporters over what it might reveal about the jurors' deliberations since they got the case at midday last Wednesday.

Only one thing could be said for certain: They had not told the court they were deadlocked.

Mr. Libby is accused of obstruction of justice and of lying to the FBI and a grand jury in 2003 about how he learned the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame and what he said to reporters about the woman, who is married to prominent Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson.

The jurors asked about the third of five counts, leading some observers to speculate they might be halfway through their work. Others, however, suggested the jurors might have reviewed testimony and exhibits before considering specific charges, and then begun with the third count because it is the least complex.

Jurors asked about the charge that Mr. Libby lied to the FBI about his conversation with Time magazine's Matthew Cooper. Mr. Cooper testified that Mr. Libby confirmed for him that Ms. Plame worked for the CIA. Mr. Libby told the FBI he had only told Mr. Cooper he'd heard that from reporters but didn't know if it was true.

Most observers thought the jurors wanted to know if they were to decide whether Mr. Libby's or Mr. Cooper's account of the conversation was correct or whether what Mr. Libby claimed to have told Mr. Cooper was true.

Some, noting that the defense questioned the accuracy of FBI note-taking, thought the jurors wanted to know if they were to decide whether Mr. Libby even gave the FBI that account of the conversation.

Mr. Libby faces up to 30 years in prison if convicted, though he would be likely to get far less time under federal sentencing guidelines.

Libby Jury Asks, Then Figures It Out (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0138514

By Richard Willing
USA Today, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Jurors in the perjury and obstruction trial of Lewis "Scooter" Libby got back to work late Wednesday morning, after resolving a question about the wording of one of the five charges against the former vice presidential aide.

As court adjourned Tuesday, jurors had passed U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton a note asking for "clarification" of count three of the Libby indictment.

That count charges that Libby lied to FBI investigators about his conversation with Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper. Cooper testified that Libby told him that Valerie Plame, who is married to Iraq war critic Joseph Wilson, worked for the CIA. Libby said he only told Cooper he'd heard that but didn't know if it was true.

In their note, jurors asked whether the lying charge referred to the "content" of Libby's statement or the fact that the statement was made.

On Wednesday morning, Walton asked jurors to "clarify" their question.

Instead, jurors sent back a note indicating that they had resolved their confusion and that "no further clarification (was) needed."

The notes were the first communication from jurors since they asked for Post-It notes, an easel, masking tape and pictures of witnesses last Wednesday and early last Thursday, shortly after deliberations began.

The notes offered few clues as to how deliberations were proceeding, other than confirming that jurors had not reached a decision on at least one count.

Jurors may have already decided counts one and two, though there is no guarantee that they took up the charges in numerical order.

Through mid-afternoon Wednesday, jurors had deliberated more than 33 hours since getting the case Feb. 21. The jury is now down to seven women and four men after one juror was dismissed Monday.

Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Cheney, is charged with lying about conversations he had with Cooper and NBC reporter Tim Russert about the CIA affiliation of Plame.

Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald argued that Libby's wife's name was leaked as part of an attempt to undercut former ambassador Wilson, who accused the Bush administration of "twisting" pre-war intelligence about Iraq's nuclear program after making a CIA-sponsored trip to Africa.

Libby's defense team, led by attorney Theodore Wells, has countered that there was no leak campaign and that Libby is guilty at worst of a faulty memory.

Libby Jury Hits Short-Term Snag On Sixth Day (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig
The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

A week into deliberations in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, jurors yesterday provided the first glimpse of the issues they are weighing by signaling confusion over how to interpret one of the five felony counts against the vice president's former top aide.

According to that charge, Libby lied to the FBI about a conversation with a Time magazine reporter.

The jury's confusion, relayed in a note to the presiding judge and released by the court yesterday, proved short-lived. When U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton asked them to clarify their question, the jury members swiftly sent him an apologetic second note, saying they had talked further and "now are clear on what we had to do."

The jury completed its sixth day of deliberation without reaching a verdict.

Libby, 56, is charged with lying to the FBI and a grand jury during a federal investigation into the Bush administration's 2003 leak of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity, and of trying to obstruct the probe. Prosecutors allege that Libby lied about how he learned about Plame and whom he told about her.

Plame is the wife of former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, who was sent by the CIA in 2002 to determine whether Iraq was seeking nuclear material in Niger. He found the claims groundless and later accused the Bush administration of twisting his conclusions to justify the war in Iraq. Prosecutors say administration officials disclosed Plame's identity to discredit Wilson by insinuating he was sent on the mission because of nepotism.

Libby's attorneys say their client has a bad memory and inaccurately remembered conversations he had about the couple with colleagues and journalists. Libby is not charged with the leak itself.

The jury's temporary confusion revolved around a false-statement charge that outside legal experts have described as potentially the most difficult of the five counts to prove. It stems from Libby's account to FBI agents of his July 12, 2003, telephone conversation with Matthew Cooper, then a White House reporter for Time magazine.

The outside prosecutors and defense lawyers said there are fewer conflicts between Libby's and Cooper's versions of events than there are in the facts of a second false-statements charge, which arises from a conversation Libby had with NBC News's Washington bureau chief, Tim Russert. They also said defense attorneys had raised doubts during the trial about the FBI's precision and the accuracy of Cooper's note-taking.

FBI agents say Libby told them that in his conversation with Cooper he merely relayed scuttlebutt from other reporters that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA, adding that he did not know whether that was true. Cooper testified he had asked Libby whether Wilson's wife worked at the CIA and that Libby responded to the effect of "I've heard that, too," without mentioning other reporters or his uncertainty about the truth.

In a three-sentence note sent to the judge late Tuesday afternoon, the jury asked: "Is the charge that the statement was made or is it about the content of the statement itself?"

Yesterday morning, Walton told lawyers for both sides that he was not certain he understood what the jury was asking. The lead defense attorney, Theodore Wells Jr., told the judge the parties believed they understood it.

Deliberations Continue In Libby Case (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

A question sent to the judge by the jury that is deciding the perjury case of I. Lewis Libby Jr. created a stir but did not provide any clarity about the status of the deliberations. The message was received late Tuesday, after the jury had deliberated for more than four days, and was confusing enough for Judge Reggie B. Walton to respond Wednesday morning that he did not fully understand the question. When he asked for clarification, the jurors sent back a second message: Never mind. “We are clear on what we need to do,” the second message read. “No further clarification needed. We apologize.” After the exchange, the jurors continued discussing the case through the day, departing without a verdict.

'Sex Tourists' Warned: Law Is Watching (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, USA TODAY

U.S. travelers who book trips to countries that are hot spots for child prostitution will begin this month to see ads, brochures and billboards warning that sexual adventures abroad could land them in prison here.

The warnings, written and distributed by religious organizations, child-welfare groups and the federal government, are a sign of a new assault by the Bush administration on the international child sex trade. They also reflect a new law intended to catch U.S. residents who engage in or promote sex with children overseas.

"People assume they can go out of the country and get away with exploiting children in this horrific way," says Mike Garcia, assistant secretary of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement. "We're sending a message. We have the power to (arrest them), and we have the will."

In the past six months, U.S. authorities have arrested two men from Washington state who are accused of having sex in Cambodia with underage boys, and an 85-year-old Los Angeles man is accused of trying to fly to the Philippines for sex with two preteen girls.

Another man, Richard Schmidt, 61, of Baltimore, arrives in the USA today to face charges that he traveled to Cambodia and the Philippines for sex with children. An indictment unsealed Wednesday charges him with molesting eight boys. Schmidt, a former teacher, has been convicted three times of molesting children in the USA. He was released from prison in July 2000. Schmidt fled to the Philippines in June 2002 after Maryland authorities issued an arrest warrant for parole violations, U.S. Department of Justice officials said Wednesday.

Investigators from Immigration and Customs Enforcement have more than 20 other cases underway, including 11 American men who were arrested by Mexican authorities and are awaiting extradition.

Effects of new law

The arrests were made under a child-protection law President Bush signed April 30. It includes a provision that U.S. law enforcement officials say gives them a new tool to prosecute hard-core pedophiles and "sex tourists" who want to engage in sex with children.

Although it had been illegal since 1986 to go abroad with the intent to have sex with someone under 18, prosecutors say the crime was difficult to prove in court. To get a conviction under the new law, prosecutors do not have to prove that U.S. residents left the country specifically to have illegal sex — only that they had illegal sex or tried to do so.

The law doubles the penalties to a mandatory 30 years in prison for each offense. Authorities can use it to arrest owners of travel websites and travel agencies that promote sex tours or arrange for clients to have sex with children.

The law was a result of pressure on Bush and Congress from conservative religious groups to be more aggressive in fighting the sexual exploitation of children worldwide.

The administration has joined with religious groups to promote the crackdown. And it is getting help from groups with missions in countries where the sex trade is rampant.

Child-advocacy groups estimate that 2 million children worldwide are working in the sex trade. The Internet is rife with tour companies that pitch travel for legal prostitution and make veiled references to sex with children. There are chat rooms in which participants discuss the best locations to find the prettiest girls, the cleanest rooms and the cheapest prices. And the Web allows people to make arrangements to travel to countries, such as Cambodia, Thailand, Costa Rica, Mexico and the Philippines, where child sex is plentiful and law enforcement has been lax.

One destination is Svay Pak, a small town about 7 miles outside the Cambodian capital of Phnom Penh. There, about 30 ramshackle brothels line the streets.

"I got 5 feet down the dirt road and I was approached by a young boy asking if I want young girls. He said, 'I can get you 9, 10 years old,' " Mettimano says. For an hour, he observed men going in and out of the brothels. "You hear very distinct Australian, American and European accents."

World Vision is one of several organizations working with the U.S. government to devise pop-up ads on travel websites, posters and pamphlets in airports, and billboards in destination countries that warn of the new penalties. World Vision has received a $500,000 State Department grant for its part of the project.

Because hard-core pedophiles may not be deterred by the ads, they serve more as a warning to "sex tourists." These are the "businessmen and holiday travelers who see the sex trade happening all around them and decide to experiment," Mettimano says.

"Some of these men actually believe that when they go abroad it is acceptable and that they are helping poor people support their families," says Carol Smolenski, executive director of End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and Trafficking of Children for Sexual Purposes USA. "If you are really concerned about them, then just give them money and don't ask for sex."

Joint enforcement efforts

Travelers who fail to heed the warnings could get nabbed overseas in a joint enforcement effort involving missionaries, social workers, local police and the federal government. Employees and members of charity and religious groups overseas watch for Americans who engage in sex with children. They will turn over names, photos and other evidence to local police, who can arrest offenders and turn them over for prosecution in the USA.

When Cambodian authorities arrested Gary Jackson, 56, of Bainbridge Island, Wash., in September and accused him of having sex with three boys under 16, the charges were based on evidence collected by a social-service organization in Cambodia.

Jackson's defense attorney did not return phone calls. Jackson, who was convicted of a sex offense in Washington in 1981 and sentenced to 10 years in prison, is being held in jail until trial in March.

Records Sought From Corzine (PHI)

By Elisa Ung, Jennifer Moroz

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 1, 2007

TRENTON - The U.S. attorney yesterday subpoenaed records from Gov. Corzine's office, part of a widening investigation into whether lawmakers personally profited by steering money to certain causes.

The subpoenas delivered to the offices of the governor and his chief counsel demand all documents regarding grants that legislators have put in state budgets since 2004.

An attached letter from U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie requests, in particular, e-mail relating to "grants and assistance, popularly known as 'Christmas Tree items.' "

That phrase refers to last-minute grants secured as officials finalize the state budget each year. Also commonly called "pork," they are a tradition for the ruling party in Trenton, and have gone to such pet projects as a flagpole, park improvements, and community center expansions.

Last month, the U.S. Attorney's Office subpoenaed six Assembly and Senate leaders and Democratic and Republican legislative offices for similar information.

Corzine spokesman Anthony Coley said that the administration would cooperate fully and that the governor had asked Attorney General Stuart Rabner, who previously headed the U.S. attorney's criminal division, to oversee compliance along with the chief counsel's office. The information is due at a grand jury hearing on March 8.

The investigation into the closed-door, late-night budget process grew out of a federal criminal probe of State Sen. Wayne Bryant (D., Camden).

The U.S. Attorney's Office is investigating whether Bryant was paid a part-time salary at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey to do nothing other than use his chairmanship of the Budget and Appropriations Committee to steer money to the school. Bryant is no longer chairman.

Though the Legislature decides which grants get added, the governor must approve them when he signs the final state budget. Last year, Corzine cut $52 million from the last-minute additions before signing it.

The information demanded yesterday would also include the administrations of former Govs. Jim McGreevey and Richard J. Codey, who still serves as president of the state Senate. McGreevey did not return a request for comment.

Yesterday, Codey (D., Essex) said much of the paperwork would have already been collected from a subpoena to the Treasury Department last fall. Otherwise, there's not much of a paper trail, he said. "I think we all know that these items are added verbally," Codey said.

Codey is leading an effort to make the grant process more transparent, including a requirement that legislators put their funding requests in writing, names attached, for public review. "I've said before that 95 percent of them go for great causes," he said of the grants. "The other 5 percent can be debated."

While the investigation into Bryant has not yet concluded, Codey said: "I have no knowledge of anybody else who would have traded off putting something in the budget for monetary gain."

Codey said he believed Corzine would fully comply. "I'm sure it wasn't aimed at him," Codey said.

Edwin Stier, a former federal prosecutor and former head of the New Jersey Division of Criminal Justice, said it wasn't unusual for prosecutors to ask for a wide range of information to determine whether a pattern existed. If prosecutors were investigating a zoning board member for bribery, for example, they might ask for other documents to review the conduct of other zoning board members, too.

But while "there have been investigations of high-level officials in both the legislative and executive branches over the years," he said, "I don't recall any situations ever having occurred... where such broad subpoenas are being served on the legislature and now on the governor's office."

Rider University political science professor David Rebovich called the subpoena flurry "a public-relations disaster."

"This ethics investigation could certainly hurt the party in power," Rebovich said, though he added that it would give Corzine "a stick to swing at lawmakers to get through his ethics reform."

Both parties have participated in the process of stuffing last-minute grants into budgets. But Republicans have been quick to note that Democrats ruled the Legislature during the years now under investigation.

"This is the first time I can remember that both the Legislature and the governor's office has the FBI and the U.S. attorney looking into it," said Assembly Minority Leader Alex DeCroce (R., Morris), a legislator since 1989. "So, obviously, something's wrong with the way they [the Democrats] are operating the system."

Subpoenas Delivered To Corzine's Office Seek Budget Documents (NSL)

By Jeff Whelan

Newark Star-Ledger, March 1, 2007

Federal investigators delivered a subpoena to Gov. Jon Corzine's office this afternoon, demanding budget documents in the latest development of a widening corruption probe into millions of dollars in special interest grants.

In an effort to determine what the governor's office knew about the grants, federal prosecutors are seeking budget records, e-mails and other documents for the budget years 2004, 2005 and 2006.

That period spans the administrations of governors James E. McGreevey, Richard Codey, and Corzine, who are all Democrats. While the grants are initiated by lawmakers in a secretive process, the governor must approve them or use his line-item veto to strike them from the budget or reduce them.

Today's move came less than two weeks after U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie served similar subpoenas on both the Democratic and Republican leadership in both the Senate and the Assembly, seeking information on how millions in public funds were handed out over the past three years.

At issue is more than $1.2 billion in secretive, last-minute budget additions that the Legislature has tacked on to the budget over the past five years. The grants - typically earmarked for pet projects in legislators' home districts - have long been known in Trenton as "Christmas tree items," and have been utilized by lawmakers from both parties for things like road construction, ball fields, school or non-profit programs.

The money has usually been disproportionately distributed in the districts of whatever party controls the Statehouse, records have shown. Sources with direct knowledge of the probe have said that prosecutors are exploring whether any lawmakers sought to steer money to organizations that would have directly benefited them or their families.

Treasury Department records related to the Christmas tree grants have already been subpoenaed by the U.S. Attorney, indicating a growing interest in the matter by prosecutors as far back as November.

AP, February 28, 2007

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) -- Gov. Jon S. Corzine's office was subpoenaed Wednesday by the U.S. Attorney's Office, a spokesman confirmed.

"We have received them," Corzine spokesman Anthony Coley said.

It's the latest round of subpoenas from federal investigators looking into how the state budget has been developed since 2004.

On Feb. 16, the U.S. attorney subpoenaed documents from legislative leaders and their staff offices on grants that have been placed in the budget without public review just before the budget is adopted.

The grants stem from lawmakers, but the governor approves them when signing the budget legislation.

The U.S. Attorney's Office subpoenaed documents from the state Treasury Department and Senate Democrats last year, along with various public agencies where Sen. Wayne Bryant, the former Senate budget chairman, has worked.

FBI Serves Subpoenas To State Lawmakers (NEWHOUSE)

Newhouse News Service, March 1, 2007

State Sen. Majority Leader Bernard Kenny, D-Hoboken, was among a number of state lawmakers hit with federal subpoenas Feb. 16, authorities said.

The volley of subpoenas, served on both Democratic and Republican leaders in the Senate and Assembly, were reportedly part of a rapidly expanding corruption investigation into the Statehouse by U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie.

It was the latest development in a federal probe that began last April with an investigation into state Sen. Wayne Bryant, D-Camden. The matter has now expanded into an inquiry into how lawmakers divvy up public funds.

Lawmakers and other Statehouse veterans could not recall a federal probe ever going as deeply into the state's budget process.

In addition to Kenny, subpoenas were delivered to Senate President Richard Codey, D-West Orange; Senate Minority Leader Leonard Lance, R-Flemington; and Assembly Speaker Joseph Roberts, D-Camden, among others.

Sources with direct knowledge of the probe have said that prosecutors are exploring whether some lawmakers have sought, through the state budget process, to steer money to nonprofit organizations that would have directly benefited them or their families.

Codey said lawmakers would provide the information being sought.

"We will comply 100 percent, in every way, shape and form," he said.

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn. (AP) -- A federal judge in Chattanooga has delayed state Sen. Jerry Cooper's fraud trial two months, agreeing to give the Morrison Democrat until June 4 to recover from a wreck that got him charged with driving under the influence.

Before Cooper's February 7th single-vehicle accident, U.S. District Judge Curtis L. Collier had refused Cooper's request to delay the March 5 trial until after the legislative session ends in May.

Cooper was seriously injured when his sport utility vehicle overturned several times on Interstate 24 in Rutherford County after he attended three legislative receptions in Nashville.

Cooper is recovering at home and District Attorney William Whitesell has withheld results of the DUI test while allowing the senator to surrender on the charge when he feels well enough.

In the pending federal case, the senator has pleaded not guilty to charges of bank fraud, mail fraud and conspiracy to commit bank and mail fraud. The charges involve a land deal.

The Chattanoogan, March 1, 2007

The fraud trial of Sen. Jerry Cooper has been delayed until June 4 due to the single-vehicle crash he was involved in on Feb. 7.

The accident left Cooper with a cerebral concussion, multiple fractured ribs and other serious injuries, making it impossible for the politician to assist in preparing for a federal fraud trial that had been scheduled to begin on March 5, prosecution and defense attorneys in the case had agreed.

He declined a prosecution motion for a hearing to determine if Sen. Cooper was healing quicker than expected.

Cooper, who federal authorities say used his political influence to get a fraudulent appraisal on a lumber mill that he was selling to an Alabama couple, is charged with bank fraud, mail fraud, and conspiracy to commit bank and mail fraud.

Cooper also faces DUI and speeding charges in connection with the wreck.

THP Chief Says Sen. Cooper Hasn't Been Given Favoritism (AP)

By Bill Poovey

AP, February 28, 2007

CHATTANOOGA - When state Sen. Jerry Cooper overturned his sport utility vehicle after attending three legislative receptions, the Tennessee highway patrol commander rushed to the wreck behind working patrol officers and emergency responders.

A Department of Safety spokesman initially said preliminary reports showed no alcohol in the Morrison Democrat's vehicle, but at least one witness who stopped on Interstate 24 the evening of Feb. 7 said there was an empty Jack Daniel's bottle nearby.

The Tennessee Bureau of Investigation rushed Cooper's blood-alcohol test and gave the results to the Department of Safety.

Cooper was charged with driving under the influence and speeding.

But three weeks after the wreck, the results of the test still haven't been released to the public. The department also has refused to say how fast Cooper was driving.

At the time of the accident, Cooper was free on a federal bond, a court-ordered agreement requiring him to obey all state laws pending a bank fraud and mail fraud trial. Cooper's injuries have prompted a federal judge in Chattanooga to delay the trial two months, to June 4. The delay order Tuesday did not mention the DUI charge or the bond.

The handling of Cooper's single-vehicle wreck and subsequent DUI charge has raised questions about whether the lawmaker got special treatment because of political favoritism.

Col. Mike Walker - commander of the Tennessee Highway Patrol, still trying to shake off a political favoritism scandal - said this week that Cooper has received no preferential treatment from him or the Highway Patrol.

Walker said he lives close to the wreck site in Rutherford County and went to assist, partly because Cooper was saying in the moments after the accident that his wife was with him.

"People can question a lot of things about me but not my professionalism or my integrity," said Walker, who was promoted to commander last year after an overhaul of the troopers' top brass. "I did not get into the investigation."

Tennessee Department of Safety Commissioner David Mitchell said there were "absolutely not" any favors by the Highway Patrol.

After two weeks of recovering at home, Cooper was back in a hospital Tuesday, scheduled for surgery that will likely keep him there for a week.

Imam Gets 8 Years On Weapons Charges (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 1, 2007

A West Philadelphia imam who argued that he was entrapped by federal agents investigating unfounded terrorism suspicions was sentenced yesterday to eight years and four months in prison on weapons charges.

Wayne Hogue, who is also known as Imam Wadir and Shaheed Bay, was secretly recorded selling 11 guns, including three assault rifles, to an FBI informant working for the Joint Terrorism Task Force.

In early 2002, terrorism task-force agents had asked the informant, Hezekiah Salone, to keep "his ears and eyes open" for trouble at Hogue's mosque, at 52d and Chestnut Streets in West Philadelphia, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Zaleski.

Salone did not find evidence of terrorism or drug-dealing.

U.S. District Judge Timothy Savage, who has privately reviewed secret FBI files in the case, said yesterday that the mosque was not suspected of any wrongdoing.

However, after spending more than a year developing Hogue's confidence, the informant was able to record 11 gun sales in a 10-month period. Zaleski said Hogue initiated the purchases.

Hogue's lawyer, Paul J. Hetznecker, said that the informant was the one who initiated them.

At trial, public defenders Dina Chavar and Catherine Henry portrayed the informant, who called himself Rocky, as an untrustworthy opportunist who was paid $46,000 by the FBI and targeted Hogue to keep himself in the agents' good graces.

Hogue, a street vendor who is well known for running a neighborhood chess game, yesterday told the judge that he had tried to help Salone because he believed he was a wayward drug dealer.

"But as I was trying to pull him out, he was pulling me in," Hogue said.

"If it wasn't for the bionic rat," he said, referring to Salone, "I wouldn't be here... . These people hoodwinked and bamboozled me... . The money was good... . He was good. I was sucked in."

Savage replied: "You knew better. Someone could have been seriously hurt or killed... . You not only betrayed your family, you betrayed your faith... . You betrayed your ideals."

Two More Plead Guilty In Reputed Mob Trash-hauling Scheme (WESTJN)

By Timothy O'Connor

Westchester Journal News, March 1, 2007

Two former managers at a Mount Kisco trash transfer station have pleaded guilty to their part in a reputed mob-backed racketeering effort to control the garbage-hauling industry in southern Connecticut and parts of the Lower Hudson Valley.

Scott McGowan, 37, of 2 Morningside Ave., Yonkers, and Jeremy Everett, 31, of Shelton, Conn., pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in New Haven, Conn., to conspiring to commit racketeering. The crime carries a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison. But federal sentencing guidelines will likely call for a much lesser sentence.

Twenty-nine people were indicted in June by a federal grand jury in New Haven in what federal prosecutors said was a scheme by some trash haulers to carve up territory, inflate prices, and not compete against each other for contracts. The alleged conspiracy was backed by mob muscle, federal authorities said, as a means to persuade haulers to play by the scheme's rules.

The pleas by McGowan and Everett bring to 13 the number of people who have been convicted in connection with the plot.

In December, Matthew "Matty the Horse" Ianniello, 86, of Long Island, the reputed former head of the Genovese Crime Family, pleaded guilty to taking part in the scheme. Authorities charged that Ianniello received a quarterly "mob tax" of $30,000 from the conspiracy's participants. James Galante, a trash magnate from Danbury, Conn., and his reputed silent partner, Thomas Milo of Mamaroneck, were accused of being leaders of the plot. Milo's daughter, Anna Priskie, 45, of Cortlandt, was sentenced two weeks ago to six months' house arrest and probation after admitting she had a no-show job at Galante's companies in Danbury.

McGowan was Allied Waste's manager of the Westchester County Transfer Station in Mount Kisco. Everett was the sales manager. In one secretly recorded telephone conversation, the two men were heard agreeing to ban another hauler from using the transfer station to help another co-conspirator punish the hauler for not participating in the "property rights" scheme.

Everett is expected to be sentenced May 16. McGowan will be sentenced May 17. Neither man could be reached for comment.

'Old Man' Pleads Guilty To Racketeering (MIH)

By Nikki Waller

Miami Herald, March 1, 2007

Reputed mobster Albert Facchiano, 96, will likely get house arrest for charges that, if not for his age, could have meant 20 years in prison.

Albert Facchiano, a 96-year-old Miami man believed to be the oldest person ever indicted by federal authorities, pleaded guilty Wednesday to charges of racketeering, loan sharking and intimidating a witness who was poised to testify against the Genovese crime family.

Facchiano appeared in federal court in Fort Lauderdale and used headphones to hear the judge and his attorneys.

Because of back troubles, he sat, instead of standing, to enter his guilty plea.

He could face up to 20 years for federal conspiracy and racketeering charges filed in Florida, and up to 10 more for federal charges of witness tampering filed in New York.

Facchiano, who turns 97 this month, sees a doctor four times a week and "couldn't have withstood two trials," said his lawyer, Brian McComb.

Prosecutors said Facchiano, nicknamed "The Old Man," supervised associates who committed crimes including extortion, robberies, money laundering and bank fraud.

Federal prosecutors in both states, along with the U.S. Department of Justice, have recommended that Facchiano be sentenced to house arrest.

McComb, said he believes U.S. District Judge James Cohn will go along with those recommendations at sentencing in May.

"The judge is cognizant of his medical condition and his age," McComb said.

With Witnesses At Risk, Murder Suspects Go Free (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

NEWARK, Feb. 27 — When Yusef Johnson, a 15-year-old honors student, was killed outside an apartment complex here so gang-infested it is known as Crazyville, a witness came forward within days and told the police she knew the man she had seen fire the fatal shots.

In another case three months later, in November 2005, officers found two people who identified a street gang leader as the man they saw kill a marijuana dealer named Valterez Coley during a dispute over a woman.

And when Isaiah Stewart, a 17-year-old wearing an electronic monitoring bracelet from a recent brush with the law, was gunned down that December, another Newark teenager sketched a diagram of the crime scene, correctly identified the murder weapon and named a former classmate as the person he had watched commit the crime.

They seem like slam-dunk cases, but none of the three suspects have been arrested. It is not that detectives are unsure of their identity or cannot find them. Rather, it is because so many recent cases here have been scuttled when witnesses were scared silent that the Essex County prosecutor has established an unwritten rule discouraging pursuit of cases that rely on a single witness, and those in which witness statements are not extensively corroborated by forensic evidence.

The 3 are among at least 14 recent murders in Newark in which witnesses have clearly identified the killers but no charges have been filed, infuriating local police commanders and victims' relatives.

In 8 of the 14 cases, according to court documents and police reports, there was more than one witness; in two of them, off-duty police officers were among those identifying the suspects. But in a DNA era, these are cases with little or no physical evidence, and they often involve witnesses whose credibility could be compromised by criminal history or drug problems, or both.

"No one wants to solve these cases and lock up the killers in these cases more than we do," the county prosecutor, Paula T. Dow, said in a recent interview. "But we have to weigh the evidence and move forward only if we believe that the witnesses are credible and that they'll be there to testify at trial."

The tension between the police and prosecutors here over the evolving standards of evidence required to authorize arrest warrants is a stark example of the profound effect witness intimidation is having on the criminal justice system in New Jersey and across the country.

Surveys conducted by the National Youth Gang Center, which is financed by the federal Department of Justice, have found that 88 percent of urban prosecutors describe witness intimidation as a serious problem.

In both Baltimore and Boston, where "stop snitching" campaigns by rap artists and gang leaders have urged city residents not to cooperate with the authorities, prosecutors estimate that witnesses face some sort of intimidation in 80 percent of all homicide cases.

In Essex County, prosecutors report that witnesses in two-thirds of their homicides receive overt threats not to testify, with defendants and their supporters sometimes canvassing witnesses' neighborhoods wearing T-shirts printed with the witnesses' photographs or distributing copies of their statements to the police.

Dozens of New Jersey murder cases have been undone over the past five years after witnesses were killed, disappeared before trial or changed their stories.

In 2004, the Newark police determined that four people found dead in a vacant lot had been killed to silence a witness to a murder; a witness to that quadruple homicide was later shot to death as well.

Ms. Dow, who was appointed in 2003 amid criticism of county prosecutors' ability to close cases, said she was simply adapting to the evolving code on the streets, where gang violence and widespread distrust of law enforcement have deprived prosecutors of one of the legal system's most crucial components: dependable witnesses.

The state's attorney in Baltimore, where witness intimidation is a notorious problem, has taken an even more rigid stand, refusing to file charges in any single-witness case without extensive forensic corroboration.

But that approach differs sharply from those of prosecutors in many other urban areas, like Brooklyn, where the district attorney, Charles J. Hynes, has in recent years taken to reviewing all single-witness cases personally.

In Newark, where the homicide rate has risen in the past few years, the police, local politicians and victims' relatives are all questioning why prosecutors are holding detectives to a higher standard than the law requires — and letting dangerous criminals remain on the streets.

"How can they leave him out there?" asked Yusef's mother, Tosha Braswell, referring to the man who shot him. "Are they waiting for him to kill someone else's son?"

Tension Between Officials

Newark's mayor, Cory A. Booker, who was elected last year on a promise to reduce crime in the city, recently met with Ms. Dow to ask her to be more aggressive in filing charges. In recent years Newark police officials have accused the prosecutor of being reluctant to take on cases that could be difficult to win because her office was criticized after losing a succession of high-profile trials.

The police director, Garry F. McCarthy, worries that the prosecutor's approach undermines his crime-fighting strategy of focusing on the small group of criminals responsible for a disproportionate amount of crime.

"The law states the standard for arrest is probable cause, which is different than what is required for conviction beyond a reasonable doubt," Mr. McCarthy said. "Our goal is to arrest quickly to avoid the potential for additional crime. An arrest does not prevent an ongoing investigation from proceeding."

Ms. Dow declined to discuss details of any open cases. But she said that she was proud of her office's performance, and that she hoped her rigorous standards for filing charges would lead investigators to work harder at getting corroboration.

"It's easy for the police to point fingers when they haven't done enough detective work to get a conviction," she said.

In Essex County, the conviction rate for homicides, which includes plea agreements, was 79 percent in 2006, up from 74 percent when Ms. Dow took over three years earlier (but down from 86 percent in 2005 and 83 percent in 2004).

In Baltimore, prosecutors under Patricia C. Jessamy, the state's attorney, obtained convictions in 65 percent of homicide cases last year, up from 59 percent in 2005 and 52 percent in 2004.

While prosecutors are often measured by such conviction rates, it is difficult to tell through statistics whether they are shying from hard-to-win cases.

What most irks the police is the failure to even file charges in cases in which witnesses have solidly identified a suspect, like the 14 here in Newark over the past three years in which Ms. Dow has declined to authorize arrest warrants. Six of these cases rely on a single witness, including the slayings of Yusef Johnson and Valterez Coley.

Yusef was a football star with a 3.7 grade-point average before he was killed in August 2005. According to police reports, a woman told detectives she had seen the shooting from 30 feet away and was well acquainted with the gunman, a member of the Crips street gang, because he frequently sold cocaine to her.

The case helps illustrate why prosecutors may shy away from single-witness cases: Given the suspect's status as both a gang member and the witness's drug supplier, even detectives have their doubts about whether the woman would ultimately testify at trial — or be believed.

On the night Mr. Coley was gunned down near a porch in Newark's Central Ward, two men told the police they had seen the gunman, whom they identified as a leader of the 252 Bloods street gang. The witnesses said the gunman was looking to settle a score with a young man who had a relationship with his girlfriend, and mistook Mr. Coley for his rival.

But one of the men soon fled the state, leaving the police with a lone witness — and thus no charges have been brought.

Danger in Cooperation

Gregory DeMattia, chief of the Essex County prosecutor's homicide division, said his investigators saw fallout from witness intimidation every day. When they arrive at a crime scene, he said, bystanders scatter so neighbors will not think they are cooperating with the police.

Those who do help often do so surreptitiously — leaving detectives a note in a trash can or asking to be taken away in handcuffs "so that neighbors will think they're in trouble with the police and not cooperating," Mr. DeMattia said.

Prosecutors in other cities tell similar stories about their witnesses being pressured, and say they are cautious about pursuing cases based on lone witnesses because of worries about faulty memory, ulterior motives and, as in the Yusef Johnson case, credibility.

That is part of why Ms. Jessamy, in Baltimore, has all but refused to file charges in single-witness situations.

But across Maryland in Prince George's County, where there is also a serious gang problem, State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey has taken the opposite tack. He insists on pursuing single-witness cases even though he was criticized publicly for losing 4 of them in 13 months.

"If you have a single witness and you believe their story, I believe you've got to go forward, even if it's a case you might lose," said Mr. Ivey, whose office's conviction rate on homicides is more than 80 percent. "I'm not going to give the gang members, the murderers and the rapists an easy out. And if they know that all they have to do is get your case down to one witness, I think it would encourage them to use even more intimidation." Here in Newark, even in cases with multiple witnesses — and occasionally even when one of those witnesses is a police officer — the prosecutor has sometimes been unwilling to authorize arrests.

Take the case of Lloyd Shears, an Army veteran killed during a robbery in December. A man told the police he had seen his neighbor fire the fatal shots. A woman who had been standing next to him told detectives she heard the shots, and then turned to see the neighbor running from the scene. But the neighbor has not been charged.

Or consider the killing of Shamid Wallace, an 18-year-old found face down in the street last August with several gunshot wounds in his torso. Detectives found two witnesses who identified the man they said they saw kill Mr. Wallace. An off-duty Newark police officer heard the gunshots, saw a man fleeing with a gun and later picked the suspect out of a photo array. The suspect has not been arrested.

Then there is Farad Muhammad, who was stabbed to death last July. One witness told the police she had seen someone she knew running away from Mr. Muhammad's body. An off-duty police officer from neighboring East Orange identified the same man, saying he had seen the suspect chasing Mr. Muhammad with a knife. Again, no charges were filed.

Yusef's parents, who keep a shrine of photographs surrounding his school sports trophies, still hope that his suspected killer will be arrested soon.

Wielding Fear Like a Weapon

But to those who suggest Ms. Dow is overreacting to the problem of witness intimidation, her supporters point to the death of Steven Edwards, who was shot and killed in a car on South Eighth Street in January 2006. Within a month, detectives had three witnesses identifying the gunman.

One of the witnesses, a gang member, quickly announced he would never testify for fear he would be ostracized for helping the police — or wind up murdered himself. Six months later, another witness was himself charged in two homicides, shattering any credibility.

The third witness picked the suspect out of a photo array, but immediately began to waver when asked about testifying in open court.

"She would not say she was 100 percent sure," said a police report on the case, "because she was afraid of retaliation."

Prosecutors Help The Fearful Be Good Witnesses (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

In their Forestville neighborhood, Lionel D. Gilliam and his criminal cohorts trafficked in cocaine and fear.

Between July and October 2002, Gilliam, then a teenager, killed four men as he spearheaded a crack cocaine ring.

Gilliam killed two of his victims because he thought they were providing information about him and his accomplices to police, according to testimony in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt. On Feb. 8, after a six-week trial, a federal jury convicted Gilliam of four murders and other crimes.

Gilliam, now 23, fatally gunned down a longtime friend, Donald "Tweedy" Twitty, July 16, 2002. Gilliam thought Twitty was providing police with information about his criminal activities, according to testimony.

Three months later, Gilliam fatally shot Juan J. Clark 11 times with an AK-47. One government witness testified that in the moments before the killing, Gilliam accused Clark of talking to police.

Gilliam was also convicted of a slew of other violent crimes and drug offenses. Sean A. Simpson, 24, was convicted of one count of murder in one of the four killings. Norberto Quinones, 24, was convicted of conspiracy to distribute controlled substances and other offenses.

The violence committed by Gilliam and Simpson made them feared figures in their neighborhood, federal prosecutors said.

At least five government witnesses testified they were reluctant to take the stand, and some said they feared for their safety. Nonetheless, by keeping in contact with their witnesses -- and recording their grand jury testimony -- federal prosecutors succeeded in getting them to appear at the trial, providing important testimony for the government.

State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey said he is considering emulating the methods federal prosecutors used to obtain the testimony of fearful witnesses. Ivey said he distributed copies of a news article about the convictions to prosecutors in his office to get them to start thinking about using the federal approach.

He has reason to look at other ways to win convictions.

In the 13 months beginning in January 2006, cases against 12 defendants charged with murder in Prince George's County Circuit Court never made it to a jury, primarily because of problems with witnesses.

Circuit Court judges dropped charges against two defendants, and prosecutors dropped charges against the other 10. In cases involving six defendants, prosecutors couldn't find vital witnesses as trials were about to start. In one case involving two defendants, a key prosecution witness stopped cooperating on the eve of trial. In two other cases, prosecutors determined that their lone, uncorroborated witness was unreliable.

Although he could not point to specific attacks on state witnesses, Ivey said he thinks many witnesses made themselves scarce because they were fearful of retaliation.

In the Gilliam trial, federal prosecutors overcame that with a straightforward approach and some old-school technology, said Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein.

When his office wins an indictment, a lead prosecutor and a case agent (from the FBI, in this instance) are assigned, and it is their responsibility to stay in touch with witnesses and make sure they appear in court, Rosenstein said.

Federal prosecutors also make it clear to witnesses that they can face legal consequences if they do not appear for court.

"We are very aggressive in assuring that witnesses show up," Rosenstein said. "If they don't show, we get an arrest warrant, and they can be prosecuted for contempt of court or obstruction. If they take the stand and testify falsely, they can be prosecuted for perjury."

To guard against witnesses who at trial suffer sudden memory loss or deviate from their grand jury testimony, federal prosecutors often record the grand jury testimony of government witnesses, Rosenstein said.

In the case involving Gilliam and his drug ring, government witness Iesha Nicole Johnson of Prince George's County, 20, testified at the trial that she did not remember testifying before the grand jury. U.S. District Judge Roger W. Titus allowed federal prosecutors to play an audiotape of Johnson's grand jury testimony, in which Johnson said Gilliam had admitted to killing Twitty and someone else.

Ivey said he is considering taping the grand jury testimony of state witnesses who might be subject to intimidation. Typically, such testimony is recorded by a court reporter.

"That's something we're looking to do," Ivey said. "I think it's absolutely a great way to go."

Channeling Garth Brooks, Ney Sends Farewell E-mail (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, March 1, 2007

Former Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), who will report today to federal prison in West Virginia, issued an emotional goodbye e-mail (see below) yesterday to friends and colleagues. He thanked them for their support over the past six months and told them he had “gained a higher power” to help him through his incarceration.

The e-mail closed with a quote from Garth Brooks’s “The Dance”: “And now I’m glad I didn’t know/ The way it all would end, the way it all would go/ Our lives are better left to chance/ I could have missed the pain/ But I’d have had to miss the dance.”

Ney will serve a sentence of 30 months on federal bribery charges. He resigned from Congress in November after pleading guilty to one count of conspiracy and making false statements.

In his letter, Ney expressed a mixture of hope and regret.

DOJ_NMG_0138525

"Someone asked me the other day, if I wish I had never ran for office," he wrote. "I answered that I am glad that I did ... Nothing can erase the wonderful memories, thoughts, constituents, and changes that we, working together with the Republicans and Democrats, have been able to do."

He expressed sorrow for the crimes he had committed and said he was willing to accept the consequences of his actions.

"My family and I have lost everything on an economical basis, house, health care, possessions, but so have other people, people in the district, many, have lost all," he wrote. "And yes, that is painful for anyone that has gone through it, but, I am so fortunate to have my wife and children, we are so rich with family, friends like you, loved ones that are there for us, and full of hope for a good future.

"The darkest days are not ahead, I have gained a higher power, the god of my understanding, is with all of us and that allows me to view tomorrow, although as a day of loss of freedom, as a day of enlightenment and of life to come," concluded Ney.

Ellen Ratner, a close friend of Ney's, said the former congressman is particularly grateful that he is sober. Before his sentencing, Ney completed a month in an alcohol treatment facility.

"He has thanked me numerous times for helping him achieve his sobriety," Ratner said. "I'm just mad at myself for not doing it earlier."

Ratner said she dined last week with Ney and that she comforted the lawmaker and told him that his incarceration could be a positive experience.

"Obviously he is scared, but he believes he is going to get through this," she said. "I think he has learned and knows that it can be an extremely positive experience, by using it as a time to reflect."

"Bob made some serious mistakes, and he and his family are paying a steep price for them," said another Ney associate, who did not want to be named. "But he's taken responsibility for his actions and he still has many people who care deeply for him. Over the course of his long career, Bob helped countless people and thousands of lives were improved because of his hard work and compassionate spirit."

The associate added, "It's very sad that all of that will be overshadowed for the foreseeable future, but hopefully one day more people will look back and recognize that this is a decent man who did a lot of good and who is determined to make amends for his terrible mistakes in judgment."

Ratner agreed. "I don't think we have seen the last of Bob Ney," she said. "I think people are going to see that he is a very good person. It may take some time, but they will."

Ney first signaled the problems that lay ahead when he resigned from his chairmanship on the powerful House Administration Committee last August and announced he would not run for reelection. Ney later admitted he accepted thousands of dollars of gifts from lobbyists in exchange for legislative favors, and he formally confessed his wrongdoings in November. On Jan. 19, he became the first lawmaker sentenced for involvement in the scandal surrounding former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

His ex-chief of staff, Will Heaton, was sentenced on Monday for his role in the scandal, which included concealing thousands of dollars in gifts from lobbyists for himself and Ney.

N.J.: Sex Offender Internet Use Targeted (AP)

New Jersey Targets Sex Offenders' Internet Use, Online Dating Site Rules

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) -- Amid growing concern about child safety on the computer, New Jersey lawmakers are considering a measure to prohibit released sex offenders from using the Internet and to impose new rules for online dating sites.

"We're living in some very scary times," said Senate President Richard J. Codey, who is spearheading New Jersey's effort. "No matter how much you trust your kids, no matter how much you think you know what they're doing, there are some sick people out there who will stop at nothing to prey on them."

Released sex offenders caught using the Internet would face up to 18 months in jail and fines of up to $10,000. Sex offenders caught using the Internet to solicit a child would face a mandatory five years in jail, rather than the three years they face under the current law.

The measure also requires online dating sites to tell New Jersey residents whether they do background checks.

No federal law imposes Internet restrictions on convicted sex offenders, though Florida and Nevada have laws imposing computer restrictions on sex offenders.

The plan is to be considered soon by the state Senate, but already has raised constitutional questions. Internet companies like Yahoo!, AOL, eHarmony and Match.com are also concerned about the online dating rule.

DOJ_NMG_0138526

Bill Ashworth, director of state government affairs at Yahoo!, said background checks are unreliable because of fraud and problems getting information from states with different laws on what information is available.

"Criminal background checks provide users of online dating with a false sense of security," he said. "The last thing we want users to do is let their guard down."

A 2000 U.S. Department of Justice survey of youths ages 10 to 17 found that about one in five received a sexual solicitation or approach over the Internet in the prior year. The concern has prompted several states to take steps against child solicitation through the Internet.

Last year, Colorado banned any person from using a computer to talk to an unrelated child under age 15 without parental permission if the person if at least four years older than the child. Kansas and Oklahoma have made electronic solicitation of a child a crime.

"People have to worry about people preying on their kids even when they're in the safety of their own home," said Codey, D-Essex.

The New Jersey proposal would apply to sex offenders subject to Megan's Law registration, community supervision for life and those on probation or parole.

Under the plan, convicted sex offenders would have to submit to periodic, unannounced examinations of their computer equipment, install equipment on their computer so its use could be monitored and inform law enforcement if they have access to a computer.

But Parry Aftab, a lawyer, author and executive director of WiredSafety.org, an online safety and education group based in Bergen County, said Internet restrictions for sex offenders may not survive a court challenge. She said the idea makes her "child protection hat conflict with my Internet privacy lawyer hat."

"So many human services and educational services are available online that I think they may not have access to services that they should have access to," Aftab said.

She said keeping sex offenders off the Internet would be difficult to enforce, but that monitoring equipment would help put people back in jail when they violate it.

"(The measure) is going to be ignored by anyone who's predatorial," Aftab said.

Tom Rosenthal, of the New Jersey Office of the Public Defender, said the office will look into the constitutional ramifications of the proposal and expressed concern that barring juvenile sex offenders from the Internet would deny them educational opportunities.

He said it may also be best to rely on parole officers' vigilance to decide whether computers need to be checked after finding probable cause.

"We think it's best to leave discretion in the hands of professional law enforcement," he said.

Aftab also questioned whether the law regarding background checks for online dating sites, which she thought would be a first, would be effective.

Both Ashworth and Aftab said emphasizing safety tips on meeting people through the computer was the better approach.

Supreme Court Says Cross-Examination Rule Not Retroactive (LAW/AP)

By Mark Sherman, The Associated Press

AP, March 1, 2007

The Supreme Court unanimously reinstated a Nevada child molester's conviction Wednesday in a decision that continued the justices' refusal to apply recent rulings on criminal procedure to older cases.

Marvin Bockting was convicted in 1988 on the strength of his stepdaughter's statements to police. But then-6-year-old Autumn Bockting did not testify at Bockting's trial, so his lawyers never had the opportunity to question the child.

In 2004, the Court ruled that defendants have a constitutional right to cross-examine witnesses against them.

The question in this case was whether that rule would apply to older cases like Bockting's. Justice Samuel Alito, writing for the Court, said it would not. The 2004 case "did not effect a change of this magnitude," Alito said.

The Supreme Court has refused a dozen times over 17 years to apply new rules of criminal procedure to older cases.

Alone among federal appeals courts, however, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the rule should apply retroactively and overturned Bockting's conviction.

Nevada and the Bush administration urged the justices to conclude that the San Francisco-based court got it wrong. Among other things, they said courts would be burdened by defendants whose convictions depended on out-of-court statements that were not subject to cross-examination.

Franny Forsman, the federal public defender who represented Bockting, said the right to confront a witness was so important to the integrity of the trial that it deserved the same consideration as, say, the Court's landmark ruling in the 1960s that guaranteed a lawyer to defendants in criminal trials.

The Court, however, disagreed. Alito said the decision on cross-examination "is much more limited in scope" than the Court's ruling in Gideon v. Wainwright assuring representation for defendants.

Forsman had also discounted the argument that many convictions would be imperiled by a ruling favorable to her client.

The case is Whorton v. Bockting, 05-595.

An L.A. 'most-wanted' Gang Suspect Caught In Guatemala (LAT)

By Richard Winton And Patrick McGreevy

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

An alleged 18th Street gang member named three weeks ago as one of the Los Angeles Police Department's 10 most wanted gang members has been captured in Guatemala and deported back to Texas, officials said today.

Angel Zevallos, an alleged 18th Street Westside member who goes by the name "Spanky," was captured last week and deported by Guatemalan authorities, said Chief Inspector John Clark of the U.S. Marshals Service in Los Angeles.

Zevallos will appear before a judge in Texas and then face extradition back to California to face an attempted murder charge, Clark said.

Police Chief William J. Bratton confirmed the arrest as the first success of a new program in which the department released a list of its 10 most wanted gang members.

The listing of gang fugitives and of the 11 worst gangs is part of a new campaign to reduce gang violence, which increased more than 15% citywide last year. Bratton has redeployed more than 200 officers to the crackdown on gangs.

"He was captured in Guatemala," Bratton said. "This is part of what we discussed at a recent conference about improving relationships with those countries. He is an attempted murder suspect, so they don't have problems about giving him back to us because there is no death penalty involved."

Bratton said further coordination with the U.S. Marshals Service will be required for others on the top 10 list, "a lot of these people, we believe, are out of this country, and those not wanted for murder we have the ability to get back."

Many countries will not extradite suspects to the United States if they face the death penalty.

Bratton said Zevallos' place on the list will not be empty long.

"We will be putting a new person on the list," the chief said.

2 Paintings By Picasso Are Stolen In Paris (NYT)

By Alan Riding

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 28 — Two important paintings by Picasso estimated by the police to be worth a total of about $66 million have been stolen from the Left Bank home of his granddaughter Diana Widmaier-Picasso, the authorities announced Wednesday.

Paris police officials said the two oils, “Maya With Doll” from 1938 and “Portrait of Jacqueline” from 1961, were taken from Ms. Widmaier-Picasso’s house on the Rue de Grenelle in the city’s chic Seventh Arrondissement sometime overnight between Monday and Tuesday.

The police said that two drawings, one by Picasso, were also stolen, but this could not be confirmed by the Picasso family lawyer, Céline Astolfe.

In a telephone interview Ms. Astolfe said that Ms. Widmaier-Picasso and her mother, Maya, the daughter of Picasso’s longtime mistress Marie-Thérèse Walter, were asleep in the house when the theft occurred.

“They heard a noise, went downstairs and saw nothing,” Ms. Astolfe said. “They went to bed and the following morning they saw that two paintings were missing.”

The lawyer said the theft appeared to be the work of professionals because the home’s alarms were neutralized and there were no signs of a break-in. “They blocked the alarm, and they had either the code or keys,” she said.

Although the paintings formed part of the Picasso family’s private collection, they are nonetheless well known and, art experts said, would be difficult to sell on the open market. Ms. Astolfe said their value might exceed the police estimate.

Thefts of works by Picasso have become relatively common, not least because he was so prolific. London's Art Loss Register lists 444 missing Picassos in its database, including paintings, lithographs, drawings and ceramics. There is also an active industry making and selling fake Picassos.

The artist's descendants have had artworks stolen before. One famous theft involved pieces worth about $17 million, taken from the Cannes home of Marina Picasso, another of his granddaughters, in 1989. Those were later recovered. Seven Picasso oils stolen from a gallery in Zurich in 1994 have yet to be found.

Neither Diana Widmaier-Picasso nor her mother could be reached on Wednesday.

Like other members of the family they are active in studying and overseeing the artist's legacy. Maya Widmaier-Picasso is often called on to verify questionable works attributed to Picasso, while her daughter, an art historian, recently published an illustrated book of Picasso's erotic works called "Art Can Only Be Erotic."

A Museum To Honor Law Enforcers (WP)

By Michael E. Ruane

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

You're a cop. You've been summoned to an alley behind a strip mall that's a known drug hangout. You hail a man and two women lounging by an old car.

The man, a beefy guy in a plaid work shirt, gets belligerent and starts toward you. One of the women grabs his arm to hold him back, and as you focus on them, the other woman slips a pistol from her pocket and opens fire.

Bang. You're dead.

This big-screen interactive simulation of an eight-second slice in the virtual life of an everyday cop was demonstrated yesterday as the National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund kicked off the money-raising campaign for a new museum, planned to open in 2011 near Judiciary Square.

Nearly $30 million has been raised for the museum, which is designed to showcase police work and the history of American law enforcement. Yesterday's event began a drive to raise the rest of the $80 million cost, with officials previewing some of the attractions.

The police training simulation, in which participants must make snap shoot-or-don't-shoot decisions, is one of several interactive features. Visitors also will be able to attend a simulated autopsy -- which will be "instructive, not gross" -- do realistic forensic and detective work, and see a word-class collection of police memorabilia, according to museum officials.

The fundraising drive was launched at the National Press Club with a boost from former presidents Bill Clinton and George H. W. Bush, who spoke via video recording, and former U.S. attorneys general John D. Ashcroft, Dick Thornburgh and Edwin A. Meese, who spoke in person. Several local officials also attended, including D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty, D.C. Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier, Prince George's County Police Chief Melvin C. High and Fairfax County Police Chief David M. Rohrer.

Also present was Jean Hill, president of Concerns of Police Survivors, which supports families and friends of slain police officers. Hill is the mother of Barry Hill, a 38-year-old Harris County, Tex., deputy sheriff, who was shot seven times and killed while trying to arrest a car thief Dec. 4, 2000.

"It's a matter of honor that we not forget the sacrifice of the living or the dead, and with the construction of the National Law Enforcement Museum we will forever be honoring all men and women who have taken the oath to protect and to serve," she said.

Her son was among numerous slain or wounded law enforcement officers remembered yesterday. Among them were J.D. Tippit, the Dallas police officer who was killed by Lee Harvey Oswald on Nov. 22, 1963, and Fairfax County's Vicky O. Armel and Michael E. Garbarino, who were fatally shot by a disturbed teenager last May.

Plans call for the 90,000-square-foot museum to be built mostly underground in the 400 block of E Street NW, across from the National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial, according to the fund's chairman, Craig W. Floyd.

A sampling of museum artifacts on display yesterday included historic handcuffs and badges, some collectible crime cards, featuring the likes of Machine Gun Kelly and John Dillinger, and an original "Wanted" poster from the 1932 kidnapping of the son of famed aviator Charles Lindbergh.

Among other things, the museum will enable visitors to practice being a 911 operator, enter actual prison cells the museum hopes to acquire from New York's Sing Sing prison, and enter a hall of remembrance honoring the country's 17,500 fallen police officers.

Officials said the autopsy will feature a table bearing a manikin on which a simulated post mortem will be projected from overhead cameras. It won't be too graphic, exhibits designer Christopher Chadbourne said. But a sign will be posted outside to warn the squeamish.

CIVIL LAW:

Court Leery Of Suits By Taxpayers (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court justices appeared ready Wednesday to limit taxpayers' ability to challenge government funding of groups with religious affiliations.

Several justices were skeptical of a lower court decision allowing a Wisconsin group, the Freedom From Religion Foundation, to sue the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. The foundation says the White House office — created by President Bush to help religious groups compete with secular ones for federal social services grants — aims to support an unconstitutional government endorsement of religion.

Some justices, including Chief Justice John Roberts and Antonin Scalia, suggested that if the lower court's decision were affirmed, taxpayers would bring frivolous lawsuits challenging government spending that touches religion.

Roberts told Andrew Pincus, representing the Wisconsin group, "I don't understand, under your theory, why any taxpayer couldn't sue our marshal for … saying (as is customary at the start of a court session), 'God save the United States and this honorable court.' Her salary comes from Congress."

Taxpayers typically cannot sue over how the government spends money, based on the theory that the link between the expenditure and an individual taxpayer is remote. In a 1968 case, Flast v. Cohen, the court made an exception for lawsuits alleging a breach of the separation of church and state.

At issue now is the breadth of that exception. U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement, defending the administration, called it narrow and suggested at the close of his argument that the court abandon the exception. Twelve states have urged the court to bar all such lawsuits by taxpayers.

Wednesday's case does not involve a specific grant. It focuses on Bush's executive order that led to a series of regional conferences that promoted the administration's faith-based initiative. Freedom From Religion says the conferences boosted the funding prospects for religion-based groups over secular community-based organizations.

Clement said taxpayers may not challenge a program unless it is funded through a congressional appropriation and the expenditure itself led to a constitutional violation. The First Amendment says government "shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion."

Pincus argued that it should not matter whether the funding comes through the legislative or executive branch. He said an expenditure may be challenged if it is "discrete and identifiable" and "arises with respect to religious activities."

Justice Anthony Kennedy said: "It seems to me unduly intrusive for the courts to tell the president that (he) cannot talk to specific groups … to make sure that all of their energies are used properly."

More sympathetic to the challengers, Justice Stephen Breyer said that "people become terribly upset when they see some other religion getting the money from the state."

Top Court To Rule On Aid For Religious Charities (FT)

By Patti Waldmeirin Washington

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

A case that could test whether the Bush administration has crossed the constitutional line between church and state by channelling federal aid to religious charities was brought before the US Supreme Court yesterday.

The case was brought by taxpayers looking for a way to challenge the White House's "faith-based initiative", which tries to increase the role of religious groups in fighting poverty, drug addiction and other social problems.

The Freedom from Religion Foundation, a group of atheists and agnostics, says they should be allowed to sue to prove that the White House violated the constitution by spending money on conferences designed to give religious organisations an inside track in obtaining federal grants.

The issue is whether the courthouse door should be open to any taxpayer who wants to challenge such spending on the basis that it violates the constitution, or whether only religious opponents who have been discriminated against directly should be allowed to sue.

A federal appeals court in Chicago sided with the atheist group but the US Justice Department says the ruling should be overturned on the grounds that it could lead to a flood of taxpayer lawsuits challenging all sorts of government spending.

Justice Antonin Scalia said that if the suit was allowed to proceed, taxpayers could challenge White House spending on security for President George W. Bush when he attended religious events, as he often does. Justice Anthony Kennedy said: "We'd be supervising the White House in . . . who it can talk to."

The case provoked angry exchanges between several justices and lawyers. Justice Stephen Breyer said: "There are strong feelings when government spends money on one religion and not another. We see that in the world today."

Mr Breyer appeared concerned that if taxpayers could not bring such suits, they could not rein in excessive government involvement with religion - even if government went so far as to build a network of state churches around the country to promote a particularreligion.

Sureme Court Takes Up Bush's 'faith-based Initiative' (LAT)

By David G. Savage

WASHINGTON -- In a closely watched church-state separation case, a Bush administration lawyer urged the Supreme Court Wednesday to shield the president's "faith-based initiative" from legal challenges in court.

U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement said taxpayers who believe the White House is unconstitutionally promoting religion should not be accorded legal "standing" to sue in court. It would be too "intrusive on the executive branch" to permit lawsuits contesting how the president and his advisers conduct their affairs, he said.

The case involves a Wisconsin group called Freedom From Religion that sued in 2004 to challenge the "faith-based initiative" on First Amendment grounds. The group said the White House officials were using public money to help church-based groups win grants and contracts.

It is the first major religion case to come before the Supreme Court since President Bush's two appointees took their seats. In their questions Wednesday, both Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. sounded as though they sided with the administration.

Overall, the nine justices seemed split during the hour-long argument. If they adopt the administration's view, the ruling could make it harder for critics to sue officials who use public money in ways that support religion. If the justices rule in favor of Freedom From Religion, the group would still have to prove its case in court.

Roberts made clear he thought the group's claims should be thrown out of court. If taxpayers can sue the government whenever an official invokes God or religion, why couldn't anyone "sue our marshal for standing up and saying 'God save the United States and this is honorable court'?" asked Roberts, citing the invocation heard each day when the justices enter the court.

Justice Antonin Scalia appeared to agree. Otherwise, he said, taxpayers could sue the president for having spent tax money to promote religion simply because he flew across the country to give a speech to a religious group. "The whole trip is about religion," Scalia said, but "it really doesn't make any sense" to permit lawsuits challenging this spending.

Taking up the opposite view, Justice Stephen G. Breyer said courts and lawsuits are needed to enforce the separation of church and state. "People become terribly upset when they see some other religion getting the money from the state" to subsidize their faith, he said.

"We have a pretty clear, simple rule," he said, that allows lawsuits "when the government spends money in violation of the establishment clause." The First Amendment says "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion."

The issue of who has standing is technical, but crucial. It can determine when and whether the government's conduct can be challenged in court.

Normally, persons must say they have suffered a personal injury of some sort before they can sue in court. For example, taxpayers cannot sue to stop the war in Iraq simply because they disagree with it.

But nearly 40 years ago, the court under then-Chief Justice Earl Warren made an exception for challenges to government spending that promotes religion.

In Wednesday's argument, Clement urged the court to narrow that exception considerably. In one exchange, he said taxpayers should not be allowed to sue even if officials use tax money to build a church.

The Bush administration said Freedom From Religion's suit should be thrown out on the grounds that the challengers did not have standing to sue in court. However, the U.S. appeals court in Chicago allowed the suit to go forward. In a 2-1 ruling, Judge Richard Posner said plaintiffs sought to show the White House-sponsored meetings were "propaganda vehicles for religion."

But before it could be heard, the Supreme Court agreed to hear the administration's appeal filed on behalf of Jay Hein, who directs the White House Office of Faith-based and Community Initiatives.

Clement said the government should be shielded from suits over how officials use general tax money. He agreed taxpayers could sue if Congress passed a law that distributed money directly to churches or religious groups. But it is different matter if the White House uses general funds to encourage religious groups to do charitable work, he argued.

A coalition of liberal groups filed a friend-of-the-court brief that urged the court to reject the administration's argument.

"Tax dollars may not be used to subsidize religious activity," said Steven Shapiro, the American Civil Liberties Union's legal director. "Barring taxpayers from enforcing this fundamental principle in court would effectively license the government to violate the Constitution."

The case will be decided in several months.

Court Spars Over Faith-Based Office (WSJ/AP)

By Mark H. Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A sharply divided U.S. Supreme Court on Wednesday sparred over the ability of an atheist organization to, as taxpayers, challenge the activities of President Bush's faith-based initiative office.

The high court appeared torn over whether its precedents allowed the court challenge, which alleges the White House initiative violates the freedom of religion Establishment Clause in the U.S. Constitution. A lower court allowed the lawsuit to proceed. But at the oral arguments, the federal government doggedly argued the group didn't satisfy the required test to sue as a taxpayer upset about how the government is spending money.

Washington, D.C. attorney Walter Pincus, representing the Wisconsin-based Freedom From Religion Foundation, accused the Bush administration of trying to improperly bar taxpaying citizens from suing over religious initiatives by the government. "We think there's no basis for drawing the arbitrary line suggested by the government."

As with many other social issues before the high court, the justices appeared to divide along conservative and liberal lines, with Justice Anthony Kennedy, a moderate conservative, controlling the outcome.

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. led the charge for finding in the government's favor, arguing that allowing the lawsuit could open the government up to a flurry of challenges whenever religion is raised, even trivially. He cited the Supreme Court marshal's opening statement -- "God save the United States and this honorable court" -- as a possible violation that could trigger a lawsuit under the legal standard proposed by Mr. Pincus. Justice Roberts also wondered whether the White House could spend money on security and food at a presidential speech before a religious prayer breakfast or other event.

Mr. Pincus said a taxpayer challenge for a constitutional Establishment Clause violation requires that the government action spend money specifically promoting a particular religion over another, as opposed to "incidental" spending. "The injury is the expenditure of funds that violates the Establishment Clause," Mr. Pincus said.

Justice Roberts wasn't convinced, however, and made it clear he thinks drawing the line at "incidental" costs is a problem. "That shows how totally manipulable your incidental test is," Justice Roberts told Mr. Pincus at one point.

Justice Kennedy was also troubled by the group's arguments, remarking at one point that "I'm not sure that this make sense."

Justice Stephen Breyer said he was searching for a standard that lets taxpayers, who provide the funds the government spends, have an appropriate check on the government's involvement in religious activities.

A wild card in the outcome could be Justice Antonin Scalia, who appeared troubled with Supreme Court precedents limiting when Establishment Clause suits could be brought and concerned with making it easy to challenge a variety of government activities.

President Bush created an office for religious-based community initiatives in 2001. The aim of the office is to make it easier for religious groups to win contracts and get federal funding for programs such as social-services aid.

Freedom From Religion Foundation Inc., an atheist and agnostics group from Madison, Wis., sued the government, alleging the program violates the freedom of religion Establishment Clause in the U.S. Constitution.

The 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Chicago in May 2006 ordered a federal trial court to reopen the lawsuit after a U.S. District Court judge had dismissed the group's claims.

Court Reinstates Conviction

Also Wednesday, the high court unanimously reinstated a Nevada child molester's conviction in a decision that continued the justices' refusal to apply recent rulings on criminal procedure to older cases.

Marvin Bockting was convicted in 1988 on the strength of his stepdaughter's statements to police. But then-6-year-old Autumn Bockting did not testify at Mr. Bockting's trial so his lawyers never had the opportunity to question the child.

In 2004, the court ruled that defendants have a constitutional right to cross-examine witnesses against them. The question in this case was whether that rule would apply to older cases like Mr. Bockting's. Justice Samuel Alito, writing for the court, said it would not. The 2004 case "did not effect a change of this magnitude," Justice Alito said.

The Supreme Court has refused a dozen times over 17 years to apply new rules of criminal procedure to older cases.

Alone among federal appeals courts, however, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the rule should apply retroactively and overturned Mr. Bockting's conviction.

Nevada and the Bush administration urged the justices to conclude that the San Francisco-based court got it wrong. Among other things, they said courts would be burdened by defendants whose convictions depended on out-of-court statements that were not subject to cross-examination.

Franny Forsman, the federal public defender who represented Mr. Bockting, said the right to confront a witness was so important to the integrity of the trial that it deserved the same consideration as, say, the court's landmark ruling in the 1960s that guaranteed a lawyer to defendants in criminal trials.

The court, however, disagreed. Justice Alito said the decision on cross-examination "is much more limited in scope" than the court's ruling in Gideon v. Wainwright assuring representation for defendants.

Ms. Forsman had also discounted the argument that many convictions would be imperiled by a ruling favorable to her client.

The case is Whorton v. Bockting.

Justices Weigh Right To Sue Over Church-State Separation (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

The Supreme Court, for the first time under Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., confronted yesterday the devilishly complicated issue of church-state separation, and whether ordinary taxpayers have the right to sue over the Bush administration's embrace of faith-based organizations.

With Roberts and newest member Samuel A. Alito Jr. active in the discussion, the justices bombarded the lawyers before them with questions about what kinds of government action could warrant a taxpayer suit. A church built by the government? The number of times a president appears at prayer breakfasts?

Roberts even wondered whether opponents of the administration's initiatives would extend their concerns to the court itself, which opened yesterday's session, as it always does, with a marshal appealing for God to "save the United States and this honorable court."

Constitutional scholars and some justices say that the First Amendment's religion clauses present some of the most difficult questions to interpret. Justices must balance the establishment clause -- Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion-- with the free-exercise clause -- or prohibiting the free exercise thereof-- which immediately follows.

The case before the court involves a lawsuit that the Freedom From Religion Foundation, a Wisconsin-based group of agnostics and atheists, brought against the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. President Bush established the office in 2001 because, he said, he wanted to level the playing field between religious-based and secular groups vying for grants to provide social services. But the foundation said conferences held by the office favored the religious groups over the secular groups.

The question before the justices, though, is whether the complaints can even be brought to court.

The Supreme Court decided decades ago that taxpayers generally do not have the right, or "standing," to challenge government spending decisions simply because they do not agree with them. But it carved out an exception in 1968, in a case called Flast v. Cohen, for taxpayers to challenge congressional spending that violated the establishment clause.

A lower court said the Freedom From Religion Foundation's suit did not meet the Flast test, because it involved the executive branch, not Congress's taxing and spending powers. But the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit disagreed.

The court's 2 to 1 majority opinion said the suit should go forward because "there is so much that executive officials could do to promote religion in ways forbidden by the establishment clause."

Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, who represents the Bush administration, said in a brief asking the Supreme Court to review the case that that decision would "create a roving license for any one of the more than 180 million taxpayers in the United States to challenge any action of the executive branch that offends that individual's own view" of church-state separation.

Conservative groups and 12 states, including Virginia, that support the government would like to see the Flast exception overturned. And while Clement stopped just short of that, he told the court yesterday that the right to sue established in Flast was a very narrow one. Fielding hypotheticals from the justices, he found few instances in which he thought taxpayers would have a standing.

But with helpful commentary from Roberts, he said that citizens who believed that they had been specifically harmed -- for instance, members of one denomination who thought that the government was discriminating against them -- could have the right to sue.

"I think it's important to emphasize that if this Court recognizes that there is not taxpayer standing, that does not mean that there won't be lawsuits, that there won't be directly injured plaintiffs that can bring claims," Clement said.

Alito, Justice Antonin Scalia and Roberts -- whom Clements three times said was "exactly right" in his view of the case -- seemed most sympathetic to the government's argument, and Justice Anthony M. Kennedy worried about the courts "supervising the White House." Justice Clarence Thomas did not ask questions, but has written in the past that he does not think that the establishment clause gives rise to individual complaints.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer seemed most skeptical of the government's position that only congressional action involving taxing and spending was open to taxpayer challenge. "What's wrong with just saying that Flast stands for the proposition that when the government spends money in violation of the establishment clause, a taxpayer -- after all, the money comes from the taxpayer -- can bring a lawsuit?" he asked.

The foundation's lawyer, Andrew Pincus, agreed. "There's no basis in history . . . for the government's claim that executive branch decisions are somehow different and insulated with respect to spending," he said.

Court Hears Arguments Linking Right To Sue And Spending On Religion (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — The question for the Supreme Court on Wednesday was a jurisdictional one: whether taxpayers who object to the way the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives spends its money can get into federal court to make their case.

Whether the office or its programs actually run afoul of the Constitution was not before the justices.

But any notion that this jurisdictional question was the sort of arcane, technical issue that only a law professor could love was quickly dispelled by the intensity of the argument, one of the liveliest of the term.

The fast-paced hour ended with the clear impression that the Roberts court will soon put its own stamp on the law of taxpayer standing, with potentially significant implications for the relationship between government and religion.

The real question by the end of the argument was whether a majority would be content simply to scale back a Warren court precedent that allows taxpayers to challenge the use of public money for religious purposes or whether the court would disavow the precedent altogether and keep such suits out of federal court.

Solicitor General Paul D. Clement revealed his hand slowly, bringing his argument to a pinpoint landing at the precise close of a three-minute rebuttal. If the justices could not see their way to applying the precedent narrowly, Mr. Clement said, the court should simply overrule it. “If something has to go in this area,” he said, “I think it’s an easy choice.”

Under either option the administration advocated, the court would reject a suit that the federal appeals court in Chicago reinstated last year, a challenge to conferences that Bush administration officials have held to advise religious groups on how to apply for federal grants as part of the effort to bolster the role of such groups in social service programs.

The plaintiff is the Freedom From Religion Foundation Inc. of Madison, Wis., which advocates strict separation of church and state. In a complaint filed initially in 2004, the organization argued that officials who convened and addressed the conferences used congressionally appropriated money in a way that “violated the fundamental principle of the separation of church and state.”

Under the ordinary doctrine of “standing,” which defines who may bring a suit, people who object to a government policy but who cannot claim a concrete injury from that policy have no right to sue. But in a 1968 decision, the court carved out an exception for religion cases. The case, Flast v. Cohen, gave taxpayers standing to challenge federal laws that authorized expenditures for purposes alleged to violate the First Amendment prohibition against the “establishment” of religion.

The administration position in the case argued on Wednesday, Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation Inc., No. 06-157, is that the Flast decision should be understood to include two limitations. First, Mr. Clement said, taxpayers should be limited to challenging Congressional statutes, not executive branch programs like that in this suit. Second, the solicitor general argued, taxpayers should be able to challenge only spending outside the government, not internal spending like that cited by the Freedom From Religion Foundation.

Did that mean, Justice Antonin Scalia asked Mr. Clement, taxpayers could challenge a statute that gave money to outside groups to build churches, but not one that directed the government to build its own church?

It was a “horrible hypothetical,” Mr. Clement replied, but Justice Scalia had understood him correctly: taxpayers should not have standing to challenge “an internal government church.”

Andrew J. Pincus, representing the foundation, told the court there was “no basis for drawing the arbitrary lines that the government suggests.” The Flast decision did not include such limitations, he said.

Mr. Clement was unruffled as the justices tossed various hypothetical questions his way. Could a taxpayer challenge a law that commemorated the Pilgrims “by building a government church at Plymouth Rock where we will have the regular worship in the Puritan religion?” Justice Stephen G. Breyer asked.

“I would say no,” Mr. Clement said.

Justice Breyer persisted, asking about a law requiring the government to build churches “all over America” dedicated to one particular sect. “Nobody could challenge it?” he asked.

“There would not be taxpayer standing,” Mr. Clement replied.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. observed that members of other denominations would not need taxpayer standing and that as victims of government discrimination, they could sue under ordinary principles of standing. This was one of the times the chief justice intervened to make the point that in practical application the government’s position was perhaps not as extreme as it sounded.

His interventions in the other side’s argument seemed to have the opposite goal, rejecting Mr. Pincus’s effort to depict his client’s position as modest. When Mr. Pincus said taxpayers should not be permitted to challenge merely “incidental” spending, the chief justice said that was no real limitation because it would ensnare the courts in deciding “whether the activity you’re challenging is incidental or not.”

Mr. Pincus denied that this initial inquiry would make much work for the courts. For example, he began, “if someone’s claim is that people in the White House have five meetings in the course of a year that they’re upset about — — ”

For Mr. Clement, the most helpful hand was that of Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. As the solicitor general batted back tricky hypothetical questions, Justice Alito asked him whether the lines he was drawing “make a lot of sense in an abstract sense” or were “the best that can be done” under existing precedents.

High Court Mulls Faith-based Initatives (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 1, 2007

The Supreme Court wrestled Wednesday with the question of whether taxpayers have the right to challenge the White House's aggressive promotion of federal financial aid for religious charities.

At issue is whether a Wisconsin-based group of atheists and agnostics have legal standing, by virtue of being taxpayers, to bring their complaint in the federal court system.

Taking one extreme, Justice Stephen Breyer asked a lawyer for the White House whether a taxpayer would be able to challenge a law in which Congress sets up a church at Plymouth Rock.

"I would say no," responded Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, but he added that such a church could be challenged in other ways — just not on the basis that a taxpayer has been injured. Clement is representing the Bush administration, which is trying to prevent the taxpayer suit over its aggressive promotion, through the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, of federal financial aid for religious charities.

Taking the opposite extreme, Justice Antonin Scalia asked a lawyer for the Wisconsin group, Andrew Pincus, whether taxpayers would be able to sue over the use of security money for a presidential trip where religion is discussed.

Pincus said that taxpayers would not have standing to do so, arguing that in such a case the money spent would be "incidental," and not central to the issue.

The case may turn on a 1968 Supreme Court decision that created an exception to the general prohibition on taxpayer challenges to the government spending of tax revenue. In an 8-1 decision by Chief Justice Earl Warren, the court allowed taxpayers to challenge congressional spending for private religious schools.

But the Bush administration says spending for speeches and meetings of executive branch officials does not involve spending federal money outside the government and therefore taxpayers are not entitled to challenge it.

In the current case, the Bush administration organizes conferences where faith-based organizations are allegedly singled out as being particularly worthy of receiving federal money.

The group challenging the Bush administration, called the Freedom From Religion Foundation Inc., characterizes the White House's initiative as a singling out of faith-based organizations to the exclusion of other organizations.

Last year, a federal appeals court allowed the group to pursue its lawsuit. Instead of going through Congress, President Bush issued executive orders to create the White House office and similar centers in 10 federal agencies during his first term.

One of the goals Bush set for these offices was to help religious and community groups compete for federal funding to fight poverty, substance abuse and other social problems.

The 7th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in Chicago sided with the anti-religion group, and the Justice Department wants the Supreme Court to overturn the lower court.

The case is Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation Inc., 06-157.

High Court Debates Suit Against White House's Faith-Based Initiative (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 1, 2007

Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer looked skyward Wednesday as he tried to come up with a "more amazing" hypothetical during arguments in a key church-state case. With or without divine intervention, he found one: Could the federal government fund churches and ministers of a single religion nationwide "dedicated to the proposition that this particular sect is the true sect," without fear of taxpayer lawsuits against it?

"Horrible hypothetical," growled Solicitor General Paul Clement, but he went on to say yes. "The bottom line is that there would not be taxpayer standing." With a helpful suggestion from Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., Clement qualified his point by asserting that adherents of other religions could file suit against such a program on the basis that they were being discriminated against. But Clement held firm on the point that taxpayers, merely as taxpayers, could not challenge a network of government-funded churches.

That exchange may prove crucial in determining the outcome of the case before the Court, Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation. The Wisconsin-based foundation filed a taxpayer lawsuit against the Bush administration's funding of faith-based initiatives, claiming that conferences sponsored under the funding program favor religious groups. The government defended the program, claiming the plaintiffs did not have standing, but the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the foundation could continue with its suit.

The case is an important test not only for the faith-based initiative but also for a 39-year-old precedent that has treated First Amendment establishment-clause cases differently when it comes to standing.

In other contexts, taxpayers can't challenge government programs in court solely on the grounds that their tax dollars are being misused. To prevent trivial lawsuits, the high court has required plaintiffs to show a more direct injury or a bigger stake, such as a violation of rights or a denial of benefits.

But in the 1968 case of Flast v. Cohen, the Court made an exception. It ruled that taxpayer status alone was enough to achieve standing when the claim is that a congressional expenditure violates the First Amendment's bar against establishment of religion. In making the exception, the Flast Court hearkened back to the framers' reason for creating the Establishment Clause in the first place: to prevent government from taxing and spending to favor one religion over another, even if only "three pence" of the taxpayer's money is used for that purpose, in the words of James Madison.

Madison's formulation was invoked often on Wednesday -- Justice David Souter quaintly pronounced it "thruppence" -- as the justices struggled to figure out how and whether to honor that Madisonian goal.

Clement argued that the Flast exception allows taxpayer standing only to those challenging congressional spending that benefits an outside party or church -- not in cases like the faith-based initiatives, in which the executive branch, acting on its own, has done something that the taxpayer dislikes. Broadening the exception to cover executive-branch activities, Clement said, would threaten the separation of powers and invite lawsuits every time a government official makes a religious reference.

Several justices seemed to think that was an artificial distinction and taxpayers might have standing whether a congressional or executive-branch activity is involved. Clement struggled to define the difference, and when Breyer pinned him down with his hypothetical, it appeared that Clement may have taken his point too far by suggesting that taxpayers could not challenge even such an overtly religious program.

But both Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito Jr. threw Clement lifelines. At one point, as justices tried to follow Clement's answers, Alito pointedly asked him, "Are you arguing that these lines that you are drawing make a lot of sense ... or are you just arguing that this is the best that can be done ... within the body of precedent that the Court has handed down in this area?"

Amid laughter, Scalia said, "I've been trying to make sense out of what you're saying." Clement shot back, "And I've been trying to make sense out of this Court's precedents." At which point Stevens chimed in, "Do we think we have a duty to follow precedents that don't make any sense?"

But as much as the justices seemed troubled with Clement's position, they also seemed troubled about siding with the foundation.

Washington, D.C., lawyer Andrew Pincus, representing the foundation, said Clement had drawn "arbitrary lines" that did not conform to Court precedent or to the First Amendment's history. Pincus is a partner at Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw.

Roberts, nodding toward the Court's marshal, Pamela Talkin, asked whether, under the foundation's theory, a taxpayer could sue her for saying "God save this honorable Court" at the start of Court sessions.

Scalia offered another hypothetical, asking whether taxpayers could sue when Air Force One and Secret Service agents are used in the course of a presidential trip to a religious event.

Pincus said taxpayer standing would not extend to religious activities that are "incidental" to government expenditures, and he served up his own hypothetical: government funds "paying for bagels at a prayer breakfast" would not, he suggested, trigger a valid lawsuit. Scalia later skewered that hypothetical, arguing that if the bagels went only to prayer breakfasts for evangelical groups, someone who is Jewish might feel that is not incidental or trivial at all: "You know, what could be worse than not buying bagels for a Jewish prayer breakfast?"

High Court Takes On Faith-based Initiatives (MJS)

By Katherine M. Skiba

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, March 1, 2007

Wisconsin woman leads charge against Bush programs

Washington - Anne Gaylor, Wisconsin's best-known atheist, has fought to keep church and state separate for almost 30 years. But the 80-year-old Gaylor marked a first Wednesday when a lawsuit she brought was heard by the United States Supreme Court.

Attorneys said the case, the subject of hourlong arguments Wednesday, is the first challenge to the Bush administration's faith-based initiatives to reach the high court.

The separation-of-church-and-state case, also the first of its type to be heard under Chief Justice John Roberts, hinges on a narrow but key legal question: Can the average taxpayer allege violations of the First Amendment's Establishment Clause, which states: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion . . . "

Gaylor, who lives in Madison, was on hand with other officials of the Freedom from Religion Foundation, which she founded in 1978. The dispute arose when Gaylor and her foundation filed suit against the Bush program in federal court in Wisconsin in 2004.

A judge tossed out the case, saying the plaintiffs lacked standing, which is a legal concept establishing whether someone has the right to appear in court to pursue his or her claims. The judge said the case failed a test established by the Supreme Court in that the plaintiffs' case involved the executive branch, not Congress' taxing and spending powers.

The Chicago-based 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals disagreed with the lower court. Its 2-1 majority said the foundation's suit should go forward because "there is so much that executive officials could do to promote religion in ways forbidden by the establishment clause."

That prompted the director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives to ask the Supreme Court to weigh in. Created in 2001

It was 2001, early in his presidency, that Bush used an executive order to create the faith-based initiatives office. It helps fund religious and community groups so they may fight crime, addiction, poverty and other social woes. The money is for social programs - not for proselytizing or purely religious activities. Under Bush, similar initiatives have been launched in a host of federal agencies, such as the Department of Health and Human Services.

Gaylor and her side said conferences put on under the banner of faith-based initiatives favored religious groups over secular organizations.

Two others from Wisconsin have high-profile roles in the litigation.

Jay F. Hein of Shawano has directed the White House's faith-based initiatives office since August. He, too, was in court, but let the Justice Department do the talking.

Doing that was Paul D. Clement, the U.S. solicitor general, who grew up in Cedarburg.

Clement told the nine justices on Wednesday that it was important to emphasize that if the high court found that Gaylor and her group did not have legal standing, that won't rule out lawsuits brought by "directly injured plaintiffs."

DOJ_NMG_0138537

Washington lawyer Andrew Pincus, who is representing Gaylor and her group on a pro bono basis, drew a question from the chief justice. Roberts asked whether, under Pincus' theory, a taxpayer might be able to sue the high court's marshal for the words used to open sessions of the court: "God save the United States and this honorable court."

Pincus disagreed, saying legal precedents require a taxpayer to identify discrete, identifiable and non-incidental expenditures.

Roberts and several of the justices peppered counsel with questions, seemingly split on the issue.

Observers say the case could have tremendous significance since it might limit the number of establishment clause challenges from taxpayers, even before the court considers the underlying issue: Do Bush's faith-based initiatives violate the Constitution?

The case is expected to be decided before the court begins its summer recess, expected in June. Women's rights was start

Gaylor is president emeritus of her foundation, led by her daughter, Annie Laurie Gaylor, 51, and her husband, Dan Barker, 57, both of Madison. They, too, were on hand.

The daughter put the foundation's membership at 9,000 and called the members a mix of "atheists, agnostics, rationalists, skeptics and free-thinkers."

The elder Gaylor said her fight to keep religion out of the public square flowed from earlier battles for women's rights and abortion rights. She said the realized in those campaigns, "the enemy was the same: organized religion, specifically the Catholic religion and fundamentalist sects."

"You really couldn't grow up in Wisconsin without feeling the heavy hand of religion," said Gaylor, who grew up in Tomah and graduated with an English degree from the University of Wisconsin in 1949.

This longtime crusader has had deaths threats because of her beliefs; once she was attacked on the set of a TV program in Philadelphia by a woman who said she "was going to drive the devil" out of her.

She won't venture a guess how the case will be decided, but is hopeful.

"I don't see how there should be any doubt: We are talking about the expenditure of billions of dollars, taxpayer money. Billions." Key points

· President Bush's faith-based initiatives give money to religious and community groups so they may fight crime, addiction, poverty and other social woes.

War On Warming Begins At (Al Gore's) Home (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Fresh off his victory lap at the Academy Awards, former vice president Al Gore -- who has not closed the door on a 2008 bid -- found himself in a more familiar position: on the receiving end of a political attack.

The barb came via the Tennessee Center for Policy Research, a Nashville-based think tank that advocates "limited government through policy solutions," according to its Web site.

"As the spokesman of choice for the global warming movement, Al Gore has to be willing to walk the walk, not just talk the talk, when it comes to home energy use," said the group's president, Drew Johnson, in a release alleging that Gore's house in the Volunteer State uses 20 times as much electricity as the average household nationwide.

Kalee Kreider, a spokeswoman for Gore, called the statement misleading.

"The power coming into their residence is green, renewable power," she said, explaining that the Gores participate in a program called Green Power Switch, which is run through the public Tennessee Valley Authority. Green Power Switch supplies energy from renewable sources to its members.

Kreider added that a renovation of the Gores' house is underway to make it more energy efficient, an update that will include the addition of solar panels.

Johnson was unimpressed. "The energy he receives into his house is no different than what I receive into my house," he said. "He doesn't have a green power line hooked to his house."FEC Fines Anti-Kerry 527 Group

The Federal Election Commission levied one of its largest fines ever yesterday against the Progress for America Voter Fund, a conservative group that raised $44 million to help undermine Democrat John Kerry's 2004 presidential bid.

The fine was the latest in a series of FEC penalties imposed on high-profile independent groups that operated on both sides of the 2004 presidential elections. The FEC is trying to send a message to the "527" organizations, FEC Chairman Robert Lenhard said in a statement.

"It should now be clear to organizations that want to be active in the 2008 cycle that the activities we saw in this case are prohibited under the law," Lenhard said.

Progress for America agreed to pay the $750,000 fine as part of the deal, which did not require the group to admit wrongdoing. The group took issue with the penalty, arguing that the FEC had not clarified how the newly enacted McCain-Feingold provisions would affect 527s and had not explained what campaign-related activities 527s were allowed to perform.

FEC commissioners have said the penalties should serve as guidelines for what will and will not be permitted. In the case of Progress for America, the FEC noted that the group made clear "through its public statements, activities, and solicitations for contributions" that it should have registered as a traditional political committee.Daley Cruises to Sixth Term

Chicago Mayor Richard M. Daley (D) crushed two little-known opponents Tuesday to win a sixth term in his post, putting him on the verge of a historic achievement.

Daley received roughly 71 percent of the vote. Cook County Circuit Court Clerk Dorothy Brown (20 percent) and activist William "Dock" Walls III (9 percent) split the remaining votes.

With the win, Daley is positioned to break his father's record for consecutive years of service as mayor. Richard J. Daley held the post from 1955 until his death in 1976. Richard M. Daley was first elected in 1989.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Plans To Revisit Orangeburg Massacre (TSSC)

By Rick Brundrett

The State, March 1, 2007

The FBI might reopen an investigation into the 1968 slayings by police of three black students at S.C. State College — known as the Orangeburg Massacre — and two other civil rights-era deaths in South Carolina.

The S.C. cases are among about 100 death cases nationwide the FBI said it will re-examine in partnership with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, National Urban League and the Southern Poverty Law Center.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller on Tuesday announced the “Civil Rights-Era Cold Case Initiative” with leaders of the civil rights organizations.

Cleveland Sellers, who was among 30 people shot during the Feb. 8, 1968, incident at the S.C. State College campus, said Wednesday an investigation of the Orangeburg case is “certainly overdue.”

“The Orangeburg Massacre is, in fact, a litmus test for racial relations in South Carolina,” said Sellers, 63, now head of the African-American studies department at the University of South Carolina. “I want the incident to be thoroughly investigated and the truth to come out.”

Lonnie Randolph, president of the state NAACP conference, said his organization recommended the Orangeburg case to the FBI after polling member branches statewide.

“Our goal always is for justice to prevail, “ he said. “To kill three people — it’s hard to think justice has been served when individuals are shot in the back.”

Former Gov. Robert McNair, who has been criticized by black leaders for his handling of the incident, said Wednesday in a prepared statement that any decision by the FBI and U.S. Department of Justice to reopen their investigation is “certainly up to them.”

“Immediately after the tragedy at Orangeburg, we requested that the FBI and Department of Justice conduct a full and comprehensive investigation of all of the events surrounding this incident since we felt very strongly that the state of South Carolina could not investigate itself,” said McNair.

McNair, in a biography released last year, said he accepts responsibility for the tragedy — his strongest statement to date about the matter.

The initial FBI probe led to federal charges against eight state troopers and another police officer. They were acquitted later by a mostly white jury.

Besides that incident, the FBI said this week it also will re-examine the death of a 13-year-old Edisto Island boy whose body washed ashore in Charleston County in 1960, and the 1965 shooting death of a man in an area of Allendale County where civil rights demonstrations were held. Both victims were black.

Most of the cases referred to the FBI are from the South. Georgia, for example, has 13 cases, and North Carolina, three.

Thom O’Neill, spokesman at the FBI office in Columbia, said Wednesday the decision whether to formally reopen any of the three S.C. cases will be made by Brian Lamkin, special agent in charge of the FBI’s S.C. operations. No deadlines have been set to complete investigations, he said.

O'Neill acknowledged the cases could be difficult to investigate, depending, for example on what records exist and how easy it will be to track down witnesses. The Orangeburg case could raise constitutional questions because the charged officers were acquitted.

"That one's a little sticky," O'Neill said.

Sellers, then a young civil rights activist who was the only person sent to prison in the incident, said he's not interested in seeing new charges brought against officers involved in the shooting. Sellers was convicted of inciting a riot and served seven months in prison but received a full pardon from the state in 1993.

Instead, Sellers said, he wants state lawmakers to create a special commission to investigate the case. Previous bills aimed at doing that have died in the Legislature.

"I am hopeful that the state, through the Legislature, will step forward and raise the veil of secrecy and silence," said Sellers, whose son, Bakari Sellers, D-Bamberg, was elected to the S.C. House in November. "They (authorities) have created culprits and placed the blame for what happened on innocent victim-citizens."

Like Sellers, U.S. Rep. Jim Clyburn, D-S.C., who graduated from S.C. State in 1961, experienced firsthand what it was like to be a civil rights protester in those days.

"There was a tension hanging all over Orangeburg that went back to the 1950s," Clyburn said Wednesday. "We were protesting policies, procedures and laws that were unjust."

In 1960, Clyburn was charged with breach of the peace during a demonstration in Columbia. His conviction later was overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Shreveport Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Nine Louisianans are included in a list of 76 suspicious or criminal deaths in the 1950s and 1960s that spurred the FBI to reopen investigations into possible civil rights abuses from that turbulent time.

Bureau officials on Tuesday announced the investigations amid a Justice Department focus on cracking unsolved cases from the nation's civil rights era.

The high-priority cases, which FBI Director Robert S. Mueller described as numbering between 10 and 12, are among an estimated 100 that investigators nationwide are looking at as possible civil rights-related murders.

None of the nine Louisiana cases in the list maintained by the Alabama-based Southern Poverty Law Center occurred in the immediate Northwest Louisiana area. But several did take place in Ruston and Monroe, including one 1960 shooting rampage where four people were killed.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales acknowledged that many of the cases may be beyond the boundaries of what the federal government can legally prosecute. But they "remain on our radar," he said.

"Much time has passed on these crimes," Gonzales told reporters in Washington. "The wounds they left are deep, and still many of them have not healed. But we are committed to re-examining these cases and doing all we can to bring justice to the criminals who may have avoided punishment for so long."

Addressing civil rights violators, Gonzales said: "You have not gotten away with anything — we are still on your trail."

Officials declined to release details about which cases have been reopened, or where, but said that nearly all are located in 14 states in the South. Investigators later confirmed, for example, that the unsolved 1946 lynching of four sharecroppers on Moore's Ford Bridge near Monroe, Ga., was among those being investigated.

But they declined to comment on whether another high-profile case was being included — that of Maceo Snipes, a black World War II veteran who in 1946 was shot in the back by four white men a day after he voted for the first time. No one was ever arrested in that killing in rural Georgia, about 90 miles south of Atlanta, and there is no evidence a criminal probe in the case was ever opened.

Richard Cohen, president of the Southern Poverty Law Center, said the government's renewed focus on the cold cases could help uncover what he called "a few burning embers.

"There are a lot of stones to turn over," Cohen said. "I think it would be wrong to give families false hope, but I think it would be right to say that people still care."

Mueller said the FBI began re-examining its old case files more than a year ago amid a spate of civil rights cases that investigators and prosecutors successfully solved.

Most recently, the Justice Department brought kidnapping and conspiracy charges last month against James Ford Seale, 71, in the 1964 abductions and murders of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee in southwest Mississippi. Seale has pleaded not guilty and is due for trial in April.

Horace Harned, 86, a former Mississippi legislator and member of the segregationist Sovereignty Commission, said he'd prefer that authorities leave the past in the past and not reopen the cases, but "I don't think there's anything we can do to stop it.

"I think we shouldn't dig up too much of these things," Harned said.

He added: "We'll have to let justice prevail. I believe in the jury system. As long as the jury system is maintained properly, we should go to it and let justice prevail."

Editorial: Till Case: Time Takes Its Toll On 1955 Case (JCL)

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, March 1, 2007

The LeFlore County grand jury has decided not to issue any indictments in the 1955 slaying of Emmett Till. That may be disappointing to those who have worked to bring justice in this case. But the grand jury did its job. The tragedy is that it took so long for the case to be fully considered.

District Attorney Joyce Chiles of Greenville should be commended for reviewing the 8,000 pages of evidence and presenting it. Only time seems to have killed chances for prosecution, not lack of diligence today.

The Aug. 28, 1955, slaying of Till remains a pivotal moment in the civil rights movement. Till was killed after he reportedly whistled at a white woman, Carolyn Bryant, the last known living suspect. Her then-husband, Roy, and his half-brother, J.W. Milam, admitted they killed Till after an all-white jury had acquitted them. Both have since died.

But the case is also noteworthy, since it:

Is one of 29 killings from the civil rights era since 1989 reopened, leading to 28 arrests and 22 convictions;

Should spur a "cold case" unit of the Justice Department to investigate unsolved civil rights killings in a bill before Congress.

Justice can come still.

City, Justice Dept. Meet With NAACP (CTPOST)

By Melvin Mason

Connecticut Post, March 1, 2007

ANSONIA — For the second time in as many months, city officials and officers with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People met with staff from the U.S. Depa

Article Last Updated: 03/01/2007 12:20:57 AM EST

As was the case after a similar January meeting, attendees were vague about what was discussed with officials from the Department of Justice's Community Relations Service, designed for resolving conflicts dealing with race, color and national origin.

The two-hour meeting, held in the Erlingheuser Room at City Hall, was closed to the public and the media.

Attending Wednesday's session were Mayor Jim Della Volpe, Police Chief Kevin Hale, Corporation Counsel Kevin Blake, local NAACP President Greg Johnson, Housing Authority Executive Director Jim Finnucan, former alderwoman Ralphine Ford and Riverside Apartments tenant leader Naomi Wallace. Johnson did not elaborate on concerns brought up at the meeting; he only said that he thought the meeting offered plenty of positives.

"It was to discuss strategies and ways to improve the quality of life for all citizens of Ansonia," Johnson said. "It was a very productive meeting."

He said "a gamut of things" was discussed.

Della Volpe was brief in his post-meeting comments, saying the group "had a very good discussion and a healthy discussion of the issues."

Francesco Amoroso, the regional director of the Community Relations Service, offered no comment, saying agency officials are not permitted to comment when called in to mediate.

Johnson said the group will meet again, but he did not say when.

The city housing authority is in the middle of an 18-month plan to clear out three buildings slated for demolition, moving Riverside residents to other apartments in the complex or providing them with Section 8 vouchers to live elsewhere.

The authority has hired Mapplan Associates to create a possible new development on the Riverside site.

Housing authority officials say the existing Riverside complex is too expensive to maintain because it receives less money from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Some residents and local groups have criticized the demolition project, saying it is taking affordable housing away from people who need it.

High Court Case Tests Limits Of Student Speech Rights (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, March 1, 2007

When the Olympic torch passed through Juneau, Alaska, in 2002, high school senior Joseph Frederick thought it would be fun to get on TV. As the torch relay passed by his school, Frederick led his friends in unfurling a banner that read, "Bong Hits 4 Jesus."

It was, Frederick said later, an attempt to get attention with a nonsensical message.

Deborah Morse, the principal at Juneau-Douglas High School, saw something more. She tore down the banner and suspended Frederick for 10 days, saying that because "bong" was a reference to marijuana, the sign violated the school's anti-drug policy.

Five years later, the spat in Juneau has become a significant legal test of students' speech rights — and of how far school officials can go in limiting such rights to try to maintain order in schools. On March 19, when the U.S. Supreme Court hears arguments in Morse v. Frederick, school officials nationwide will be watching for signs of whether the justices will make it more difficult to enforce a range of campus speech regulations that have been imposed in recent years.

Such policies — many inspired by the slayings of a dozen students and a teacher by two outcasts at Colorado's Columbine High School in 1999 — have banned students from wearing clothing or posting signs that focus on drugs, guns or incendiary topics such as homosexuality, abortion and religion.

The Juneau case will be the first major dispute over student speech rights to come before the high court in nearly two decades. It requires the justices to revisit a landmark ruling from 1969, when the court decided a dispute involving three Iowa students who wore black armbands to school to protest the Vietnam War. They were suspended and went to court, saying their First Amendment speech rights had been violated.

The Supreme Court ruled for the teenagers, saying, "It can hardly be argued that either students or teachers shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate."

Since then, that view has been somewhat diluted by rulings that have allowed schools to ban "plainly offensive" speech of a sexual nature, and to have wide latitude over control of school-sponsored speech, such as articles in school newspapers. However, lower courts have not been consistent in determining what kind of messages are "plainly offensive" and what types of student speech can be punished.

The court's ruling in the current case, like the decisions in the earlier disputes, would not be likely to affect the rights of college students. In middle and high schools, where nearly all of the students are minors and administrators adopt a parent-like role, administrators have a stronger legal hand to maintain discipline and set rules for student speech.

In a court brief filed in support of Morse and the Juneau school board, attorneys for the National School Boards Association say that as schools grapple with increased violence and drug use, it's important for administrators to be able to regulate slogans dealing with particularly controversial issues.

"We are counting on this case to give us clarity," says Peggy Cowan, superintendent of the Juneau school district. "It was important (for Morse) to take the sign down. Leaving it up would have communicated that it was OK to promote the use of illegal drugs."

Frederick, who is traveling abroad, says through his attorney that school limits on student speech have gotten out of hand. Now 23, he says that "schools use 'zero tolerance' policies to cloak their abuse of authority and disregard for student rights."

Morse v. Frederick also is drawing attention from school officials because it raises another provocative question: whether a principal can be held personally liable for infringing on student speech rights.

Morse is appealing a federal appeals court's ruling that she is liable for money damages to Frederick because past rulings "clearly established" that she was not entitled to tear down the "Bong Hits" sign.

Principals should be shielded from such financial responsibility, Morse's attorney, Kenneth Starr, argues in court papers. Starr — known to many Americans as the independent prosecutor whose investigation led to the impeachment of President Clinton — calls the appeals court's decision "deeply alarming to school administrators across the country."

Students score court victories

David Hudson, a lawyer at the First Amendment Center at Vanderbilt University in Nashville, says the legal landscape for student speech has changed significantly since the armband case in 1969.

He says some judges have been particularly influenced by Columbine and have cited it "explicitly in their opinions" supporting school officials, while others have more broadly interpreted student rights under the 1969 ruling.

In recent years, students who claimed their speech rights were violated by school policies have won some court decisions. Among them:

·In Vermont, middle school student Zachary Guiles was suspended in 2003 for wearing a T-shirt to school that derided President Bush as the "Chicken-Hawk-In-Chief." Guiles, now a junior at the Interlochen arts boarding school in Michigan, says he wore the shirt to school because he wanted his classmates to question the Iraq war.

After he was suspended, Guiles — with help from the Vermont chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union — took the school system to court. A trial court agreed with school officials, saying the T-shirt — which portrayed Bush as a chicken with a martini in one wing and a cocaine straw in the other — was "plainly offensive" under the Supreme Court's standards.

Guiles took the case to an appeals court, which said that "without question," the shirt "uses harsh rhetoric and imagery to express disagreement with the president's policies and to impugn his character." However, the appeals court said, "because Guiles' T-shirt did not cause any disruption, censorship was unwarranted."

Guiles says that when he wore the shirt, "there wasn't much of a backlash at the school. The kids weren't really pro-Bush as much as they were apathetic."

After being confronted by the vice principal, Alan turned the shirt inside out. Later, with the help of NRA lawyers, Newsom and his family successfully sued to change the school's dress code, which had prohibited "messages on clothing, jewelry and personal belongings that relate to … weapons."

Newsom claimed the policy was discriminatory and violated his First Amendment rights. The case was dismissed by a trial court, but a U.S. appeals court sided with Newsom, saying the policy was too vaguely worded and could include clothing with slogans that were not disruptive in schools.

Going to court "was a difficult thing for the family," Fred Newsom says. "But if you can't stand up for the Constitution, what can you stand up for?"

When the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit ruled in favor of Frederick last year in the Juneau case, it cited the Newsom decision, among others. It said that "our sister circuits have similarly held that student speech that is neither plainly offensive nor school-sponsored can be prohibited only where the school district demonstrated a risk of substantial disruption."

Frederick says the words on his "Bong Hits" sign were merely nonsense, meant to attract TV cameras. In siding with him, the appeals court said that even if the message was pro-drugs, officials should not have censored such "non-disruptive" speech.

A complicating factor in the case — one that has made judges sympathetic to Frederick's case to this point — is that the incident occurred across the street from Juneau-Douglas High School, rather than on its grounds.

School officials say that shouldn't matter because the torch parade, a prelude to the Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City, was co-sponsored by the school. They note that the school's pep band played as the torch passed, its cheerleaders were in uniform to cheer the parade, and teachers supervised the event.

Morse says in court papers that if she had not taken down the banner, it would have amounted to the school district approving of its message. That, she says, would have been "inconsistent with the district's responsibility to teach students the boundaries of socially appropriate behavior."

Questions of defiance

Frederick says his actions were about free speech. "I was just trying to assert my right," he says through his attorney, Douglas Mertz. Mertz says that in an earlier incident at the school, an assistant principal threatened to suspend Frederick because he did not stand during the Pledge of Allegiance.

Superintendent Cowan says the school has no record of such an incident. Starr's brief on behalf of the school system says that a school official had observed that Frederick had "a history of defiant behavior."

In his court filing, Mertz tells the justices, "There is no dispute that schools have an important message to deliver regarding the perils of drug abuse. But the First Amendment recognizes a critical distinction between delivering that message to students and imposing an enforced orthodoxy that tramples on free speech."

Mertz says that in displaying the sign, Frederick was not trying to promote illegal behavior. The attorney also notes that in Alaska and elsewhere, marijuana laws have been a subject of political debate.

Starr counters that the appeals court that ruled in Frederick's favor substituted "its own unforgivingly libertarian world view" for school officials' efforts to "encourage a drug-free student lifestyle." Starr says Frederick's message was far beyond what the Supreme Court sought to protect in the 1969 ruling.

Cowan says the district encourages students to speak out on controversial issues. "We do not restrict serious speech," Cowan says. She called Frederick's sign "nonsensical promotion of drugs," rather than part of a serious discussion or debate.

"Up to this point, we thought that a principal enforcing an anti-drug policy was safe to do so," she says. "Now school administrators are walking on eggshells."

'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' Repeal Eyed (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

Democratic Rep. Martin T. Meehan yesterday said he will introduce legislation repealing the military's "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" policy that allows homosexuals to serve in the armed forces.

Mr. Meehan said public opinion has changed since the policy began 14 years ago under the Clinton administration, and that allowing homosexuals to openly serve will help the military retain specialized members, including linguists fluent in Arabic.

A 2005 Government Accountability Office report says more than 10,000 members of the armed services, including 750 service members with specialties "critical" to the war on terror, have been discharged since the policy was implemented.

"It will still be an uphill climb," said Mr. Meehan of Massachusetts. "But the November election can only mean good things for my bill."

The bill, "Military Readiness Enhancement Act," has 109 co-sponsors, including three Republicans. Nonetheless, it faces opposition from many lawmakers, including House Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton, Missouri Democrat.

"It's not going anywhere," said Elaine Donnelly, president of the Center for Military Readiness, a group that opposes allowing homosexuals to serve in the military.

"Even the Democrats I've talked to don't want to touch this bill. It's very straight-forward, people who are homosexual are not compatible with the military's standards of service."

During the 1992 presidential campaign, Bill Clinton promised to change military policy by allowing homosexuals to openly serve. However, he reversed course after facing strong bipartisan opposition.

The policy says: "Sexual orientation will not be a bar to service unless manifested by homosexual conduct. The military will discharge members who engage in homosexual conduct. ..."

Tony Snow, White House spokesman, said the President Bush supports the military policy.

"We will see what happens if Congress comes up with something," Mr. Snow said.

Marine Staff Sgt. Eric Alva, the first solider injured during the Iraq war, joined Mr. Meehan during his Capitol Hill press conference yesterday and announced he is homosexual. He said he is leaving the Marines after 13 years to work for the Human Rights Campaign, a lobbying organization that supports gay rights.

"I'm an American who fought for his country and for the rights of all Americans, not just some of them," Sgt. Alva said.

Public and military opposition to homosexuals openly serving in the military has decreased in recent years.

A December 2006 Zogby International poll found that 73 percent of military service members were "comfortable" serving with homosexuals.

"I hope we get beyond this foolish policy, and one that I think is cruel," said Rep. Christopher Shays, one of the three House Republicans who has co-sponsored Mr. Meehan's bill.

"The military isn't saying gays can't serve, they're saying they can't tell," he said. "So, military commanders know there are gays in the military."

Same Town, Different Communities (WP)

By Lonnae O'neal Parker

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Ask older residents of historic North Brentwood their recollections of the town, and they go into a reverie about kids playing house-to-house and about how the town was self-contained with businesses and shops. Mostly, it was black, and the generations who had lived there gave the place its essence.

But "change comes," said Eleanor Traynham, 71, who was born and raised in the town, in Prince George's County, and returned in 1992. And "you have to be able to adapt to change."

On a late afternoon, children run across the lawns of modest three-bedroom homes, young mothers carry groceries, and fathers in coveralls arrive home from work. These families are Latino. A few yards away, much older residents are checking mail or working on their cars or greeting each other with late-day banter. They are black.

In a town changing without overt rancor, they are neighbors without the neighborliness, separate groups leading lives that don't touch, even though their property lines do. It's a new challenge for this historic place -- re-creating community.

It's a challenge that plays out against a backdrop of seismic demographic shifts. In 2003, Latinos overtook African Americans as the nation's most populous minority. Fueled by a boom in construction and low-wage service jobs, the Washington region had the ninth-largest Latino population gain in the country from 2000 to 2004.

In Prince George's, most of the Latino population, which doubled from 1990 to 2000, is concentrated inside the Beltway in the northwestern part of the county. As more Latinos graduate to homeownership, the relative affordability of housing in communities there has accelerated the pace of change.

In North Brentwood, population nearly 500, off Rhode Island Avenue just outside the District line, these shifts play out door-to-door. Since 2000, the historically black town has become 25 percent Hispanic.

Some black residents are concerned about what these changes mean for their community, even as they worry about seeming intolerant. Newer Hispanic residents say they get along with everyone, and if there is subtle awkwardness to their brief hello-goodbye exchanges with black neighbors, they're too busy working and raising their families to notice.

Originally settled by black Civil War troops, North Brentwood became the first incorporated black town in Prince George's -- and one of the first in the state -- in 1924, a thriving hamlet of single-family homes and businesses.

It had a tavern with a dance floor where such stars as Pearl Bailey performed. In 2003, the town was put on the National Register of Historic Places. Today, along leafy streets, small cottages border towering home construction and wide new additions.

One recent late afternoon, Santos Benitez, 27, a construction worker, was caring for his four children, ranging from 3 months to 10 years old, while his wife worked. The Salvadoran immigrant moved from a house in Northeast Washington two months ago. "This house is a lot bigger," said Diego Benitez, 10, who was skating in the driveway with his brothers Jonathan, 6, and Brian, 7. Santos Benitez said his neighbors didn't talk much, except when one came over to complain about his dog.

Hiawatha Crank, 55, a plumber and diesel mechanic originally from South Carolina who moved to North Brentwood in 1980, said the community feel reminded him of home. He noticed the first Latino family five years ago. "Man, it seemed like after that happened, the sky broke loose, and they came from everywhere," he said.

His Latino neighbors seem all right and don't bother his family, he said. Still, he said that a spike in the price of homes, which now sell from $200,000 to $400,000, is putting Brentwood out of reach for many working-class blacks. Crank attributes the price spike to the Latino influx, even though property values across the county have risen sharply in the past five years.

He pointed out single-family homes he said housed multiple Latino families. Recent data for the number of residents per household were not available for North Brentwood. Nationally in 2005, Hispanics composed about 11 percent of U.S. households but made up more than 50 percent of households deemed crowded (more than one person per room), according to the Census Bureau's American Housing Survey.

Nearby, Crank's buddy Charles Cuffie, 62, a retired bus driver, voiced a commonly held suspicion among black residents that Latinos sometimes pretend not to speak English to avoid conversation.

"Things change," said Crank's daughter, Tammi Crank, 20, a security officer with the federal Department of Homeland Security. "I just never thought it would happen in my neighborhood."

The influx is driven by housing prices that are cheaper than in Fairfax and Montgomery counties and real estate agents who steer Latinos into certain neighborhoods, said Audrey Singer, an immigration fellow at the Brookings Institution.

Decades ago, the county was roiled as it shifted from majority-white to majority-black. Peter Shapiro, a former Town Council member and County Council chairman, who is white, has seen friction between blacks and Latinos in other Prince George's neighborhoods. Perhaps because of its strong sense of identity, Shapiro said, North Brentwood seems determined not to repeat those mistakes.

Lillian K. Beverly, 77, who has lived in North Brentwood most of her life and been mayor since 1995, said she had fielded complaints about Latino residents parking on lawns or growing corn in their front yards -- relatively small problems that have been fixed. She knows that some residents feel wistful for bygone days but asked, "How can we as black folks always complain about being discriminated against if we're going to do the same?" She said the North Brentwood Memorial Garden and the planned Prince George's African American Museum and Cultural Center in North Brentwood will ensure that their legacy survives, even if their numbers continue to dwindle.

William A. Campos (D-Hyattsville), 32, who moved with his family from El Salvador to Hyattsville when he was 9 and represents North Brentwood on the County Council, said: "We're still learning one another in this area. It will take some time."

Campos said Latino residents don't always recognize that parking on the grass doesn't play well with neighbors. "The norm in a residential area here is not the norm for what we were doing back home," he said.

He said the notion of Latinos feigning ignorance of English was often a misunderstanding. Newcomers often pick up only a few words at a time, Campos said. "Why would you purposely not speak or want to understand the world that you live in? Sometimes you don't have that ability," he said.

Campos agreed that Latinos often pool resources. "It becomes very natural to help each other sustain the house and at the same time be with the family," he said. It's an arrangement that he said some African Americans have told him they recognize from their own family histories.

Traynham, the North Brentwood resident, who is black, concurred. "Basically they are only doing the same thing African Americans did years ago. When African Americans migrated from the South, they always had a place where family members could come and stay," she said.

ValentÃ-n PeÃ±a, originally from El Salvador, said, speaking in Spanish, that blacks often wave, but neither group ever starts a conversation.

PeÃ±a said he understood that black residents might feel threatened, but his nephew, who wouldn't give his name, disagreed, in English. "I listen to Martin [Luther King]; he had a dream."

When Ever Diaz opened his auto repair shop in 1990, he spoke English, introduced himself to residents and attended community functions. It's a model for other newcomers, he said. "I didn't quit, and I didn't get angry," he said.

On a cold afternoon, Diaz introduced himself to Ramondo Lara, 38, a maintenance engineer who is married with two young sons and moved to North Brentwood three years ago. "Everybody says, 'Hi. How are you? I am fine,' " Lara said in halting English. Lara and Diaz joked that they should open a Salvadoran embassy. People have to get used to Latinos being here, Diaz said.

"Like everyone else, they are just looking to move up," he said.

Staff researchers Magda Jean-Louis and Meg Smith and El Tiempo Latino reporter Luz Lazo contributed to this report.

Slavery Is Not Dead. It's Not Even Past. (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

The Rev. Al Sharpton seemed subdued, quiet, reflective — which was unusual.

Just when we thought the news couldn't get any weirder, we learned this week, via The Daily News, that Mr. Sharpton's great-grandfather was a slave who was owned by relatives of Senator Strom Thurmond, the longtime archsegregationist who ran for president as a Dixiecrat in 1948.

"There's not enough troops in the Army," Mr. Thurmond told a screaming crowd during that campaign, "to force the Southern people to break down segregation and admit the nigra race into our theaters, into our swimming pools, into our schools and into our homes."

Mr. Sharpton seemed a little shaken by the revelation. "You're always kind of thinking that your ancestors were slaves," he said. "But this was my grandfather's father. I knew my grandfather. It's eerie when it becomes so personal."

The days of slavery are closer than we tend to think, and they were crueler than we tend to realize. Mr. Sharpton's great-grandfather, Coleman Sharpton, was sent with his wife and two children from South Carolina to Florida so a woman named Julia Thurmond Sharpton could send them out as laborers to pay off debts left by her late husband.

"They were sent there solely for that reason," Mr. Sharpton said. "To make money to pay her debt. It was just so clear that they were nothing but property. The complete dehumanization — I don't think I fully understood it until this hit home."

There's a great deal that Americans don't fully understand about slavery. It's such an uncomfortable subject that the temptation is to relegate it to the distant past and move on. But the long tentacles of that evil institution are still with us. Slavery was the foundation of the thriving consumer society that we have today and the wellspring of the racism that still poisons so many white attitudes and black lives.

The sheer size of the phenomenon of slavery, which was woven into the very being of the early Americas, is not well known today. The historian David Brion Davis, in his book "Inhuman Bondage," tells us:

"By 1820 nearly 8.7 million slaves had departed from Africa for the New World, as opposed to only 2.6 million whites, many of them convicts or indentured servants, who had left Europe. Thus by 1820 African slaves constituted almost 77 percent of the enormous population that had sailed toward the Americas, and from 1760 to 1820 this emigrating flow included 5.6 African slaves for every European."

For most of the time between the Revolutionary War and the Civil War, the United States was governed by presidents who owned slaves.

One of the points Mr. Davis stressed was that the commodities produced in such tremendous volume by slaves — sugar, tobacco, coffee, chocolate, cotton — were crucial to the formation of the world's first global mass market.

"From the very beginnings," wrote Mr. Davis, "America was part black, and indebted to the appalling sacrifices of millions of individual blacks who cleared the forests and tilled the soil. Yet even the ardent opponents of slaveholding could seldom if ever acknowledge this basic fact."

Instead of reaping rewards for this seminal role in the creation of a rich and powerful nation, blacks have been relentlessly vilified by a profoundly racist society and frozen out of most of the nation's bounty. Consigned to the bottom of the caste heap after emancipation, and denied some of the most basic human rights, blacks became the convenient depository of whatever blame and negative stereotypes whites chose to cast their way.

The abject state ruthlessly imposed upon blacks for so long became, perversely, proof of their inferiority. Blacks gave whites of all classes someone to look down upon.

Slavery, like the past, as Faulkner reminded us, is not dead. It's not even past. It's not something that you can wish away.

The other night Reverend Sharpton flew into Miami to attend a conference. At the airport someone asked for his autograph.

"It was the first time in my life that I thought about why my name is Sharpton," he said. "I mean this whole thing is as personal as why your name is what it is. You're named after someone who owned your great-grandparents."

My Link To Strom Thurmond (LAT)

By Al Sharpton Jr.

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

LAST WEEK, I received the shock of my life. I found out that my family was enslaved by the family of the leading segregationist of our time, the late Sen. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina. I don't know whether Thurmond himself was my blood relative; there has been no DNA testing yet. What I do know now is the horrific details of how my great-grandfather and family were slaves, directly owned and leased out like chattel animals. This revelation about my ancestors has made slavery real to me. It is no longer an abstract horror. It is my family history — and the Thurmonds'.

Sen. Thurmond's hatred for blacks was so strong that, in 1948, he walked out of the Democratic National Convention and ran for president on a segregationist ticket. Words cannot fully describe the feelings I had when I learned the awful truth. Not only am I the descendant of slaves, but my family had to endure the particular agony of being slaves to the Thurmonds, the symbol of everything about America that I have fought to change. I felt humiliated and prideful; reflective and angry; oppressed and uplifted. I thought about what it must have been like to be a slave, and then what my great-grandfather would have thought about me and about my strengths, my weaknesses. Am I doing enough in my life to make him proud? It also made me reach out to my father, someone I have not really spoken to often because he left my family when I was just 10 years old.

My great-grandfather, Coleman Sharpton Sr., and his family were owned by a white woman named Julia Ann Thurmond shortly before the Civil War. They lived in, of all places, Liberty, Fla. Before that, they were the property of the white slave owner Alexander Sharpton of South Carolina. Sharpton's son, Jefferson, had married Miss Thurmond, and died in debt, so Sharpton sent my great-grandfather, Coleman Sharpton, and his family to Liberty in 1861 to work off the debts. Julia Thurmond Sharpton inherited my great-grandfather. Julia Thurmond's grandfather was also Strom Thurmond's great-grandfather.

When Coleman Sharpton finally shook off the chains of slavery, he became a turpentine dipper — work so awful that, when you finished a day's work, you had to wash yourself in gasoline to get the stickiness off your body. But the grim reality of my ancestry, and the ancestry of millions of African Americans, is that I am sure even the torturous job of turpentine dipping gave my great-grandfather joy because he was finally free and recognized as a man, no longer the property of someone else.

Every day from now on, when I write my name, I will think about how I got that name. I will think about how Al Sharpton, the white slave owner, sent my family to Strom Thurmond's relatives to work off Thurmond debts. America's shame is that I am the heir of those who were property to the Thurmond family.

In the end, it is irrelevant whether Strom Thurmond and I are related by blood. Of course, so many African Americans have had to deal with the knowledge that they are the relatives of the whites who enslaved them. Still, I want to know the truth.

Obviously, the temptation here is to fall into the caldron of anger that swirls when you visualize your flesh and blood, most assuredly proud and strong, waking up every day enslaved. You have to hope they realized that they suffered so that one day their descendants could live the life that was stolen from them.

But rage will do no good for Coleman Sharpton's descendants or the Thurmond descendants. My family and the Thurmond family must rise above the ugly, shameful past that binds us, just as America must come out of denial and seek to repair the damage that slavery has done and to eliminate the bigotry that still lingers.

The news of my own past was brought to me unsolicited. But I hope all African Americans will seek their family history so we can dignify the memories of our forefathers and change the America of the future. And, if we can take that step, certainly all Americans, black and white, can join us.

ANTITRUST:

Sirius CEO Vows Postmerger Price Cuts (WSJ)

By Corey Boles

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sirius Satellite Radio Inc.'s chief executive, Mel Karmazin, told lawmakers the company would cut consumer prices if federal authorities approve its merger with XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc.

Mr. Karmazin tried to allay concerns that subscribers' costs would rise after the $11.4 billion merger of the two struggling satellite-radio operators, telling the House Judiciary Committee's antitrust task force the merger would lead to a decline in prices. For basic monthly service, subscribers to both radio operations pay $12.95 a month. "The idea of raising prices to compete with free radio is bizarre and doesn't work," he said. "We are committed to not raising prices and, in fact, are committed to lowering prices."

Rep. John Conyers (D., Mich.), chairman of both the Judiciary Committee and the task force, was skeptical. "We don't have too good a record of satellite companies keeping their promises," Mr. Conyers said. "'Trust me' isn't going to work here, not just today, but in the longer-term examinations you will be going through."

Democratic Rep. Rick Boucher of Virginia said the merger should get a green light as long as the companies agree to a series of conditions and to freeze prices.

The conditions he suggested were outlined by Gigi Sohn, president of Public Knowledge, a public-interest group with a focus on communications. In her testimony before the task force, Ms. Sohn said the companies would have to allow consumers to subscribe on a channel-by-channel basis or tiered programming. She added they should agree to make 5% of capacity available to noncommercial, educational purposes and freeze prices for three years once the merger is approved.

"I would think that if those conditions are reached, the merger should be allowed to proceed," said Mr. Boucher, who sits on both the antitrust task force and the Commerce Committee's telecommunications panel.

Mr. Karmazin ruled out channel-by-channel subscriptions, saying the companies' technology wouldn't allow it, and said he would be reluctant to offer tiers of channels at reduced rates, as it would likely mean a "loss of revenue." Nor would he be pinned down on how long a merged company would cut or freeze rates. He suggested the maximum would be four years.

In response to questioning from the ranking Republican member of the task force, Rep. Steve Chabot of Ohio, Mr. Karmazin said Sirius and XM weren't making a "failing company argument" and said the merger between the two companies wasn't necessary. He emphasized that it would be in the best interests of consumers for the merger to be allowed.

Skeptics Question XM-Sirius Merger Plan (WP)

By Charles Babington, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

The nation's two satellite-radio companies promised yesterday to refrain from raising prices, for a time at least, if they are allowed to merge. But some lawmakers and consumer groups appeared dubious.

Mel Karmazin, chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, told the House Judiciary Committee's antitrust task force that consumers would benefit if the government allowed his company to merge with rival XM Satellite Radio Holdings. "We are committed to not raising prices, and we are committed to lowering prices," said Karmazin, who would be chief executive of the new company.

The panel's chairman, Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), responded: "How do we enforce promises? . . . 'Trust me' isn't going to work here."

Karmazin said Sirius and XM might accept conditions if the Federal Communications Commission and Justice Department were to approve the merger. But he declined to say how long they might agree to cap subscription prices, now set at $12.95 a month by both companies. XM and Sirius have said a merged company would offer various levels of content, presumably at varying prices, but they have declined to provide details.

Owners of free, over-the-air radio stations strongly oppose the merger, and the president of their association sharply challenged Karmazin at the hearing. The government cannot trust XM's and Sirius's promises, "given their long track record of breaking FCC rules," including causing signal interference with local radio stations, said David K. Rehr, president of the National Association of Broadcasters.

By Paul Davidson
USA Today, March 1, 2007

To win approval of their blockbuster merger, the nation's two satellite radio companies would accept government-mandated conditions guaranteeing consumers lower prices and more channels, the head of Sirius Satellite Radio told lawmakers Wednesday.

"We will give people more choice than they had before and lower prices and less confusion," Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin told the House Judiciary Committee's new antitrust task force.

The hearing served up the first public airing of the proposed link-up between Sirius and XM Satellite Radio since it was announced last week. Wednesday's debate underscored the complexities of the merger, with divisions within the ranks of public-interest advocates and each political party on whether consumers would be helped or hurt.

Critics such as the National Association of Broadcasters say the merger, which requires approval from the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission, would forge a monopoly satellite radio provider that would raise prices and limit choice. Karmazin says that would never happen because satellite radio competes with traditional radio, Internet radio, iPods, music on cellphones and digital radio.

Noting that there are some 10 million subscribers to both services, Karmazin said, "Why would people who don't subscribe at $12.95 subscribe at $14.95?"

The companies, which each charge about $13 a month for more than 100 channels, have lost billions of dollars between them while competing to sign up high-priced talent such as Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey. By combining, Karmazin said, customers could get both Major League Baseball and the NFL, for instance, on the same radio service. And the new giant could use cost savings to cut prices.

Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., committee chairman, was skeptical. " 'Trust me' isn't going to work here."

"I'm prepared to work with Congress, work with regulators to do what you need to do to have something beyond 'Trust me,' " Karmazin said.

He would not commit to a term for any conditions, except to say "between two weeks and four years."

Consumer advocates were split. Mark Cooper of the Consumer Federation of America argued that traditional radio, the Internet and other services don't compete directly with satellite radio, which is nationwide and ad-free. Any conditions would be "short-term," he said. "Competition is the consumer's best friend."

But Gigi Sohn of Public Knowledge said that by scrapping duplicate channels, a merged company could air more niche channels, though she called for strict conditions.

Some typically merger-wary Democrats supported the deal while some Republicans were skeptical. " Stop throwing around the word 'monopoly,' " said Rep. Anthony Weiner, D-N.Y. "The competition they have is with radio stations charging zero dollars for the same or a similar product."

Radio Merger Gets Hill Scrutiny (WT)

By Kara Rowland, The Washington Times
The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

Federal lawmakers, kicking off their probe of the proposed $13 billion merger of rivals XM Satellite Radio Inc. and Sirius Satellite Radio Inc., yesterday quizzed both Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin and one of the deal's most vocal opponents.

"We've come to this hearing with an open mind, but we also recognize that the companies have the obligation to convince Congress, regulators and most importantly, the American people that this combination will improve the competitive playing field and benefit consumers," said House Judiciary Chairman John Conyers Jr., Michigan Democrat.

The proposed XM-Sirius marriage faces regulatory scrutiny from both the Justice Department and the Federal Communications Commission. Yesterday's hearing was held before a new Judiciary Committee Antitrust Task Force established earlier this week to look at the deal and other antitrust issues.

Mr. Karmazin made the case for merging the two companies, arguing that times have changed since the competitors received their licenses from the FCC in 1997.

"Consumers will get more choice, lower prices and the ability to have less confusion and more content," he said.

Mr. Karmazin said a combined entity would be open to government-imposed conditions, including an agreement not to raise subscription prices for a certain period of time.

"If in order to get the deal done we have to make a concession, we're prepared to make a concession," he said.

But David Rehr, president of the National Association of Broadcasters and an outspoken critic of the deal, said the merger would create a "government-sanctioned monopoly."

DOJ_NMG_0138549

"Two companies that have a pattern and practice of violating their FCC licenses cannot be trusted with monopoly power," said Mr. Rehr, whose organization represents traditional AM/FM radio stations.

The hearing, like the regulatory reviews to come, largely turned on which services compete with District-based XM and Sirius of New York.

Supporters of the deal define the market widely to include traditional terrestrial radio, IPods, high-definition radio, Internet radio and cell phones that stream music.

Opponents say satellite radio is unique, and that the two companies price their services based on competition with each other.

"Right now, we don't have all the facts necessary to determine the legality of the merger," said antitrust analyst Charles Biggio, the only person to testify who did not take a position on the deal.

"My recommendation is that no firm conclusions be formed about this merger until the agencies have done their review."

Most members of the antitrust panel said they were approaching the merger with an open mind. However, proponents of the deal found allies in Rep. Rick Boucher, Virginia Democrat, who supports its approval, and Rep. Anthony Weiner, New York Democrat, who said to describe the merger as giving rise to a monopoly has "no foundation in the realities of the world today."

"Sometimes mergers serve to help an industry and help choice move forward," Mr. Weiner said.

The hearing also featured testimony from the Consumer Federation of America, which opposes the deal, and the digital rights group Public Knowledge, which supports it with conditions.

The XM-Sirius deal will be the subject of a congressional hearing next week before the House Energy and Commerce telecommunications and the Internet subcommittee.

The companies, which announced their deal last week, expect it to be approved by the end of the year.

Sirius CEO Argues For Radio Merger (LAT)

By Jim Puzzanghera, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Despite vowing not to raise their prices, the nation's only two satellite radio providers found their proposed merger to be a tough sell Wednesday on Capitol Hill.

"You've got some high hurdles to overcome, don't you think?" House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) told Mel Karmazin, chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio Inc.

Karmazin, who would run the new company if federal regulators approve Sirius' proposed merger with XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc., tried to overcome those hurdles by promising not to hike for an unspecified period the $12.95 monthly subscription rate that both companies charge.

The reason for the concession is simple, Karmazin said, and is the heart of the case Sirius and XM are trying to make: They now compete with a host of technologies that don't charge a cent — including broadcast radio, iPods and music that streams over the Internet.

"The idea of raising prices to compete with free is bizarre," Karmazin said. But he didn't say how long prices would remain unchanged.

Price is a major concern for several members of the committee's antitrust task force. Congress doesn't have to approve the deal, but its views could influence officials at the Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission, which must bless the merger.

"Why would we eliminate one of the two competitors here?" said Rep. Robert W. Goodlatte (R-Va.). "I believe prices are going up if you are the only one."

"Competition is the consumer's best friend," Cooper told the committee, warning that "a tsunami of mergers will ripple through the digital space" if regulators agree to the market definition urged by Sirius and XM.

Conyers also questioned what effect the potential deal might have on future mergers.

But some lawmakers agreed with Karmazin that the marketplace had changed and indicated they would support the merger with certain conditions, such as requiring a lower-priced option for a limited number of channels.

"Music is music, and it really doesn't matter much the source of it," said Rep. Rick Boucher (D-Va.)

Karmazin said the merger would give listeners more choices because they would have access to both systems' exclusive programs, such as National Football League and Major League Baseball broadcasts, and current subscribers would not have to purchase new radios.

But David Rehr, chief executive and president of the National Assn. of Broadcasters, told the committee the deal would create a "government-sanctioned monopoly" and also would violate an FCC rule prohibiting a merger, instituted in 1997 to promote competition.

The FCC can change the rule, though Chairman Kevin J. Martin said last week that Sirius and XM faced a "high" hurdle.

Sirius Chief Talks Of Ways To Get XM Deal Approved (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — Facing skeptical lawmakers, Mel Karmazin, the architect of a proposed merger of the nation's two satellite radio companies, announced at a hearing in Congress on Wednesday that the companies would agree to government-imposed price controls and other unspecified measures to gain regulatory approval for the deal.

Appearing before an antitrust task force of the House Judiciary Committee, Mr. Karmazin, the chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, repeatedly and angrily contested charges by opponents, including the major trade group for broadcasters, that merging his company with XM Satellite Radio Holdings would simply transform a duopoly into a monopoly.

"There is no monopoly or duopoly," he said. "That's the most bizarre thing I have ever heard."

He maintained that the relevant market for the services offered by the two satellite radio companies includes all terrestrial broadcasters, Internet radio and other popular listening devices, including iPods and other portable music players.

With so much competition from other sources, he said, satellite radio lacks the sway of a dominant industry power.

But as he tried to sell the proposed deal to Washington, he also acknowledged the major challenges he faced in persuading policy makers that it would not be anticompetitive. He made it clear that he was willing to embark on the same kind of deal- making with the regulators that has been a hallmark of his career as a broadcast executive.

"We're prepared to make concessions, and we're willing to work with the F.C.C. on doing it," he said, speaking about the discussions the two companies will have with regulators at the Justice Department's antitrust division and the Federal Communications Commission.

When a Republican lawmaker, Representative Ric Keller of Florida, pressed Mr. Karmazin over whether the company would agree to price controls, Mr. Karmazin said yes, adding, "We believe we need to show you this is in the public interest and price is important."

"We should be held accountable for everything we say," he told another Republican lawmaker, Representative J. Randy Forbes of Virginia, in response to a question about how to enforce the commitments Mr. Karmazin was making for more programming and better services at lower prices.

"I'll leave it to the regulators," he added. "This isn't about 'Trust me.' We should be able to be accountable."

But toward the end of the hearing, when a Democratic lawmaker, Representative Sheila Jackson-Lee of Texas, complained that there was too much concentration in the broadcasting industry and a lack of adequate diversity in both programming and ownership, Mr. Karmazin appeared to hedge about making any further commitments.

"I don't want to make promises to suggest I'll do anything to get the merger done," he said. "You can be damned if you do, and damned if you don't."

The specific commitments that Mr. Karmazin sought to make did not assuage some of the proposed merger's more vociferous critics.

Representative F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., the Wisconsin Republican who until this year had headed the Judiciary Committee, said Mr. Karmazin's proposal reminded him of "an old regulated gas company" or some other highly regulated utility with rates set by the government.

"I don't think that's the policy we want to promote," Mr. Sensenbrenner said.

"What you said is so far from the truth," Mr. Karmazin replied.

"But you are a monopoly," Mr. Sensenbrenner said.

The generally hostile reception to Mr. Karmazin reflected the fact that the political forces all seem to be leaning in one direction regarding the proposed merger. A powerful alliance of broadcasters and consumer groups has challenged the deal as a violation of antitrust laws and contrary to the "public interest" standards applied by regulators when they consider whether to approve radio mergers.

The National Association of Broadcasters, with powerful members in every Congressional district, has waged a political and public relations campaign attacking the deal.

By contrast, the two satellite networks have no significant industry allies on their side. They were warmly embraced at the hearing by only one Democratic lawmaker, Representative Anthony Weiner of New York.

Sirius and XM point to the opposition from broadcasters as proof that the deal would make satellite radio still more competitive with the rest of the radio industry.

The unanswered question after the hearing is what resonance the Congressional reaction would have with lawyers at the Justice Department and policy makers at the F.C.C.

Government officials are not expected to reach their conclusions about the deal for many months, although Kevin J. Martin, the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, has expressed skepticism. A commission rule forbidding the merger of the satellite companies would have to be waived for the deal to be completed.

At the Justice Department, XM and Sirius have more reason to be optimistic, in large part because the Bush administration has been more permissive on antitrust issues than any administration in modern times.

The consumer groups and broadcasters — political opponents on other issues — have struck a fragile alliance as they have gone about challenging the satellite radio deal.

On Wednesday, one consumer group, Public Knowledge, called for the regulators to heavily condition the deal with price controls and free airwaves for alternative voices before approving it.

The group also said that broadcasters opposing the deal on antitrust grounds were hypocritical because they were simultaneously trying to ease rules that have prevented more consolidation in their industry.

XM Merger Won't Hurt Consumers, Sirius Says (DOWJ)

Dow Jones Newswires, March 1, 2007

Deal would be monopoly sanctioned by the state, opposition group says

A merger between Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. wouldn't lead to less choice or higher costs for listeners, the chief executive of Sirius told Congress yesterday.

In his written testimony submitted to the Antitrust Task Force, a body made up of House Judiciary Committee members, Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin pledged that consumers would not lose out as a result of the $13 billion merger.

"We operate in an intensely competitive environment that will continue to intensify post-merger — and continue to provide an inherent check on programming as well as pricing," said Karmazin's statement.

In his opening remarks, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and the head of the task force, said that though he is approaching the matter with an open mind, the burden of proof lies with the companies to convince Congress of the merits of the deal.

He said that the "critical threshold" is whether the market that the two satellite companies compete in is "all forms of digital and retail music and radio, or simply satellite radio."

Conyers' statement went on to say that from one perspective, the merger "can be said to turn a duopoly into a monopoly."

When satellite radio was licensed 19 years ago, Sirius and XM were granted the only two licenses. In exchange, Federal Communications Commission rules stated that the two wouldn't be allowed to merge in the future.

Sirius and XM have argued that in the ensuing 10 years, the market has changed substantially and they are no longer just competing against each other.

The Department of Justice's antitrust task force would have to approve the merger and FCC rules would have to be changed to allow the deal before it could get final approval.

Karmazin was appearing before the first hearing of the task force with David Rehr, the chief executive of the National Association of Broadcasters, and representatives of consumer groups.

The NAB, which represents mainly smaller radio and television broadcasters across the U.S., fiercely opposes the deal.

"The proposed merger must be rejected," said Rehr in his opening statement. "Public policy should never allow one entity to acquire state-sanctioned, monopoly control over the 25 megahertz of spectrum allocated to satellite-radio service."

In her opening statement, she said that the merger should be given the green light only if it meets three conditions.

It must make available pricing choices such as channel-by-channel subscriptions or tiered programming; it must hand over 5 percent of its capacity to noncommercial educational programming; and it should agree to not raise prices for three years after the merger is granted approval.

House Panel Grills Sirius Chief On XM Merger (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, March 1, 2007

Politicians say they want to keep an open mind but indicate the deal may have high hurdles to leap.

DOJ_NMG_0138552

WASHINGTON--Sirius Satellite Radio CEO Mel Karmazin on Wednesday defended the proposed union of his company with XM Satellite Radio before a panel of politicians with varying degrees of concern about the deal's potential impact on consumers.

Appearing at the first hearing convened here by the House Judiciary Committee Antitrust Task Force, Karmazin said a combination of the sole two satellite radio players would lower, or at least cap, its prices and provide more programming choices.

For example, one network carries Major League Baseball games, and the other carries the National Football League games, but neither carries both. Sports fans would no longer have to pay to subscribe to both services or buy two different radio receivers if the entities merged, he said. Karmazin also pledged that existing radio receivers for each service would continue to work after the melding of the companies.

"We are absolutely convinced that this merger is going to be in the consumer's best interest," said the Sirius chief and former Viacom president.

Attitudes toward the proposed deal, worth about $13 billion, did not appear to be split along party lines among members of the newly created House task force, which has 10 Democrats and nine Republicans. Many opened their questioning on Wednesday with vows to keep an "open mind" about the deal but went on to question the deal's necessity and its benefits to consumers.

Task Force Chairman John Conyers (D-Mich.) pressed Karmazin to explain how he planned to persuade federal regulators that the companies will follow through on their promises.

"'Trust me' isn't going to work here, not just today, but in the longer-term examinations that you will be going through," Conyers said. "You've got some high hurdles to overcome, don't you think?"

One hurdle already lies in the licenses granted to the companies by the Federal Communications Commission. In hopes of ensuring competition, the FCC stipulated at the time that there had to continue to be more than one licensee in the satellite radio sphere. XM and Sirius would have to persuade the regulators to waive that decision.

Citing the FCC's policy decision, Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.), the former chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, challenged XM and Sirius executives' repeated assertions that the merged entity would not constitute a monopoly.

"What you appear to be advocating is to make your merged company somewhat akin to an old regulated gas company, and I don't see where the consumer ends up benefiting in that," Sensenbrenner said.

He also questioned how the XM-Sirius plan was any different than a proposed merger between EchoStar Communications' Dish Network and Hughes Electronics' DirectTV that the FCC blocked on the grounds that it amounted to a "regulated monopoly."

Karmazin said his companies' situation was different because the satellite TV business competes with cable and not with free services like terrestrial and Internet radio. Throughout the hearing, he repeatedly challenged any suggestion that the merged companies would have incentive to raise their prices by saying, "We compete with free."

One key question in assessing the deal's impact lies in defining the satellite radio's competitors. If satellite radio is viewed as an entirely separate market, then the proposed deal would seem to amount to a situation in which a monopoly is created--at least until the next satellite player emerges. By contrast, if regulators decide it should be considered part of a broader market that includes all forms of digital and retail music, such as Internet-based and terrestrial radio, then the competitive implications would change drastically.

Sirius and XM argue the union of their two companies will not amount to a monopoly, as critics have suggested. They maintain the deal will instead allow them to compete more effectively with Internet-based and traditional broadcast radio. According to analysts' estimates, the combination could save the companies $300 million or more each year, Karmazin said.

But opponents like the National Association of Broadcasters maintain the situation is no different from the satellite TV merger situation and would create a "government-sanctioned monopoly." Speaking alongside Karmazin and representatives from consumer advocacy groups, NAB CEO David Rehr told the task force that such an arrangement would violate federal rules and would "undermine audio content competition, not enhance it."

Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.) took issue with that characterization of the proposed deal. He said it was clear that satellite and traditional radio operators offered similar and competing services and that NAB's fight against the deal only reinforced that traditional radio operators are concerned about new competition.

The term monopoly "might serve to send shivers into the spine of regulators, but it doesn't have much effect if it has no foundation in the realities of the world today," he said.

Consumer groups' perceptions have been mixed. Mark Cooper, director of research for the Consumer Federation of America, voiced strident opposition to the deal, saying the groups he represented "remain unconvinced by the excuses we have heard to justify this merger." He said he was convinced only "head-to-head competition" would lower prices for consumers in the long run.

DOJ_NMG_0138553

Gigi Sohn, president of the advocacy group Public Knowledge, told the panel that the merger could lead to consumer benefits if certain conditions are imposed. She suggested requiring the company to make a la carte or tiered programming available, agreeing not to raise prices for three years after the merger is approved, and making 5 percent of its capacity available to independently controlled, non-commercial educational and informational programming.

Rep. Rick Boucher (D-Va.) endorsed Sohn's recommendations. "This merger is very much in the public interest and should be approved with those conditions," he said.

The FCC and the U.S. Department of Justice share the ultimate responsibility of to deciding whether the deal should go through and what restrictions must be placed upon it. It's unclear how the congressional task force will fit in, although Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas) said he hoped the agencies will consider its findings when making their assessments.

Smith, the top-ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, also urged his colleagues not to "prejudge" the proposed merger. "We are at the beginning of a very long process," he said.

Sirius's Karmazin Agrees To Price Caps In XM Buy (Update3) (BLOOM)

By James Rowley And Christopher Stern

Bloomberg, March 1, 2007

Feb. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. Chief Executive Officer Mel Karmazin told skeptical lawmakers he would agree to freeze prices to gain approval of the proposed $4.51 billion purchase of XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc.

Karmazin, testifying today at a House Judiciary Committee hearing, pledged to offer choices for consumers to lower their bills and agreed to price caps for an undetermined period.

``We are willing to talk to people about it," Karmazin said. ``If the idea of the merger is conditioned on certain restrictions, we would be open to the conditions."

Karmazin and XM Chairman Gary Parsons are trying to convince U.S. regulators that joining the only satellite radio services won't harm consumers. He drew doubts from legislators including committee Chairman Michigan Democrat John Conyers, who pointed out that past promises, such as making radios that work with both services, haven't been fulfilled.

```Trust me' isn't going to work here," Conyers, 77, said to Karmazin, who is 63. ``You've got some high hurdles to overcome, don't you think?"

The companies contend there is more competition for listeners now than when the original satellite licenses were granted, from devices such as Apple Inc.'s iPod, terrestrial radio and new high-definition stations.

``We are going to have to convince them that it is not anticompetitive," Karmazin said, referring to Justice Department and U.S. Federal Communications Commission regulators. He was speaking on behalf of XM as well as Sirius.

Broadcaster Opposition

Shares of Washington-based XM are trading 17 percent below the offer value of $16.82 in Sirius stock, an indication investors are unsure the deal will be completed. Under the agreement announced Feb. 19, each XM share would be exchanged for 4.6 shares of New York-based Sirius.

XM shares gained 4 cents to $14.36 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market trading. Sirius was unchanged at $3.65.

The proposal is opposed by the Washington-based National Association of Broadcasters, the industry group for free AM-FM radio.

XM and Sirius are a duopoly seeking to become a ``government-sanctioned monopoly," NAB President and Chief Executive Officer David Rehr testified today.

``They want the ability to set subscription prices for national satellite radio service without constraint from a competing service," Rehr said. ``They want to eliminate the need to compete with another national service provider to acquire programming."

`Monopoly' Debate

``I would like the panel to oblige me by stop throwing around the word monopoly," Weiner said.

Boucher agreed with XM and Sirius's contention that the companies compete in a broad audio entertainment market that includes broadcast radio.

``The very presence of Mr. Rehr here happens to confirm the argument that the relevant market is all of radio," Boucher said.

Lawmakers and regulators have promised to look closely at the deal because of concerns that it would create a satellite radio monopoly. House Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell, a Democrat from Michigan, said yesterday that he planned his own inquiry in to the deal. The Senate Judiciary Committee's Antitrust Subcommittee also may to hold a hearing.

```

The ``critical issue is whether the relevant market is all forms of digital music or simply satellite radio," Conyers said in an opening statement. ``If we were to define the market as broadly as merger supporters advocate, what kind of precedent are we setting?"

Congress's Role

Congress doesn't have the power to block the deal, which will be formally reviewed by the Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission.

The companies don't need the merger to survive, Karmazin said. ``We aren't making a failing company argument," he said. Such an argument can be used to defend government charges a combination is anticompetitive.

The purchase would bring consumers lower prices and ``less confusion" amid an expansion of content, Karmazin said. He said the companies hope that ``based on the efficiencies of the merger, we could lower prices."

Critics have seized on XM and Sirius's failure to follow through on past commitments.

Conyers, who said he came to the meeting with an open mind, said the companies hadn't offered consumers radios that work with both services as they had promised, which makes it harder to switch providers. He also brought up the companies' run-ins with the FCC over receiver interference with traditional radio and with terrestrial repeaters that don't comply with designs.

To allow a satellite monopoly ``is antithetical to the antitrust laws, perhaps the worst offense against the basic principle that competition is the consumer's best friend," said Mark Cooper, director of research for the Consumer Federation of America, as part of his testimony. He said the companies could get more business by lowering prices.

Satellite Radio Merger To Create A Monopoly? (POL)

By By: Andrew Glass

Politico, March 1, 2007

If federal regulators allow the nation's two satellite radio services to merge, they will not raise prices and even try to lower them.

That pledge came Wednesday from Sirius Satellite Radio chief executive officer Mel Karmazin during a series of often sharp exchanges with members of Congress. Karmazin, the former chief of Viacom, testified for nearly two-and-a-half hours before the newly formed Antitrust Task Force of the House Judiciary Committee.

An overflow crowd of industry executives, lawyers and lobbyists packed the hearing room in the House Rayburn Office Building as Karmazin, one of five witnesses, debated the merits of letting his money-losing company combine with XM Radio in a deal that has been valued at $13 billion.

Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) opened the hearing by raising concerns over what kind of precedent the government would be setting if it defined the market for satellite radio as all sources of music entertainment. However, Conyers added, "we came here with an open mind."

Nonetheless, "`Trust me' isn't going to work here," the 77-year-old Conyers said to Karmazin, who is 63. ``You've got some high hurdles to overcome, don't you think?"

``We are going to have to convince them (the regulators) that it is not anti-competitive," Karmazin responded. While XM Chairman Gary Parsons was in the hearing room, Karmazin said he was speaking on behalf of both companies.

The two firms contend there is more competition for listeners now than when the original satellite licenses were granted. Whether or not the merger goes through, he added, satellite radio, with its 14 million customers, will continue to compete with an increasing array of audio outlets, including AM, FM and multi-channel HD radio, the Internet and a host of download-based music players, such as Apple's iPod.

Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Tex.), the ranking member on the full committee, noted that "we are at the beginning of a long process," a point echoed by Karmazin during his own remarks.

"We are absolutely not a monopoly," Karmazin said heatedly at one point. "We are absolutely convinced this merger will be in the best interest of consumers," he maintained. "This merger will give consumers more choice at a lower price and more importantly, less confusion."

Some of the most pointed exchanges occurred not with the members but at the long witness table between Karmazin and Mark Cooper, research director of the Consumer Federation of America, an advocacy group. Cooper held that, "The argument that consumers will be better off with a benevolent monopolist than competition is absurd. Cost savings will not be passed to consumers. It is competition that is the driver of innovation in this economy, and competition is the best form of protection for consumers."

Karmazin said his people had told him not to get excited and to keep his hands folded at the table. But Cooper, he felt, had gone too far. The monopoly charge, he said, "is the most bizarre thing I've ever heard… We are not looking to bankrupt our companies. We are not doing anything that stupid. And we'll give back some of that saving (to our customers)"

Karmazin also “guaranteed” that current receivers would remain operable after a merger because each service had spare channels in the spectrum allocated to them by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) a decade ago. He stopped short, however, of guaranteeing for how long the merged company would forbear raising prices, suggesting they would look to the commission and to the antitrust division of the Justice Department for guidance on that score.

Currently, the two firms currently both charge a monthly fee of $12.95 for their nationwide packages of music, talk, and sports programming than span more than 100 channels.

Karmazin also said he was not asking for a bailout on the basis of a “failed company argument,” despite combined losses exceeding $7 billion. Life, he added, would go on for Sirius and XM if the government turned them down.

During the hearing, David Rehr, president of the National Association of Broadcasters, referred to the possibility of a combined Sirius and XM several times as a "government-sanctioned monopoly." The radio satellite firms have long had a testy relationship with the NAB over such issues as whether they could offer their customers local real-time traffic and weather information. (The FCC had ruled that they could so long as that information remained universally accessible.)

Charles Biggio, a partner in antitrust and trade regulation with law firm Wilson Sonsini Goodrich and Rosati, said the amalgamation could be deemed legal under the antitrust laws, even if it controls 100 percent of the satellite market, as long as there is no anti-competitive effect. But he added it remained to be seen whether this is the case.

Gigi Sohn, president and co-founder of Public Knowledge, a Washington D.C.-based advocacy group, said that competition between XM and Sirius has left both companies financially drained and that a merger could benefit consumers.

Sirius CEO Makes Pledges to Congress on Service, Prices

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A merger between Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. wouldn't lead to less choice or higher costs for listeners, the chief executive of Sirius told Congress Wednesday.

In his written testimony submitted to the Antitrust Task Force, a body comprised of House Judiciary Committee members, Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin pledged that consumers would not lose out as a result of the $13 billion merger.

"We operate in an intensely competitive environment that will continue to intensify post-merger -- and continue to provide an inherent check on programming as well as pricing," said Karmazin's statement.

In his opening remarks, Judiciary Committee Chairman and head of the task force, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., said that while he was approaching the matter with an open mind, the burden of proof lay with the companies to convince Congress of the merits of the deal.

He said the "critical threshold" was whether the market that the two satellite companies compete in is "all forms of digital and retail music and radio, or simply satellite radio."

Conyers' statement went on to say that from one perspective, the merger "can be said to turn a duopoly into a monopoly."

When satellite radio was licensed a decade ago, Sirius and XM were granted the only two licenses. In exchange, Federal Communications Commission rules stated that the two wouldn't be allowed to merge in the future.

Sirius and XM have argued that in the ensuing 10 years, the market has changed substantially and they are no longer just competing against each other.

The Department of Justice's antitrust task force would have to approve the merger and FCC rules would have to be changed to allow the deal before it could receive final approval.

Karmazin was appearing before the inaugural hearing of the task force alongside David Rehr, chief executive of the National Association of Broadcasters, and representatives of consumer groups.

The NAB, which represents mainly smaller radio and television broadcasters across the U.S., is a fierce opponent of the deal.

"The proposed merger must be rejected," said Rehr in his opening statement. "Public policy should never allow one entity to acquire state-sanctioned, monopoly control over the 25 megahertz of spectrum allocated to satellite radio service."

In her opening statement, she said that the merger should be given the green light only if it met three conditions.

It must make available pricing choices such as channel-by-channel subscriptions or tiered programming; it must hand over 5 percent of its capacity to noncommercial educational programming; and it should agree to not raise prices for three years after the merger was granted approval.

Corporate Lawyers Urge Clarity In Antitrust Law (LAW)

Legal Times, March 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138556

Bundled products, sales of services are the focus

Top lawyers for General Electric Co. and Eastman Kodak Co. told federal regulators last month that companies need more clarity in antitrust laws when it comes to the sale of products bundled in a discounted package deal, and to the sale of services and parts for a product.

"Companies are concerned that the rules aren't clear," Ronald Stern, vice president and senior counsel for antitrust at General Electric, said in an interview after the hearing.

Testifying in Chicago at a panel organized by the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice's Antitrust Division, the attorneys said regulators should help companies better understand when they might be stepping over the antitrust line in the two areas.

Previous court rulings have left the law ambiguous on when corporate behavior may violate Section 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act and make companies vulnerable to lawsuits by competitors, the lawyers said.

AMICUS ENCOURAGED

They encouraged the agencies to file amicus briefs in court cases or to issue additional guidelines to make the law clearer.

"These two areas are a clear problem for companies like Kodak," Patrick Sheller, the chief compliance officer at Eastman Kodak, said in an interview after the hearing.

David Balto, a former Federal Trade Commission policy director and a lawyer in Washington, agreed that amicus briefs could shed light on how companies are expected to follow the law, especially because most antitrust decisions occur in lower courts.

BUNDLING CONFUSION

The price-bundling issue has come up in the courts more frequently than the aftermarket issue and therefore has created greater potential for liability, said Herbert Hovenkamp, an antitrust professor at University of Iowa College of Law.

"The courts have been all over the place on bundling," Hovenkamp said.

Sheller told the panel that the line between the legal "bundling" of products and the illegal "tying" of products has been blurred.

In bundling, a seller will offer a discounted price on the sale of two different products together, while in tying the seller requires the purchase of one product in order to get another product.

Much of the confusion stems from the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals' 2003 decision in LePage's v. 3M, nos. 00-1368, 00-1473, in which 3M Co. was found to have violated Section 2 by bundling its transparent tape with other products.

The decision "didn't leave a clear standard," Sheller said. "Plaintiffs lawyers will try to take advantage of it."

The key questions are: What legal test is there for determining when bundled pricing violates antitrust law? And in which market situations would it apply?, Stern said.

He suggested to the panel that perhaps bundling shouldn't be considered problematic in markets where sellers engage in competitive bidding or negotiations.

Lawmakers Take Aim At Gas Price Gouging (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 1, 2007

Although gasoline prices have dropped sharply from last summer, 79 lawmakers sought to send a message Wednesday, introducing a bill that would impose stiff penalties on oil and gas companies for price gouging.

With prices at the pump rebounding in recent weeks, Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich., said he's worried "this summer prices may once again exceed $3 a gallon."

The bill introduced by Stupak and 78 other members of the House would establish the first federal law against price gouging by oil and gas companies, imposing criminal penalties and fines of up to $150 million for corporations and $2 million on individuals.

The House passed a similar bill last year, but it died in the Senate.

The Federal Trade Commission would be given authority to investigate price gouging in the sale of crude oil, home heating oil, propane and natural gas.

"The FTC has never brought a gas price gouging case to court," said Stupak.

In fact, the agency has no authority to do so since there is no federal energy price gouging law. FTC investigations into crude oil or gasoline pricing have focused on whether companies have colluded in violation of antitrust laws.

Last year, FTC Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras said a federal law against oil company price gouging would be difficult to enforce and could hurt consumers by causing fuel shortages.

She said price gouging is difficult to define and courts have refused to address the question of what is a "reasonable" price in a free market. She maintained it may be difficult to determine what price hikes are legitimate.

Twenty-nine states have price gouging statutes, but they vary widely and some go into effect only in an emergency.

Retail gasoline prices have increased 13 cents a gallon on average nationwide in the past two weeks as the price of crude oil also has been rising. The oil industry has repeatedly disputed allegations of price gouging, saying prices at the pump reflect supply and demand, and mostly the cost of crude oil.

Genworth Financial Unit Gets 2 Subpoenas (MRKTWTCH)

By Antonie Boessenkool

Market Watch, March 1, 2007

Genworth Financial Inc. disclosed Wednesday that a subsidiary received two subpoenas in November related to probes into the sale of guaranteed investment contracts to municipalities.

The subpoenas, a grand jury subpoena from the Antitrust Division of the U.S. Justice Department and a subpoena from the Securities and Exchange Commission, require the unit to turn over information related to investigations into alleged bid-rigging involving the sale of the investment contracts, according to Genworth's annual report filed with the SEC.

Genworth said it doesn't issue these contracts to municipalities. But the insurance company said that from January 2004 to December 2006, the subsidiary provided management and administrative services to a third party that does issue the contracts to municipalities.

Genworth said it plans to cooperate fully with the investigations.

Terex Gets Subpoenas From Justice Department On Equipment Pricing (MRKTWTCH)

By Patricia Kowsmann

Market Watch, March 1, 2007

Terex Corp. disclosed Wednesday that it received subpoenas from the U.S. Department of Justice over some equipment pricing.

In its annual report filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Westport, Conn., the manufacturer said the subpoenas relate to the DOJ's investigation into pricing practices in the rock crushing and screening equipment industry.

Terex said it cooperating fully with the investigation. It didn't provide further information.

Shares of the company closed Wednesday at $65.88, up 78 cents.

Marks & Spencer's Rose Is Considering Sainsbury Bid (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Neil Craven And Angharad Couch

Bloomberg, March 1, 2007

Feb. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Marks & Spencer Group Plc Chief Executive Officer Stuart Rose said he's considering bidding for J Sainsbury Plc, Britain's third-biggest supermarket chain.

Rose, who runs the U.K.'s largest clothing retailer, said he was speaking to customers about an offer for Sainsbury, which has a market value of 8.8 billion pounds ($17 billion). ``You do get quite an interesting response," he said in a presentation to a London conference held by Retail Week magazine today.

His remarks follow three weeks of speculation that Marks may seek to buy Sainsbury to create a retailer with more than 1,000 outlets. An offer may spark a bidding war with CVC Capital Partners Ltd., Blackstone Group LP and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., which said Feb. 2 they were considering an offer for Sainsbury in what would be Europe's biggest buyout.

``Assets like this don't come on the market very often," Rose said today. ``The company is effectively in play. Your shareholders would think you were an idiot if you didn't consider it. Watch this space."

Marks said in an e-mailed statement following Rose's remarks that its board had considered bidding for Sainsbury and didn't intend to make an offer ``at this time." The retailer said it reserved the right to announce a bid or possible bid within the next six months if Sainsbury's board recommends an offer or if a ``firm" approach by the CVC group or another suitor is made.

Property Partner

Sainsbury shares have surged 15 percent since the private- equity companies said they were interested in the retailer. Spokeswoman Pip Wood declined to comment to Bloomberg today.

For a transaction to work, Marks would need a partner to buy Sainsbury's property, enabling the company to acquire the operating grocery business relatively cheaply, Numis Securities' Steve Davies has said. Marks might achieve 300 million pounds of cost savings from a deal, according to Davies, who estimates Sainsbury's property is worth 7.5 billion pounds.

Sainsbury Chief Executive Officer Justin King has cut prices and added fresh food to halt three years of declining profit and stem a loss of market share to larger rival Tesco Plc, which has more than 3,000 U.K. outlets.

London-based Marks & Spencer is 18 months into a recovery that followed two years of declining same-store sales. Rose has also expanded his company's range of fresh food, as well as commissioned renovated stores and revamped women's fashions.

`Glass of Wine'

``Stuart Rose has got to think where the next leg of his growth is going to come from," Chris Gower, an analyst at Man Securities in London, said today. ``It's a good strategic fit. They have a fairly similar customer base as Sainsbury, and a fairly strong brand in the middle market."

Marks & Spencer would also have to overcome hurdles from antitrust regulators if it were to buy Sainsbury, analysts including Gower have said. William Morrison Supermarkets Plc, which bought Safeway Plc in 2004 to become Britain's fourth-largest food retailer, was forced by regulators to sell stores.

``It's one thing talking about something over a glass of wine," Rose said today of a possible bid. ``It's another thing going down that road."

Combination Risks

Some analysts have said a combination between the two brands could be risky. The different product offerings and images may alienate customers, Deutsche Bank AG's James Collins said in a Feb. 22 report to investors. Sainsbury offers a full food range at competitive prices, while Marks's food is limited and highly priced, he said.

``Marks & Spencer shoppers might feel their brand would be cheapened," he wrote. ``Sainsbury shoppers would be quick to accuse it of becoming too expensive whenever it pushed through any price rises."

Marks & Spencer, which owns more than 400 stores across the U.K., has added stand-alone food outlets known as Simply Food and delicatessen bars and cafes in other stores. Food makes up about 50 percent of the company's total sales.

Marks controls 11 percent of the U.K. clothing market, with Wal-Mart Stores Inc.'s Asda in second place at 8.2 percent, followed by Tesco at 8.1 percent, according to Taylor Nelson Sofres Plc. Sainsbury's share is about 1 percent.

A takeover of Sainsbury by private equity companies would probably top the 11.8 billion-euro acquisition of Danish phone company TDC A/S in November 2005, currently the biggest European private-equity purchase. It would also be the first buyout of a company in Britain's benchmark FTSE-100 index.

Marks & Spencer held internal talks about a possible bid for Sainsbury, London's Times newspaper reported Feb. 7, citing unidentified people within the retailer. The Sunday Telegraph newspaper said Feb. 18 Marks had discussed jointly bidding with funds backed by the Persian Gulf state of Qatar.

Marks shares fell less than 0.1 percent to 675 pence today, giving the company a value of 11.5 billion pounds. Sainsbury shares fell 6.25 pence, or 1.2 percent, to 511.25 pence.

A&P Parent Negotiates To Buy Pathmark (MRKTWTCH)

By Angela Moore, Marketwatch

Market Watch, March 1, 2007

NEW YORK (MarketWatch) -- Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. said it is negotiating to acquire smaller rival Pathmark Stores Inc., as A&P looks to expand its footprint in the competitive supermarket industry.

Under the terms of the proposed deal, announced Tuesday, Pathmark shareholders would receive $12.50 a share in cash and stock.

Shares of both companies fell in midday trading Wednesday, after moving sharply higher ahead of the announcement. Pathmark shares were down 2% at $11.71, while A&P saw its shares drop 3.4% to $32.03.

The Montvale, N.J., company , which operates A&P, Waldbaum's and Food Emporium, said no final agreement has been reached. The sale would require shareholder and regulatory approvals, including federal and state antitrust clearances.

"We have long held that consolidation in the market was necessary and that Pathmark and A&P made the most logical choice for a combination," Bear Stearns analyst Westcott Rochette wrote in a note to clients, after raising the year-end price target on A&P to $40.

Based on the number of shares outstanding when Pathmark reported its third-quarter results, the deal is valued at about $651 million.

Goldman Sachs analyst John Heinbockel said the proposed deal makes sense, but warned against too much optimism.

"We continue to believe that the combination, while likely to unlock significant cost take-out synergies, carries certain risks," Heinbockel said. "These would include systems conversions, banner changes, and the execution of a much-needed, stepped-up capital program."

DOJ_NMG_0138559

News of the negotiations comes as grocery stores are struggling to compete with high-end specialty operators, including Whole Foods Markets Inc. , Trader Joe's and Wegman's, as well as discount giants such as Wal-Mart Stores Inc. Last week, Wild Oats Markets Inc. agreed to be acquired by larger rival Whole Foods. See archived story.

The grocery store category is also highly competitive, and rivals such as Safeway Inc. and Kroger Co.have been remodeling and updating stores.

Pathmark, Carteret, N.J., operates 141 supermarkets, mostly in the New York, New Jersey and Philadelphia metropolitan areas. A&P operates 410 stores in nine states.

Ron Burkle's investment vehicle, Yucaipa Cos., holds a large stake in Pathmark, as well as an 18% stake in Wild Oats. Before the Whole Foods and Wild Oats deal was announced last week, there had been market talk that Pathmark and Wild Oats might merge.

Oracle Deal For Hyperion Is Expected (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Michael J. De La Merced

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

Oracle is near a deal to acquire Hyperion Solutions, which makes software that allows corporations to analyze and track their performance, for more than $3.1 billion, according to people briefed on the deal.

The acquisition is expected to be announced as early as today, these people said.

The deal would be the latest trophy in a lengthy string of acquisitions by Oracle, the database software giant that has been struggling to grow from within.

In December, Oracle posted strong earnings growth for its second fiscal quarter, but its growth in license sales disappointed investors. The company said at the time that it had failed to close some crucial licensing deals during the quarter. License sales rose 28 percent in the quarter, but that was down from 80 percent growth in the previous quarter.

Exact terms of the deal could not be learned last night.

Shares of Hyperion slipped 25 cents yesterday in regular trading, to $42.84, giving it a market value of about $2.5 billion. Oracle shares closed at $16.43, up 14 cents. Representatives for Oracle, which is based in Redwood City, Calif., and Hyperion, with headquarters in Santa Clara, Calif., could not be reached for comment.

Oracle has long been known as one of the most aggressive acquirers of technology companies.

Led by Lawrence J. Ellison, who sees acquisitions as a tool for growth, the company has at times seemed on the verge of gobbling nearly every rival in the business software market. In the last three years, Oracle spent more than $20 billion on acquisitions, including buying two of its most formidable competitors, PeopleSoft and Siebel.

PeopleSoft, the company Oracle fought over for nearly two years, was its most notable deal.

In December 2004, after a battle for control that grew nasty, Oracle finally acquired PeopleSoft for about $10.3 billion, becoming the second-largest maker of business-management software.

Since that deal, Oracle's appetite has been unsatiated. In 2005, the company bought a stake in I-flex Solutions, a maker of financial software based in Mumbai, India, for a reported $909 million.

Within the last year, Oracle has struck a series of deals, including a $5.9 billion acquisition of Siebel Systems and a $440 million purchase of Stellent last year.

Hyperion would be one of the last pieces to complete Oracle's strategy. Founded in 1981 as IMRS, Hyperion has grown into one of the biggest makers of business analysis software through its Hyperion System 9 suite.

For the 2006 fiscal year, the company reported $765 million in revenue.

Hyperion itself has grown through a series of deals, notably a 1998 merger with Arbor Software that brought the popular Essbase database software program into its fold.

Hyperion has long been speculated about as a merger partner with Business Objects, another business analysis software maker, according to analysts.

Indeed, the two companies held talks this year, but those negotiations collapsed over price and other issues, people briefed on them said.

Oracle has talked to half a dozen companies recently about acquiring them, according to people familiar with those talks. Hyperion has long been on that list.

Last year, The Mercury News in San Jose ranked Hyperion's executive chairman, Jeffrey R. Rodek, as No. 49 among the highest-paid executives in Silicon Valley.

Mr. Rodek, who became chairman and chief executive in 1999 and executive chairman in 2004, received $11.01 million in compensation in 2005, including salary and stock options.

Record Labels Go After USC Downloaders (LAT)

By Dawn C. Chmielewski And Jim Puzzanghera, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

If they don't quit illegally downloading music, some USC students may end up having to fight on … in court.

The record industry's main trade group said Wednesday that it was mailing letters to 20 of the school's students whom it had identified as bootleggers.

The letters warn that an expensive lesson awaits if the students don't stop the practice. Settle, the dispatches say, or be sued.

The mailings are part of a stepped-up legal fight by the Recording Industry Assn. of America against music downloading amid indications of a dramatic increase in the number of songs exchanged illegally via the Internet.

The association said that overall it was sending 400 warning letters to students at 13 universities and that it expected to sue several thousand students.

"We'd rather not be doing these lawsuits … but the fact remains that the college environment is one that has rampant piracy," said association Chairman Mitch Bainwol.

Omar Riza, 21, a USC student from Aliso Viejo, said a friend of his was one of more than two dozen USC students sued by the trade group in 2005 for using file-sharing site i2hub. The industry demanded $21,000 in compensation for the downloaded songs, but later reduced that amount to $3,000, Riza said.

"This is an intellectual property issue," Riza said. "This isn't a crime of murder."

But others, such as Christina Carey, 19, believe that the industry has the right to go after students who illegally download.

"They're getting robbed," said Carey.

She said she never illegally downloaded music, but acknowledged there was a thin line between sharing and pirating. Carey makes CDs for friends, she said, but some of them won't accept copies of CDs even as gifts.

The mailings, which the industry calls "pre-litigation settlement letters," are being sent to each student's school. They warn that a suit might be filed against one of the school's students or employees and asks that the letter be immediately forwarded.

The student or employee then can settle for a smaller payment than the industry would seek in a lawsuit. The association says it will continue sending out 400 letters a month to universities where illegal downloading occurs on the schools' computer systems.

"We heard often from those who were caught in a lawsuit they wanted a way to settle earlier and wanted a way to avoid having anything part of a record in federal court," said Steven Marks, the industry group's general counsel.

The settlements would require the person to agree not to illegally download music in the future and pay an undisclosed amount that is "substantially less than people are paying now," Marks said.

USC received an e-mail Wednesday from the the trade group about the notices but hasn't received any yet, university counsel Kelly Bendell said.

In the past the industry would issue a subpoena to USC seeking to learn the name of the person corresponding with the numeric Internet address of a suspected downloader, Bendell said. The school would notify the student that it had received a subpoena, and alert the student that he or she could file a motion seeking to quash it. Otherwise, the school would disclose the person's name.

Now, it appears that the industry wants the school to notify the student that it would like to negotiate a settlement before a suit is filed, Bendell said.

"I don't know yet how we'll handle that," said Bendell. "Most likely, we would go ahead and notify the student. Obviously, we would not turn over their names without receiving a subpoena."

Other universities getting the letters include Arizona State, Syracuse, Nebraska, Tennessee, Texas and Massachusetts.

Students Face RIAA Lawsuits (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

LOS ANGELES -- The recording industry's trade group said Wednesday it will give hundreds of college students suspected of illegally sharing music online a chance to reach settlements before being sued for copyright infringement.

The move comes as the industry seeks to stamp out what it is says is rampant music piracy on campuses.

The Recording Industry Association of America said it was sending letters offering discounted settlements to 400 computer users at 13 universities. The group intends to send hundreds of such pre-litigation letters to university computer users every month.

"The theft of music remains unacceptably high and undermines the industry's ability to invest in new music," said Mitch Bainwol, chairman and CEO of the association. "This is especially the case on college campuses."

The letters targeted students at Arizona State University, Marshall University, North Carolina State University, North Dakota State University, Northern Illinois University, Ohio University, Syracuse University, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, University of Nebraska, Lincoln, University of South Florida, University of Southern California, University of Tennessee, Knoxville, and University of Texas, Austin.

Privately Held New York, Boston Power Producers Merge (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Jim Polson

Bloomberg, March 1, 2007

Feb. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Astoria Generating Co. and EBG Holdings, closely held owners of power plants in New York City and Boston, said they will merge in a move designed to capitalize on rising regional power demand and limited supply.

The newly formed entity, U.S. Power Generating Co., will be run from New York by Astoria Chief Executive Officer Jacob Worenklein, the companies said today. Hedge funds that own EBG will get 54 percent of the closely held company. Astoria owners, including Madison Dearborn Partners LP and the Hunt Oil family, will get 46 percent. Other details of the agreement weren't disclosed.

The combined value of the plants held by the two companies may be worth $4.25 billion to $5 billion, analysts said. Combined output will be about 5,000 megawatts.

``You've got two great, growing and constrained metropolitan areas, so they are both very attractive generation markets," said Barry Sullivan, vice chairman of New York-based K Road Power, which has run the Boston plants since Dec. 31, 2005. ``This gives a bigger platform to operate both sets of assets and others we'd hope that will become available over time."

Astoria Generating's three plants supply 20 percent of New York City's power supply and EBG's five plants meet half the electricity needs of Boston, the companies said. U.S. Power Generating expects to benefit from tariffs regulators plan to impose on power customers to encourage costly construction of plants and power lines as both metropolitan areas grow. Power demand in New York and Boston probably will rise 2 percent a year, Sullivan said.

Regional Demand Growth

Rising electricity demand and planned plant retirements may leave the New York City area short of generating capacity needed to meet demand on the hottest days as early as next year, the New York Independent System Operator, which runs the state's power grid, said in August.

The deal may be worth $4.25 billion to $4.5 billion based on recent power plant sales, said Steve Thumb, principal at Energy Ventures Analysis Inc. in Arlington, Virginia, a consultant to companies that buy and sell power plants.

U.S. Power valued the deal at $5 billion, or $1,000 a kilowatt of capacity. That would be among the highest prices paid for gas-fueled plants with contracts that lock in fuel costs and power sales, said Jeff Bodington, Chief Executive Officer at Bodington & Co., a San Francisco-based investment bank that specializes in power-plant deals.

Contract details on the plants will not be released, Sullivan said.

Little Golden Apples

``There's an argument to put these in the top half by value because they are little golden apples," Thumb said. ``You have a pretty good market up there because they use the damn plants unlike other areas where they were overbuilt. And those cities are so landlocked those plants will be there forever. They're not going to be replaced by the next new technology."

The combination needs approval of EBG shareholders, the New York Public Service Commission, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, and federal antitrust approval, Sullivan said. The deal is expected to close by midyear, Sullivan said.

Credit Suisse Group advised Astoria and Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. advised EBG.

Days After TXU Deal

The merger comes two days after TXU Corp., the largest electricity supplier in Texas, agreed to be purchased by a private investor group led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Texas Pacific Group for $45 billion, a record leveraged buyout.

Astoria owns Astoria Generation Station, Gowanus Gas Turbine Facility and Narrows Gas Turbine Facility, divested by utility owner Consolidated Edison Inc. under a state law opening power markets to competition and purchased from Reliant Energy Inc. in 2005.

EBG owns Boston-area plants that Chicago-based Exelon Corp. handed over to banks in 2004 after problems with their completion and financing. Sithe Energies Inc. had begun the projects before it was purchased, by Exelon.

``Hedge funds began to take pieces of the equity and we ultimately made a deal to buy a minority piece and the management, Sullivan said.

EBG has 75 shareholders, and 15 of those would control 75 percent of the company, he said. He declined to name EGB's owners.

Antitrust Probe For ECB Settlement Platform (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

A controversial plan by the European Central Bank to set up and operate a new system for settling share and bond trades in the European Union will come under close scrutiny by the region's top antitrust watchdog.

In an unusual move that adds to the uncertainty surrounding the new regime, the European Commission told EU finance ministers this month that the central bank was not exempt from antitrust laws.

It also told them that the Commission's competition department would carefully examine the so-called Target 2 Securities system - a process that could delay the introduction of the new platform.

Though the Commission does not have concrete concerns at this stage, a probe would most likely focus on whether the ECB system constituted a restrictive business practice or an abuse of monopoly power in violation of EU antitrust rules.

"Economic activities are subject to competition law irrespective of whether they are undertaken by private companies or by public authorities and other institutions," the spokesman for Neelie Kroes, EU competition commissioner, said. "We have informed the financial services committee [the body that prepares meetings of EU finance ministers] that the ECB is not exempt from competition rules."

He added: "The ECB proposal has not been finalised, and we would not necessarily find the system incompatible with EU competition rules. It could turn out to be pro-competitive. But we would want to examine it carefully."

The Frankfurt-based central bank is already facing criticism for its proposal to set up and operate a system that would compete directly with private-sector settlement providers such as Euroclear and Clearstream.

The ECB's regime is intended to provide a central platform for settling trades in Euro-denominated securities. The bank argues that it would be cheaper and easier to use than the patchwork of different national settlement systems.

But in a move that highlighted growing concern about the project's implications for Europe's capital market, EU finance ministers on Wednesday called on the bank to provide more information on the expected costs and benefits of the project.

Though the ECB does not need the governments' approval to move ahead with Target 2 Securities, it confirmed on Wednesday that it would conduct further work on the scheme and report back to ministers. The bank had originally hoped to reach a final decision on the system next month - a target date it has now abandoned.

Ms Kroes' intention to examine the regime's compatibility with antitrust rules may turn out to sit uncomfortably with the Commission's general support for a more integrated clearing and settlement regime in the EU. Brussels last year published a report that identified the high cost of cross-border clearing and settlement as a crucial obstacle for the creation of more integrated European capital market.

Stock exchanges and settlement providers reacted by agreeing to make their regimes work together more smoothly and to "unbundle" clearing and settlement services from other activities such as trading.

EU Clears BAWAG Sale To Cerberus Group (AP)

EU Clears Sale of Austria's Troubled BAWAG Bank to Cerberus-Led Group

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- EU regulators on Wednesday cleared the sale of Austria's BAWAG, the troubled bank linked to collapsed commodities broker Refco, to a consortium headed by private equity fund Cerberus Capital Management.

The European Commission automatically cleared the deal after identifying no antitrust problems and receiving no complaints from rivals within a deadline of 25 working days.

Cerberus and others agreed in December to pay 3.2 billion euros ($4.23 billion) for the bank, Austria's fifth largest.

The bank's current owner, trade union federation OeGB, will get 2.6 billion euros ($3.44 billion) of that with the rest serving as an injection of capital for BAWAG P.S.K.

The consortium -- which includes Wuestenrot, the Austrian branch of Assicurazioni Generali SpA, Oesterreichische Post and a small group of industrialists linked to Hannes Androsch, a former Austrian finance minister -- plans to expand the bank throughout Europe.

BAWAG, formally known as the Bank Fuer Arbeit und Wirtschaft AG, lost more than a billion dollars in soured currency speculation deals in the Caribbean and has been under investigation for loaning Phillip Bennet, the former CEO of Refco Inc., several hundred million dollars just before the brokerage filed for bankruptcy protection last year.

It agreed in June to pay at least 530 million euros ($675 million) to avoid prosecution and to settle bankruptcy claims after admitting its role in Refco's collapse.

In October, the Vienna public prosecutor's office said it had filed charges against nine people connected to BAWAG, including Helmut Elsner and Johann Zwettler, both former heads of the bank, as well as investment banker Wolfgang Floettl and Robert Reiter, a former auditor.

Broadcom V. Qualcomm Battles Wage On (OCR)

By John Gittelsohn, The Orange County Register

Orange County (CA) Register, March 1, 2007

The semiconductor giants settled four patent disputes out of court last week, but are far from resolving other property battles, attorneys for both companies said in interviews with the Orange County Register on Tuesday.

Broadcom Corp. and Qualcomm Inc. settled four patent disputes out of court last week, but the Southern California semiconductor giants are far from resolving their antitrust and intellectual property battles, attorneys for both companies said in interviews with the Orange County Register on Tuesday.

"That was just a piecemeal separate peace," said Lou Lupin, executive vice president and general counsel for Qualcomm, the San Diego telecom chipmaker.

Broadcom and Qualcomm still have five outstanding patent infringement cases and three antitrust actions in U.S. federal courts, the European Community and South Korea. One of the next cases is scheduled for opening arguments in federal court in Santa Ana in May.

In addition, Broadcom still has 12 patent disputes against Qualcomm, and Qualcomm still has six against Broadcom, said David Rosmann, Broadcom's vice president for intellectual property litigation. "It's just a paring down," he said.

Irvine-based Broadcom launched the legal war in 2005 amid frustration over negotiating licensing agreements for technology in 3G or WCDMA mobile phones, a new generation of phones that perform multiple tasks such as transmitting high speed video. Qualcomm pioneered the technology that became the industry standard.

In its antitrust cases, Broadcom argues that Qualcomm wants to monopolize the next generation of mobile phones by charging excessive royalties. Broadcom's attorneys say Qualcomm employed the same tactic to control more than 90 percent of the chips in the current generation of mobile phones used by such companies as AT&T, Sprint and Verizon.

"Broadcom didn't like the way (the royalty negotiation) was going so it instituted litigation and Qualcomm responded with litigation of its own," Lupin said.

In its patent-infringement cases, Broadcom argues that Qualcomm has refused to pay for using its technology. In its countersuits, Qualcomm contends that Broadcom is trying to enter a field plowed by Qualcomm without paying a fair price.

Rosmann noted that Broadcom prevailed over Qualcomm in a U.S. International Trade Commission patent infringement ruling and a patent infringement case in U.S. District Court in San Diego.

"We're 2-0," he said.

Qualcomm has set aside $200 million for all of its litigation in 2007. Broadcom's attorneys declined to specify the cost of litigation. Qualcomm also hired former U.S. attorney Carol Lam to head up its litigation process against Broadcom and cell phone maker Nokia, which has also filed separate antitrust claims against Qualcomm.

"The litigation is all about posturing for market position," Lupin said. "I would not characterize it as par for the course. We have 140 to 150 licensing agreements, almost all without litigation. This is the exception – a rare exception – to the rule."

Mark Nelson, a Washington, D.C., attorney who represents Broadcom in its antitrust cases, said a lot of companies do business with Qualcomm because they have no choice.

"It's not surprising companies feel compelled to deal with a monopolist, he said. "It doesn't mean they're satisfied."

By challenging Qualcomm, Broadcom's attorneys said, other companies – and consumers – will have more choice in their future phones.

Why Big Isn't Bad (WSJ)

By Cécile Philippe

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

The world's No. 1 chipmaker, Intel, has been the target of a series of antitrust probes and lawsuits around the globe. Among them is a five-year investigation by the European Commission that has included raids on the company's European offices and may yet lead to formal legal proceedings. Japan's Fair Trade Commission has already condemned Intel for "unfair" practices and urged it to change its ways. Authorities in South Korea and the U.S. are also probing the California-based company.

DOJ_NMG_0138564

The concomitant nature of these cases owes nothing to serendipity. They were all triggered following antitrust complaints filed by Intel's arch-rival, Advanced Micro Devices Inc. AMD alleges that Intel's practice of inviting its major customers to sign exclusive contracts in exchange for significant rebates and discounts is anticompetitive. In the European Commission, AMD has an audience that has been sympathetic to such accusations before, as in the cases of the pharmaceutical firm Hoffmann-Roche in 1979 or the tire manufacturer Michelin in 2003.

These commercial tactics are actually common practice. Intel's case, however, is allegedly different in that the firm enjoys a "dominant position" in the market for microprocessors, with 80% of sales by unit volume. It is because of this "dominant" status that competition regulators might regard Intel's practices with suspicion and ordain that it end them.

The legal premise is that a company with such a large market share can use its size to put competitors out of business, perhaps by lowering its prices to a point at which they cannot compete, and then foist higher prices upon helpless customers. The soundness of this theory is debatable even on philosophical grounds -- if the new monopolist suddenly raises prices, why would its old competitors not get back into the game? -- but there is empirical evidence that Intel's practices have not made it immune to competition.

Sure, Intel has gained ground in Japan thanks in part to the discount and rebate practices in began there in 2002. Its market share there rose to 89% in 2004 from 76% a year earlier. World-wide, though, Intel is losing ground to AMD, whose market share grew to 25.3% at the end of 2006, compared with 23.3% in 2005. The company announced that it would have to reduce its global staff by 10,000 workers by the middle of this year.

In any case, there's an inherent contradiction in this "big is bad" application of competition law. Firms are allowed to use certain practices in order to grow their business and reach the top of their industry. But then, suddenly, these practices become illegal once their goal has been achieved. How can this be right? From an economic point of view, the intensity of competition should not be measured by market share alone. The most important thing is to see that entry into the market remains free -- that is, that regulatory measures do not impede companies from joining the fray.

Intel has chosen to engage in drastic price cuts in order to win more business, and in some cases it has conditioned these price cuts on exclusivity agreements. However, it's important to note that a customer won't agree to such arrangements unless it sees a benefit for itself as well as Intel. The purchasing firm's decision is partly a function of competing offers, but in the end it will opt for those products that it expects to be attractive to its own consumers. This is certainly the reason why, despite Intel's offers and market dominance, the world's leading PC distributor, Dell, recently ended a 7-year-old exclusive contract with Intel, deciding instead to to distribute AMD's opteron chip. Moreover, server makers Hewlett-Packard, Sun and IBM, among others, increasingly are rolling out new products with AMD, not Intel, inside. At the end of the day, the success of Intel or AMD depends on their ability to meet the needs and expectations of their customers, whether they favor innovative products or cheaper products.

The market for microprocessors is regarded as one of the most dynamic in the economy. For several decades, it has been characterized by dazzling innovations and no less spectacular price cuts. Today's chips can process up to 50 billion instructions per second; just a decade ago, they could handle only 500. (The evolution for the number of transistors inside has been similar.) All this has occurred even though there are only two major players on the stage today.

In weighing Intel's business model and practices, it is vital that regulators leave room for the free play of competition and, even more important, let the market judge the management decisions of the different players in a given industry. There is no guarantee that Intel's strategy will prove to be the best one, especially if AMD or other firms provide better value to consumers. What is anticompetitive is the worrying trend of companies' asking regulators to level the playing field, rather than trying to win in the marketplace.

By Scott Wong, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, March 1, 2007

The owner of the lone marina at Lake Pleasant sued two high-ranking federal officials in U.S. District Court Tuesday in an effort to halt construction of a new marina at the far north Peoria lake.

DOJ_NMG_0138565

The lawsuit came on the same day the $20 million marina cleared its largest bureaucratic hurdle. Reclamation officials on Tuesday said they determined Scorpion Bay Marina & Yacht Harbor would have no significant impact on the environment and that the agency would not undertake a complete environmental review of the project.

advertisement

In his 13-page suit, Maule-Ffinch claimed that Reclamation — the arm of the Interior Department that owns Lake Pleasant and other waterways — broke federal law when it failed to require that Maricopa County conduct a competitive bidding process for the construction and management of the new marina.

A provision in a 2002 request for proposal banned Pensus and other potential bidders that had any business interests next to or around Lake Pleasant Regional Park, which the county manages.

"The Bureau of Reclamation has an independent duty to make sure a federal asset is given out to a profit-making organization who has complied with all of the rules," Andrew Federhar, an attorney for Maule-Ffinch and Pensus, said Wednesday. "We don't believe (Reclamation) ensured this federal asset is being appropriately used."

Maule-Ffinch filed a similar suit last April in Maricopa County Superior Court against the county and Lake Pleasant Marina Partners, a limited liability group of investors in the project. The court decided not to hear the case; neither did the state appellate court upon appeal.

Bruce Ellis, who heads the Reclamation division that issued a draft environmental review of Scorpion Bay, said he had no comment about the federal suit. A spokesman for the U.S. Department of Justice said the agency has not been served and would not have any comment until it reviews the matter.

The planned Scorpion Bay Marina would be constructed on about 164 acres of land on the western shore of Lake Pleasant Regional Park. It would feature 800 wet slips, parking for 800 vehicles, a boating supply store, and a boat launch ramp, among other amenities.

Coal-fired Power Plant Gets Go-ahead (AAS)

By Asher Price, AMERICAN-STATESMAN STAFF

Austin American-Statesman, March 1, 2007

The plant had been held up by legal challenges from environmental groups and, for a period, the federal Department of Justice.

But in November, the federal government offered a settlement that would allow Alcoa Inc. and TXU Corp. to use an old permit at the site instead of having to apply for a new, stricter permit.

The settlement offer, approved by U.S. District Judge Sam Sparks in Austin late Tuesday, eases a deal between the aluminum giant and the state's largest energy company for control of the plant, which powers an aluminum smelting operation in Rockdale, about 60 miles northeast of Austin.

The plant's new unit, known as Sandow 5, is one of three coal-fired units TXU proposes to build. Plans for eight other units were withdrawn after the company was approached in a $45 billion buyout deal last week.

The unit, slated to come online in 2009, will have 581 megawatts of capacity, or enough to power 300,000 homes.

TXU said it will start construction immediately. Once the new unit is operational, the plant will employ about 1,370 people, the company said.

Citizens and environmental groups accused Alcoa in a lawsuit of illegally releasing more than 1 million tons of air pollution from the plant during a 17-year period.

As part of the settlement reached in 2003, Alcoa was required to pay a $1.5 million fine, spend $2.5 million on environmental mitigation projects in Central Texas and replace its three coal-powered generating units at the plant with a single cleaner-burning, coal-powered unit by 2007.

To sweeten the deal for TXU, Alcoa has tried to loosen the emissions controls in the 2003 settlement and continued operating the plant under the company's existing air permit.

Environmentalists had argued that because the new plant won't be complete by the 2007 deadline, the judge should require a stricter air permit.

Under the new settlement, Alcoa will pay the U.S. government $859,000 in penalties from the 2003 settlement, and Alcoa and TXU Sandow are supposed to cut emission rates for nitrogen oxide by 20 percent from the rate called for in the 2003 settlement.

The judge found arguments by the citizens groups that the order would relax pollution controls to be "simply incorrect."

At least one group involved in the case said it was thinking of appealing the judgment.

Judge OKs Settlement For Central Texas Coal Plant (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, March 1, 2007

AUSTIN — A federal judge has approved a settlement between Alcoa, TXU and the U.S. Department of Justice that would allow TXU to build a new coal-fired power plant in Central Texas.

A spokeswoman said TXU will start construction as soon as possible on the plant at Alcoa's aluminum smelter in Rockdale, about 60 miles northeast of Austin. The new unit, known as Sandow 5, will replace three old coal-fired generators.

The Justice Department had joined environmental and citizen groups in challenging plans for the new plant. But the government came to terms with Alcoa and TXU in November, and on Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Sam Sparks approved the settlement.

The Rockdale plant is one of three Texas coal-fired units proposed by TXU. Private equity firms working to buy TXU said earlier this week that they would scrap plans for eight other proposed coal plants.

Alcoa reached a settlement with the groups in 2003 that required Alcoa to pay fines, spend millions on environmental cleanup and replace its three coal units with a single cleaner unit by 2007.

Alcoa had trouble finding a partner to build the new generator. To help attract TXU, Alcoa has tried to loosen the emissions controls in the 2003 settlement and continued operating the plant under the company's existing air permit.

Environmentalists argued that the judge should require a stricter air permit because the plant won't be built by 2007.

Under the settlement, Alcoa won't have to apply for a new permit. But it must pay the U.S. government $859,000 in penalties from the 2003 settlement, and Alcoa and TXU are supposed to cut emission rates for nitrogen oxide by 20 percent from the rate called for in the 2003 settlement.

Jim Marston, regional director of plaintiff Environmental Defense, said he's had talks with the firms buying TXU about limiting sulfur dioxide emissions from the Sandow unit.

Marston said the groups have not decided whether to appeal the judge's ruling.

Group Should Return $25 Million, U.S. Audit Says (BLOOM)

By Neil Roland

Bloomberg, February 28, 2007

Feb. 28 (Bloomberg) -- An environmental group that sponsored national clean-water events with the Smithsonian Institution before shutting down over accounting irregularities should return $25 million in government grant funds, a U.S. audit said.

The nonprofit America's Clean Water Foundation, formed in 1989 with a board headed by then-Senators Edmund Muskie and Howard Baker, overstated costs on U.S. Environmental Protection Agency grants and failed to keep appropriate records, an audit by the EPA's inspector general said.

``This was a highly visible group with lax internal controls," EPA Grants Administrator Richard Kuhlman said in an interview today. ``There aren't many groups like this that go under, and this amount is by far the most we've considered trying to recover since I've been here."

The Washington-based foundation got three EPA grants for a total of $25.2 million since 1998, with most of the money for on-site environmental reviews of pork farms, the audit said.

Auditors recommended trying to recover the money unless the group reconstructed its accounting records. The foundation closed its doors last July when the EPA shut off funds because of the accounting problems.

``The vast majority of the money went to proper projects with a lot of environmental benefit," Kuhlman said. ``But it's difficult for us to provide funds to them when there are so many questions about how they're handling funds."

Closed Doors

The foundation failed for years to detect an employee's $500,000 embezzlement of its funds, Kuhlman said. The Federal Bureau of Investigation has been investigating the crime, he said. FBI spokeswoman Debbie Weierman declined to comment.

It also failed to document its expenses, didn't have its books audited for three years, and awarded all its contracts without competition among potential bidders, the audit said.

``The foundation did not comply with the financial and program management standards and the procurement standards promulgated'' in federal regulations, according to the report made available Feb. 23.

America's Clean Water Foundation also violated conflict-of- interest rules by awarding a $50,000 contract without competition to the vice president of the board, the 32-page audit said.

The board member, Charles Grizzle, a Washington lobbyist who also was a fund-raiser for President George W. Bush's 2004 presidential campaign, said he didn't influence the award and recused himself from discussions of it. The contract was to set up a program for states to audit hog farms.

Books Not Audited

``I should have said, `You all find someone else to put this program together,'" Grizzle said in an interview today. ``Where it looks inappropriate, and I regret that, is that I don't recall filing a formal letter of recusal."

A lawyer for the group, Christopher Rissetto of the Reed Smith law firm in Washington, said he wouldn't discuss the audit findings because the EPA hasn't made a final decision on what to do about the recommendations.

``It's obvious we have different views," he said in an interview today. ``The public record is full of the foundation's fine'' work.

Rissetto also declined to comment about the performance of the group's former president and executive director, Roberta H. Savage, who made $149,000 a year, according to filings with the Internal Revenue Service.

`Positive or Negative'

``I'm not going to say anything positive or negative about Roberta," he said. Savage couldn't be reached for comment and Rissetto declined to provide her phone number or address.

The EPA has until June to decide whether to pursue any of the funds, Kuhlman said. The agency is likely to forward the issue to the U.S. Department of the Treasury, which will decide whether to pursue retrieval of the $25.2 million or write it off. One question that Treasury officials might have to address is from whom it would seek to collect the money, he said.

Since 2003, when Kuhlman began his job, the largest previous amount of grant money that the EPA has tried to recover for rule violations was about $1 million, he said. Auditors recommended that the EPA try to recover all $25.2 million awarded by the agency.

EPA told the group last year that it wouldn't get any more money until it documented its expenses, Kuhlman said. When America's Clean Water Foundation didn't provide documentation, the agency halted funding, and the group shut down.

95 Percent of Revenue

The grants accounted for 95 percent of the group's revenue, Kuhlman said.

America's Clean Water Foundation, which had revenue of $6.9 million in 2003, according to filings with the IRS, sponsored national commemorations of the 20th and 30th anniversaries of the 1972 Clean Water Act.

It also joined with the Smithsonian to celebrate annual National Water Monitoring Days, which got about 75,000 Americans to test their local water in 2002 and participate in other programs, according to a U.S. State Department announcement the next year.

Savage later got the United Nations to join in celebrating a World Water Monitoring Day, which drew people from 35 countries in 2004, according to an EPA announcement. Then-EPA Administrator Mike Leavitt helped celebrate the event by speaking at a Smithsonian facility in the Washington area.

DOE Sets Ethanol-Fuel Effort (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Department of Energy has kicked off a technological horse race to see which among six companies can produce a transportation fuel that is an alternative to corn-based ethanol, in commercial quantities, at a cost of around $1 a gallon.

Companies successful in producing low-cost ethanol could have first crack at a new fuel market that offers a domestic alternative to gasoline. Until then, the agency says it will pony up as much as $385 million to help the competitors, but how much each company gets will be negotiated later, based on their progress.

"This effort is a big deal," said Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, who estimated that the companies will commit a total of at least $1.2 billion to their ventures.

Since Congress has been slow in appropriating the agency's budget, an additional prize, promised by a $2 billion loan-guarantee program, has yet to be established. Most of the six companies, which will make ethanol from materials such as wood chips, orange peels, corn stalks and municipal garbage, have also applied to participate in that effort.

Congress approved aiding makers of so-called cellulosic ethanol in the Energy Policy Act of 2005. Cellulosic ethanol is made by extracting and distilling sugars from the woody fibers of plants, rather than from corn kernels, which makes the process much more difficult. President Bush has since made the program part of his goal to introduce 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels into the transportation sector to lessen U.S. dependence on imported oil.

Currently the U.S. produces about six billion gallons of ethanol. Mr. Bodman estimated that corn-based production could increase to 12 to 15 billion gallons, but farm experts worry that soaring demand for corn by ethanol refineries will push food and meat prices up to politically unacceptable levels.

DOE scientists and officials will determine who gets what portion of the funding. One competitor is the agency's National Renewable Energy Laboratory. It is teamed up with Broin Cos., of Sioux Falls, S.D., which plans to use enzymes to make ethanol out of corncobs and corn stalks at a plant near Emmetsburg, Iowa. Another partner in the venture is DuPont Co.

The other selected companies are:

-- Abengoa Bioenergy, a St. Louis, Mo., affiliate of Abengoa SA, a Spanish conglomerate that is the leading ethanol producer in Europe. The company has selected a Colwich, Kan., site for a plant that would use enzymes to make ethanol from corn stalks and wheat straw.

-- Alico Inc., a producer of citrus products and minerals. It plans to build a facility near its headquarters at LaBelle, Fla., which will use heat and chemicals to produce ethanol from orange peels and wood wastes.

-- BlueFire Ethanol Inc., an Irvine, Calif., company that is teamed with Waste Management Inc., to make ethanol out of selected garbage from municipal landfills, using sulfuric acid and steam. The company's first facility will be at a landfill in Corona, Calif.

-- Iogen Biorefinery Partners LLC, an Arlington, Va., affiliate of Ottawa-based Iogen Corp. It is teamed with Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and Royal Dutch Shell PLC to use an enzyme-based process to make ethanol from wheat and barley straw and other farm wastes at a site near Shelley, Idaho.

-- Range Fuels Inc., Broomfield, Colo., which has picked a site near Soperton, Ga., for a facility that will use heat and steam to make ethanol out of various forest wastes.

6 Get Grants From U.S. To Support Bio-Refineries (NYT)

Seeking to encourage motor fuel production from materials that are cheaper and more abundant than corn, the Energy Department said yesterday that it would provide up to $385 million in six bio-refinery projects that would produce cellulosic ethanol, a type of ethanol that can be made from nonfood crops and agricultural waste.

The awards, to be made over four years, are called for under the 2005 Energy Policy Act. They will advance President Bush's goals of making the cost of cellulosic ethanol competitive with gasoline by 2012 and of reducing America's gasoline consumption by 20 percent in 10 years, Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman said at a news conference in Washington.

Dozens of ethanol refineries that use corn are planned for construction over the next two years. But Mr. Bodman acknowledged yesterday that corn alone would not be enough to achieve the ambitious goal of taming what Mr. Bush has called America's "oil addiction."

Because of constraints on farmland and the need for corn in the food supply, corn-based ethanol can produce only up to 15 billion gallons of ethanol, less than half of the 35 billion gallons of renewable and alternative fuels the president set as a goal by 2017 in his State of the Union speech in January.

"Corn-based ethanol is already playing a key part in reducing our dependence on fossil fuels and mitigating the growth of greenhouse gases, but we cannot increase our use of corn grain indefinitely," Mr. Bodman said.

Ethanol made from corn has a small effect on greenhouse gases, but ethanol from cellulose cuts those gases sharply.

But cellulosic ethanol is still twice as expensive as corn-based ethanol, which has relied for many years on a 51-cent-a-gallon subsidy to be competitive with gasoline. For that reason, no company has yet to construct a commercial-scale cellulosic plant.

Mike Muston, executive vice president of Broin Companies, which won one of the awards, said Broin could produce cellulosic ethanol for $2.25 to $2.50 a gallon and expected to cut those costs to under $2 a gallon when it started its plant around 2010. Mr. Bodman said the long-range goal was to get costs down to $1 a gallon, which he said would put cellulosic ethanol in position to compete with "any technology in the world."

Yesterday's grants will help accelerate the nascent cellulosic industry, Mr. Muston said, allowing Broin, which is based in Sioux Falls, S.D., and its partner, DuPont, to push up construction on an expansion to its Emmetsburg, Iowa, plant by two to three years.

Lawrence J. Goldstein, an energy consultant and critic of corn-based ethanol, said the administration had no choice but to push hard to commercialize cellulosic ethanol. "They are throwing money where they ought to be throwing it because they know they can't get within shouting distance of their goal without a major, quick breakthrough in cellulosic," said Mr. Goldstein, a board member at the Energy Policy Research Foundation.

The awards will finance up to 40 percent of the projects, which are expected to total more than $1.2 billion. The projects, which are scattered from Florida to Kansas to California, aim to produce more than 120 million gallons of cellulosic ethanol a year.

The winning companies, in addition to Broin, are a Spanish company, Abengoa Bioenergy; Alico Inc., of LaBelle, Fla.; BlueFire Ethanol, based in Irvine, Calif.; the logen Corporation, of Canada; and Range Fuels, of Broomfield, Colo. Range Fuels is partly financed by Khosla Ventures, the Silicon Valley venture capital firm run by Vinod Khosla, an influential voice on ethanol in Washington.

The plants would use low-value materials like switch grass, wheat straw and wood chips.

Even with the new push by the Energy Department, Mr. Bodman said ethanol's future was not assured.

"We are unclear whether ethanol will be the winner," he said yesterday, referring to the search for a renewable energy source to replace petroleum. Bio-butanol, a crop-based fuel that is to be commercialized later this year by DuPont and the oil giant BP, "is an inherently better fuel," he said, because, unlike ethanol, it has as much energy for each gallon as gasoline does.

Bust Nets Drugs, $45 Million From Cartel (AP)

SAN DIEGO — Dozens of people accused of working for a Mexican drug cartel were arrested Wednesday in a multistate bust that has netted more than $45 million in cash and tons of cocaine, heroin and marijuana, federal officials said.

At least some of the drugs were carried over the U.S.-Mexico border on a bridge made from sandbags partially submerged in the Colorado River outside of Yuma, Ariz., authorities said. All the narcotics were sneaked into the country through the porous Southwest border exploited by cartel kingpin Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum, they said.

The 20-month sting, code-named "Operation Imperial Emperor," so far has swept up 402 of the cartel's suspected lieutenants and foot soldiers, including 66 on Wednesday who were arrested in California, Arizona and Illinois.

"Today's operation is a serious blow to one of the largest and most significant trafficking organizations," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a news conference in San Diego.

Cazares-Gastellum, also known as Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar, was indicted in the sting but remains in Mexico and was not arrested, officials said.

Authorities said the cartel employed U.S. citizens and Mexican nationals, who distributed the drugs in 23 states. They will face either federal or state charges.

Among the cache collected by the Drug Enforcement Administration were 27,229 pounds of marijuana; 9,512 pounds of cocaine; 705 pounds of methamphetamine; 227 pounds of pure methamphetamine, or "ice"; 11 pounds of heroin; $6.1 million in property and assets; and an estimated 100 weapons and 94 vehicles.

Authorities said the cartel shipped or drove metric tons of the drugs from Colombia and Venezuela to Mexico. From there, they were taken over the southwest border and broken down in Los Angeles, San Diego and other cities before being distributed nationwide.

The drugs were distributed in Nevada, Arizona, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Colorado, Georgia, Alabama, Arkansas, Kentucky, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Maryland, Texas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Illinois, Kansas, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, Washington and Oregon.

Multiagency Probe Nets Over 400 In Mexican Drug Ring (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

A long-term federal investigation into a Mexican drug-trafficking organization and its U.S.-based distribution cells has resulted in more than 400 arrests nationwide, including 66 who were taken into custody yesterday in California, Arizona, New York and Illinois.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said the multiagency probe known as "Operation Imperial Emperor" targeted the Mexico-based Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug cartel, which has been responsible for supplying multiton quantities of cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana monthly throughout the United States.

Mr. Gonzales said during a press conference in San Diego to announce the operation that the gang laundered millions of dollars of illicit profits.

"Today's actions deal a significant blow to the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug-trafficking organization," Mr. Gonzales said. "These arrests demonstrate what can be achieved when domestic and international law-enforcement partners team up against a common foe."

The 20-month probe, led by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, has netted $45.2 million in U.S. currency, 27,229 pounds of marijuana, 9,512 pounds of cocaine, 705 pounds of methamphetamine, 227 pounds of pure methamphetamine and 11 pounds of heroin, said DEA spokesman Rusty Payne.

The investigation also accounted for $6.1 million in property and assets, as well as 100 weapons and 94 vehicles, Mr. Payne said.

Federal or state charges were unsealed against 139 defendants in California, Arizona, Illinois and New York. With the 66 arrests yesterday, the total number of arrests during the course of the investigation rose to 400.

According to court papers, the Cazares-Gastellum organization contracted the transportation of narcotics to the United States by land, air and sea and metric-ton shipments were transported out of Colombia and Venezuela, through Central America to Mexico, by tractor-trailer, noncommercial vehicles and aircraft.

Once in Mexico, the papers said, the narcotics were transported into the United States through various points of entry on the Southwest border and broken down in Los Angeles and San Diego for later shipment across the country.

"The Cazares-Gastellum drug empire that rose to such heights of power in only two years, fell today at the hands of DEA and our partners," said DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy. "This sprawling drug domain, headquartered in Mexico, penetrated deep into all corners of this country."

DEA Busts Ring Accused Of Sending Tons Of Drugs To USA (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, Usa Today

USA Today, March 1, 2007

Federal agents arrested 66 people Wednesday in a multi-city sweep of an alleged drug ring that is accused of bringing five tons of cocaine a month into the USA, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced.

The Drug Enforcement Administration said leaders of the Cazares drug operation, headquartered in Mexico, have been indicted on charges of laundering money and trafficking in massive amounts of cocaine, marijuana and methamphetamine from Colombia, Venezuela and Mexico.

The drugs were sneaked into the USA via the southwest border with Mexico, the DEA said. The latest arrests bring to 402 the number of people charged in connection with the drug ring, the agency said.

The DEA said its nearly two-year investigation has resulted in the seizure of $45 million and thousands of pounds of marijuana and cocaine and hundreds of pounds of methamphetamine. Wednesday's arrests occurred in cities in California as well as Phoenix and Chicago.

The investigation began in 2005 when federal agents in Imperial County, Calif., stopped a pickup packed with marijuana, the DEA said. The find led federal agents to Victor Cazares-Gastellum, DEA spokesman Steve Robertson said.

Cazares and his operatives moved cocaine from Venezuela and Colombia through Central America and into Mexicali, court papers said. Traffickers drove the cocaine and other drugs over the border in tractor-trailers outfitted with secret compartments, according to the court papers.

The drugs were stashed in houses in California until they could be repackaged and moved to distributors throughout the country, court papers said.

Cazares controlled regional and street-level trafficking cells in Alabama, Arkansas, Arizona, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, Missouri, Nevada, New York, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Texas and Washington, the DEA said.

"Not only are they moving large amounts of cocaine, but also methamphetamine," Robertson said. "We've been seeing meth sources changing from local labs to Mexican superlabs."

Cazares remains in Mexico and has not been arrested, Robertson said. U.S. authorities will ask Mexican officials to execute a provisional arrest warrant, he said.

U.S. Seizes 18 Tons Of Drugs, Arrests 400 In Sweep (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, March 1, 2007

Feb. 28 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. authorities arrested more than 400 people and seized 18 tons of illegal drugs over the course of a 20-month investigation into a Mexican smuggling cartel, officials said.

Authorities arrested 66 people today, and they unsealed federal and state charges against 139 defendants in California, New York, Arizona and Illinois in connection with the probe, dubbed ``Operation Evil Emperor.'' The investigation targeted the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum cartel, which supplied cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana across the U.S., Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in San Diego.

``This sprawling drug domain, headquartered in Mexico, penetrated deep into all corners of this country,'' Drug Enforcement Administration chief Karen Tandy said in a statement. ``Today we ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure.''

The operation, led by the DEA, netted $45.2 million in U.S. currency, 27,229 pounds of marijuana, 9,512 pounds of cocaine and 705 pounds of methamphetamine, officials said. Also seized were about 100 weapons and 94 vehicles.

According to court filings, Cazares-Gastellum's organization shipped tons of narcotics from Columbia and Venezuela to Mexico. The drugs were then smuggled across the Southwestern border of the U.S. by land, sea and air.

Drugs from the cartel were sold in at least 23 states, prosecutors said.

More than 100 federal, state and local law enforcement agencies participated in the sweep.

Justice Department Announces $45 Million Multi-Ton Drug Bust Targeting Mexican Organization (FOX)

By Liza Porteus

Fox News, March 1, 2007

Feb. 28: DEA workers display roughly $3.5 million in money grabbed during the Justice Department's drug bust.

The Justice Department on Wednesday announced the largest drug bust in 10 years as it rounded up more than 400 members of a Mexico-based cartel distributing tons of cocaine, marijuana and methamphetamines in the United States.

"Operation Imperial Emperor" targeted the Mexico-based Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum, a.k.a. "Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar," drug trafficking organization, which Justice says has been responsible for supplying multi-ton quantities of cocaine, as well as large amounts of methamphetamine and marijuana, monthly to distribution cells throughout the United States.

The organization has also laundered millions of dollars generated from this illegal activity, according to the Justice Department.

"Today's actions deal a significant blow to the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug trafficking organization, whose members are accused of importing and distributing multi-ton quantities of cocaine and other illicit drugs to communities across the country on a monthly basis," Gonzales said. "These arrests demonstrate what can be achieved when domestic and international law enforcement partners team up against a common foe."

Federal or state charges were unsealed Wednesday morning against 139 defendants in California, Arizona, Illinois and New York.

The 20-month investigation led by the Drug Enforcement Administration and aided by more than 100 federal, state, local and foreign law enforcement agencies, has so far resulted in the seizure of approximately $45.2 million, 27,229 pounds of marijuana, 9,512 pounds of cocaine, 705 pounds of methamphetamine, 227 pounds of pure methamphetamine or "ice," and 11 pounds of heroin.

The investigation has also netted $6.1 million in property and assets, as well as roughly 100 weapons and 94 vehicles. The drug ring is based in Sinaloa, Mexico.

"What's key about this organization is they obviously were dealing in all types of drugs, which means their customers, their victims, were throughout the whole spectrum of U.S. society — rich, poor, old, young, the methamphetamine especially and what we've seen here is a new trend in past couple of years," Justice special agent-in-charge Steven Robertson told FOXNews.com. "This organization had cells, which are little distribution sub-groups based throughout the U.S."

Robertson, who said the bust is the largest in about a decade in terms of amount of drugs and assets seized, as well as number of arrests, said law enforcement is seeing a disturbing new trend in the world of narcotics.

In the past, meth was cooked in small toxic labs here in the United States, "where literally you could cook it on a hotplate in your apartment," Robertson said.

Some of the products being used to make meth — like ephedrine and pseudoephedrine products found in cold medicines — are normally ground up and put through a filtering and cooking process.

But The Combat Meth Act restricted the number of tablets a person can buy in one day, thus resulting in some regular cold medications to now be behind the counter at your local pharmacy.

The amount one person can buy is now limited to 3.6 grams, which is 146 30-milligram tablets during a 30-day period.

It's because of that restriction that makes making meth harder here in the United States, so, Mexican drug rings have seized that opportunity.

"Mexican drug trafficking organizations have realized 'ok, there's a new need,'" Robertson said.

So, drug cartels are cooking meth in what are called 'super labs' outside of the country, then smuggling the drugs into the United States through regular smuggling routes along the southern border.

"This organization branched out and was in fact moving significant amounts of meth, in addition to cocaine and marijuana," Robertson said.

According to court papers unsealed Wednesday, the Mexico-based organization contracted the transportation of drugs to the United States by land, air and sea. Metric ton shipments were transported out of Colombia and Venezuela, through Central America to Mexico, by tractor trailer, non-commercial vehicles, and aircraft.

Once in Mexico, the narcotics were transported into the United States through various border entries in the Southwest.

After arriving in the United States, the drug shipments would be broken down further in cities like Los Angeles and San Diego for further distribution in Nevada, Arizona, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Colorado, Georgia, Alabama, Arkansas, Kentucky, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Maryland, Texas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Illinois, Kansas, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, Washington and Oregon.

"The Cazares-Gastellum drug empire that rose to such heights of power in only two years, fell today at the hands of DEA and our partners," said DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy. "This sprawling drug domain, headquartered in Mexico, penetrated deep into all corners of this country. Today we ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure from its commanders and transportation coordinators to its local distribution cells across the country, stripped it of $45 million in cash, and tossed it into the dustbin of history."

Feds Announce Drug-cartel Bust, Seize 18 Tons Of Drugs (SDUT)

By By Angelica Martinez, Union-tribune Breaking News Team

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 28, 2007

SAN DIEGO – Federal authorities Wednesday arrested dozens of individuals across the country suspected of bringing 18 tons of illegal drugs into the United States, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said in an afternoon news conference here.

Members of the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug trafficking ring were awakened in the early morning hours by federal, state and local law enforcement agencies who served simultaneous arrest warrants as part of a 20-month-long investigation into the ring's operations, Gonzales and other federal officials said.

Gonzales said the Mexico-based organization acquired drugs from Colombia and Venezuela to Central America, then smuggled them into the United States from Mexico. Once in the U.S., the drugs were broken down into smaller shipments in such cities as Los Angeles and San Diego and disseminated to distribution cells in various states.

The ring supplied cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana monthly to its distributors by air, land and sea. Officials said it also laundered millions of dollars profited from the drug trafficking.

"The war on drugs is an ongoing challenge not just for the United States but for our neighbors and the rest of the hemisphere as well," Gonzales said. He added that "the drug smugglers we are fighting have no respect for national borders."

Advertisement The investigation resulted in the federal indictment of 19 individuals in federal court in San Diego. Those indicted include Mexican nationals and others with residences in Calexico and El Centro, officials said.

So far, nine of the 19 indicted defendants have been arrested. Gonzales said the head of the cartel was not among those arrested.

According to the indictments unsealed Wednesday, Cazares-Gastellum, who competed with the Arellano Felix cartel, was the head of the drug trafficking organization.

Defendants Jose Oscar Del Castillo-Gallardo, Carlos Cuevas Jr. and Sergio Kaiser-Chavez are accused of heading the transportation operations of cocaine between Mexico and the United States.

Other defendants are charged with conspiring to import and distribute the drugs.

Through the course of the investigation, officials made more than 400 arrests across the country – including the 66 people arrested Wednesday morning in California, Arizona, New York and Illinois, Gonzales said.

Authorities said they also seized

More than $45 million in U.S. currency;

9,400 pounds of cocaine;

8 pounds of heroin;

226 pounds of pure methamphetamine, also known as "ice,";

27,218 pounds marijuana ;

465 marijuana plants;

$5.3 million in non-cash assets, primarily real property;

61 vehicles;

83 firearms.

More than 100 agencies and foreign law enforcement officials participated in the investigation, called "Operation Imperial Emperor."

Obscure Mexican Cartel Busted Up (SDUT)

The San Diego Union-Tribune, March 1, 2007

A little-known Mexican drug trafficking organization, which operated without the notoriety of more violent rivals like the Arellano Félix gang, was taken down yesterday during a multistate bust announced in San Diego by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Investigators discovered the Cazares Gastellum cartel about two years ago in the border towns of the Imperial Valley. It was first thought to be a small operation but turned out to be a massive ring that moved a large portion of the U.S. cocaine supply from South America to a distribution center in San Diego to at least 23 states, officials said.

Sixty-six people were arrested in a predawn sting yesterday in San Diego, Calexico, El Centro, Brawley and elsewhere in California, Arizona and Illinois.

The 22-month sting, code-named "Operation Imperial Emperor," has netted 402 people suspected of working for the cartel, more than $45 million in cash and tons of cocaine, heroin and marijuana, said Gonzales, flanked by recently installed interim San Diego U.S. Attorney Karen Hewitt.

"Today's operation is a serious blow to one of the largest and most significant trafficking organizations," Gonzales said. "These arrests demonstrate what can be achieved when domestic and international law enforcement partners team up against a common foe."

Victor Emilio Cazares Gastellum, the alleged kingpin of the family-run cartel, was indicted by a San Diego grand jury Feb. 23 along with 18 of his suspected lieutenants and foot soldiers on drug, conspiracy and money laundering charges. Cazares remains in Mexico and has not been arrested; U.S. officials said they will immediately seek extradition of Cazares and others.

"The Cazares Gastellum drug empire that rose to such heights of power in only two years, fell today," said Karen P. Tandy, head of the Drug Enforcement Administration, the lead agency in the investigation. "This sprawling drug domain, headquartered in Mexico, penetrated deep into all corners of this country. Today we ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure ... and tossed it into the dustbin of history."

Cazares' top lieutenant and son-in-law, Jose Oscar Del Castillo Gallardo, from Sinaloa, was arrested Jan. 20 during a ski trip to Big Bear Lake, said San Diego prosecutor Michael Kaplan.

Castillo acted as a liaison between his father-in-law, the drug supplier and the head of the transportation arm, Carlos Cuevas Jr., of Calexico, who also was arrested Jan. 20, Kaplan said. Both were indicted in San Diego as well.

Officials said the group is an Arellano Félix rival that is aligned with traffickers Ismael "El Mayo" Zambada and Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman.

Guzman, based in Sinaloa, is alleged to be the country's most powerful drug leader. He escaped from a maximum-security prison in 2001 and is at large.

In San Diego – the base of the drug distribution network – five suspected Cazares cartel members were arrested yesterday in Otay Mesa and Paradise Hills at homes and a business, and agents seized three guns and five vehicles, said DEA Special Agent Dan Simmons. Fourteen others were taken into custody in the Imperial Valley, with $50,000 and 17 vehicles seized, Simmons said.

According to the indictment, Cazares' organization shipped tons of drugs from Colombia and Venezuela through Central America to Mexico. The narcotics were then smuggled across the Southwestern border.

The organization shared the hallmarks of other large cartels – operating as a corporation, using subcontractors to move the drugs via land, air and sea. They often hid drugs in sophisticated compartments in Chevrolet Avalanche pickups or tractor-trailers and drove them through border crossings in Calexico, Kaplan said.

But the group was unique for taking circuitous routes through the backcountry to move drugs, officials said. They crossed the border through the Imperial Sand Dunes, a popular spot with off-roaders, Kaplan said.

In one instance, traffickers carried drugs over the U.S.-Mexico border on a bridge created with sandbags submerged in the Colorado River outside Yuma, Ariz.

The group also behaved more like a business with cells that carried out specific tasks and were insulated from the other cells in case they were discovered. For instance, one lieutenant ran the transportation aspects, another the distribution.

It's difficult to say how long the cartel has operated, or when it began to dominate the trafficking market, Kaplan said.

"They're definitely a very sophisticated trafficking organization that moved overwhelmingly significant quantities of narcotics," he said. "It's not like they suddenly emerged yesterday. They've probably been around for a while, just undetected."

Kaplan said no evidence exists that the Cazares cartel used the violent methods of other groups. "But I'm not telling you it doesn't occur."

The investigation was so complex, with so many targets and so many agencies involved across the country, that it was coordinated by DEA headquarters in Washington, D.C. More than 100 federal, state and local law enforcement agencies participated in the sweep.

"This case went from a very small case to an enormous case with national implications," said Simmons of the San Diego DEA office. "A very small office in the Imperial Valley made a heck of a case with DEA."

9 Arrested In Drug Bust (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, February 28, 2007

Nine suspects from Northern California -- including Pinole, Hayward and Fairfield -- have been arrested in connection with an international drug trafficking and money-laundering ring, Drug Enforcement Administration officials said today.

The investigation -- spearheaded by the DEA's Oakland office and dubbed "Operation Imperial Emperor" -- targeted drug distribution cells and money-laundering networks of an organization led by Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar of Mexico, the DEA said.

Agents seized $1 million, 25 kilograms of cocaine, 21 pounds of "ice" methamphetamine, a ballistic vest, several assault weapons and four vehicles, including a Hummer and a Cadillac Escalade, authorities said.

The drugs had a street value of about $2.5 million, and Bay Area drug cells distributed as far as Atlanta, the DEA said.

The case began in February 2006 when DEA agents identified a number of Bay Area residents as having ties to an international ring, authorities said. Investigators kept track of suspects through electronic surveillance.

Investigators served search warrants in Tracy, King City, Modesto, Fairfield, Pinole, Hayward and San Leandro.

The Northern California suspects were identified as Edi Camacho, 33, his brother Juan Camacho, 35, their cousin, Misael Camacho, 31, all of Tracy; Aurielo Beltran-Leon, 33, of King City; his brother, Rene Beltran-Leon, 33, of Modesto; Veider Miguel Rodriguez, 40, of Hayward; Luis Manuel Sanchez-Aceves, 26, of Pinole; Cristobal Navarro, 42, of Fairfield; and Jesus Fernando Vega, 34, of Bakersfield.

Juan Camacho, Vega and Rodriquez already were in custody on unrelated drug charges.

Across the nation, 400 suspects were arrested as part of the investigation, including 66 people who were taken into custody today in California, Arizona and Illinois.

Investigators said the Cazares-Salazar organization contracted the transportation of drugs to the United States by land, air and sea.

The drugs were taken from Colombia and Venezuela and through Central America to Mexico. From there, the drugs were transported into the United States through various ports of entry on the Southwest border, authorities said.

Nationwide Drug Cartel Arrests Include Pinole Man (CCT)

By Scott Marshall

Contra Costa Times, February 28, 2007

PINOLE - A Pinole man was among dozens arrested in a nationwide investigation of a Mexico-based drug cartel in which more than $45 million worth cocaine, methamphetamine, heroin, and marijuana were seized, federal authorities announced today.

Luis Manuel Sanchez-Aceves, 26, of Pinole, was among nine people arrested statewide, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

In the California phase of the investigation, agents seized $1 million in cash; 25 kilograms, or 55 pounds, of cocaine; 21 pounds of "ice" methamphetamine; assault weapons; and four vehicles, including a Hummer and a Cadillac Escalade. The street value of the drugs was $2.5 million.

The 20-month investigation, code-named "Operation Imperial Emperor," has led to 402 arrests of the cartel's alleged lieutenants and foot soldiers, including 66 who were arrested today in California, Arizona, New York and Illinois.

The drugs were shipped or driven from Colombia to Venezuela and then to Mexico for distribution in 23 states.

The Arizona Republic, March 1, 2007

Seven drug-smuggling suspects were arrested and about $12 million worth of narcotics was seized in Arizona as part of a nationwide crackdown aimed at a Mexican smuggling cartel that crisscrossed the sand dunes near Yuma and built a submerged bridge across the Colorado River to avoid law enforcement.

Ramona Sanchez, a Drug Enforcement Administration spokeswoman in Phoenix, said seizures in the Yuma area included 28,000 pounds of marijuana, 93 pounds of cocaine, 4 pounds of methamphetamine and about 2 pounds of heroin.

"We got that much dope off the streets, and more importantly we disrupted the organization," Sanchez added. "They're out that much money, and it really does cripple them."

The enforcement in Arizona was tied to a nationwide campaign known as Operation Imperial Emperor, directed against a cartel headed by Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum, identified by the Justice Department as an international drug kingpin.

All told, there have been more than 400 arrests, including 66 that occurred Wednesday in four states.

In Yuma County, authorities launched a pair of investigations beginning in December 2005. One of those, dubbed Operation Cut Throat, targeted a cell that used motorcycles and dune buggies to cross the border through the Imperial Dunes area, mixing in with recreational riders.

The other sting, Operation River Warriors, focused on a group that built sandbag bridges beneath the surface of the Colorado River so that off-road vehicles could cross.

Investigators merged the probes after discovering they were dealing with a single cartel that also moved giant marijuana loads through border checkpoints in vehicles with hidden compartments.

Sanchez said the list of Arizona suspects includes two leaders of the River Warriors group who remain at large: Macedonio "Lolo" Guerrero, 33, and Francisco "Flaco" Olivarez Arvizu, age unknown. Both men have criminal histories, and are believed to be in Mexico.

When it was over, Timothy J. Landrum, the DEA's special agent in charge, said, "Arizona citizens are now safer as this organization lies in a shambles."

According to the Justice Department, the national crackdown netted $45 million in cash, 18 tons of narcotics and $6 million in assets. Indictments were unsealed in Arizona, California and Illinois. Defendants are charged with conspiracy, drug trafficking and other crimes.

In court papers, the Justice Department said Cazares-Gastellum's organization transported drugs from Colombia and Venezuela through Central America to Mexico by land, air and sea. The narcotics were then funneled into the United States, mostly via the Yuma area, before reaching transnational shipment points in Phoenix and Los Angeles.

More than 100 federal, state, local and foreign investigators took part in the task force. While the government has conducted successful drug-war crackdowns in the past, federal authorities were almost giddy about the success of Operation Imperial Emperor. In the words of DEA administrator Karen Tandy, "We ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure . . . and tossed it into the dustbin of history."

Yuma Sun, March 1, 2007

Seven people in the Yuma area were arrested Wednesday as part of what the federal government called the nationwide dismantling of an enormous Mexican narcotics operation.

Sixty-six people across the country were arrested Wednesday in the culmination of a 20-month investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and other law enforcement, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Forty agents executed eight search warrants at residences in Yuma, Somerton and San Luis, Ariz., arresting five people on federal charges and two on state charges. The seven men operated in two separate distribution cells here for the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum drug trafficking organization, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Liz Barrick.

Both cells smuggled large amounts of cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana into the United States during the past 14 months and likely longer, said Barrick. "The seizures alone indicate that they moved enormous quantities."

Barrick said many of the large drug seizures made by the Border Patrol were Cazares-Gastellum shipments. In most cases, the drugs would be brought into Yuma and kept at stash houses before being moved on to Phoenix or Los Angeles for further transport across the country.

The unique environmental conditions of the Imperial Sand Dunes and the Colorado River allowed the cells to successfully smuggle drugs by using 4-by-4 vehicles, sandbag bridges and hired lookouts, Barrick said. The ring also paid people to carry drugs through local ports of entry.

Barrick said since law enforcement has identified the techniques the cells used, their efforts in the future should be hampered. She said the arrests Wednesday certainly will curtail its operations. "There was no indication that they knew this takedown was coming," she said.

Those arrested and indicted on federal charges were Arnulfo Romero-Caro, 26; Ramces Urias-Valenzuela, 27; Aureliano Armando Martinez, 28; Isaac Ramirez-Valenzuela, 28; and Joise Guadalupe Ayala, 23. Fabriel Luna and Luis Mayorquin were arrested on state warrants.

Barrick said they will be taken to Phoenix to be arraigned on drug conspiracy charges in federal court.

"The Cazares-Gastellum drug empire that rose to such heights of power in only two years fell today at the hands of DEA and our partners," said DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy in a news release.

As part of the operation Wednesday in Yuma, agents seized five cellular phones, six vehicles, more than $8,000 in cash and money orders, various documents and small amounts of marijuana and cocaine.

During the full 14-month investigation in Arizona, authorities seized more than 28,000 pounds of marijuana, 93 pounds of cocaine, four pounds of methamphetamine, and more than two pounds of heroin, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Investigators searched for but did not find Macedonio Guerrero, 33, and Francisco Olivarez Arvizu, who have oustanding federal warrants. They are believed to be hiding in Mexico, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Agencies involved in the operation included Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Arizona Department of Public Safety, U.S. Border Patrol, Federal Bureau of Investigation, U.S. Attorney's Office, Yuma County Attorney's Office, Yuma Police Department, Yuma County Sheriff's Office and La Paz County Sheriff's Office.

Drug Ring Busted: 'Operation Imperial Emperor' Seizes Cash, Drugs (ABC)

ABC News, February 28, 2007

It was quite a haul: $45.2 million in cash, 27,229 pounds of marijuana, 9,512 pounds of cocaine, 705 pounds of methamphetamine, 227 pounds of pure methamphetamine, also known as "ice," and 11 pounds of heroin — that's what the government said it seized during a nearly two-year investigation into a massive drug operation based in the southwestern United States.

In addition to the drugs, the government said it confiscated $6.1 million in property and assets, approximately 100 weapons, and 94 vehicles during the investigation.

The Department of Justice investigation, headed by the Drug Enforcement Agency in cooperation with more than 100 local, state, federal and foreign law enforcement agencies, conducted Operation Imperial Emperor, which resulted in more than 400 arrests nationwide, including the 66 made today.

An indictment unsealed today charges that Victor Cazares-Gastellum, believed to be on the run in Mexico as "the head of a large-scale distribution organization [Cazares Organization] that sends metric ton quantities of cocaine from Mexico into the United States."

A grand jury also handed down indictments to alleged members of the Cazares Organization, to drivers, lookouts, recruiters and those who loaded the vehicles on conspiracy charges relating to importing and distributing the drugs, as well as money laundering.

Investigators claim the smugglers stashed drugs and money in hidden compartments in cars and trucks, as well as in toys and musical instruments. In an aggressive move, the smugglers built a bridge made of sand bags across the Colorado River near Yuma, Ariz., which allowed them to simply drive across the waterway.

Authorities say the drugs, after being transported to the United States by land, air and sea, were distributed to at least 23 states after they were processed by the drug ring in California.

DEA administrator Karen P. Tandy said the Cazares Organization rose to power quickly, but by attacking the agency where it hurt the most, the government was able to cripple the cartel.

"This sprawling drug domain, headquartered in Mexico, penetrated deep into all corners of this country," said Tandy. "Today we ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure from its commanders and transportation coordinators to its local distribution cells across the country, stripped it of $45 million in cash, and tossed it into the dustbin of history."

Feds Arrest Hundreds, Seize Cash, Drugs In Raid (NBCSD)

SAN DIEGO -- Federal agents have broken up a suspected Mexican drug cartel, resulting in the seizure of tens of millions of dollars in cash, thousands of pounds of drugs and hundreds of arrests, the U.S. attorney general announced Wednesday

Federal agents have broken up a suspected Mexican drug cartel, resulting in the seizure or tens of millions of dollars in cash, thousands of pounds of drugs and hundreds of arrests, the U.S. attorney general announced Wednesday.

At a news conference in San Diego, Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez said the multistate bust netted more than $45 million worth of cocaine, heroin, marijuana and methamphetamine.

The 20-month sting, code-named "Operation Imperial Emperor," began in June 2005 by targeting a cocaine distribution network based in San Diego and Imperial county, Gonzalez said.

Cazares-Gastellum, also known as Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar, was indicted in the sting but not arrested, officials said.

The bust swept up 402 of the cartel's alleged lieutenants and foot soldiers, including 66 on Wednesday who were arrested in California, Arizona and Illinois. Agents targeted two houses in El Centro and raided homes in El Centro and Calexico.

The DEA believes most of the drugs were smuggled across the border from Mexicali using vehicles with hidden compartments as opposed to drug tunnels.

Officials said the drugs were broken into smaller shipments in San Diego and Los Angeles, where they were then transported across the country.

At least some of the drugs were carried over the U.S.-Mexico border on a bridge made from sandbags partially submerged in the Colorado River outside of Yuma, Ariz., authorities said.

The totals of drugs seized in the bust include 27,000 pounds of marijuana, 95,000 pounds of cocaine, more than 700 pounds of meth, 227 pounds of ice or pure meth, 11 pounds of heroin, and $6.1 million in property and assets.

KPBS, February 28, 2007

Federal authorities arrested 66 people in California and other states Wednesday in connection with a Mexican drug smuggling cartel. Law enforcement authorities say the alleged cartel leader remains at large. KPBS Reporter Amy Isackson has the story.

Federal court documents say the cocaine smuggling cartel rose to power in Mexico during the last two years. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who was in San Diego, says the Cazares Cartel transported tons of cocaine from Columbia and Venezuela through Mexico, and then across the border to California. He says the group then broke the shipments down into more manageable loads for distribution to 23 U.S. states. Gonzales believes the leader, Victor Emilio Cazares, is still in Mexico.

Gonzales: We're hopeful that there will be an arrest in the future and when that occurs, we of course will be seeking an extradition from the Mexican authorities.

Gonzales says they seized $45 million, 27,000 pounds of marijuana and more than 9,000 pounds of cocaine. He says the Cazares Cartel competed with the Arellano-Felix cartel. Four hundred people have been arrested in connection with the Cazares organization during the 20-month-long investigation.

US Announces Major Drug Arrests (BBC)

BBC News, March 1, 2007

The authorities in the United States say they have arrested more than 400 people and seized 18 tonnes of drugs.

US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the arrests had been carried out over a 20-month period throughout the country, in Operation Imperial Emperor.

He said the network had been successfully dismantled and added that the success of the operation showed what co-operation could achieve.

Mr Gonzales said the ring - allegedly run by Victor Emilio Cazares Gastellum - distributed cocaine, marijuana and other drugs throughout the United States.

Mexico has been fighting drugs-related violence

Speaking in San Diego, he said that the US authorities had made 66 arrests in recent days across four states.

The US authorities say that some of the drugs were transported into the US across a bridge made of sandbags, partly submerged in the Colorado River near Yuma, Arizona.

As well the drugs Operation Imperial Emperor seized $6.1m in property and assets, about 100 weapons and 94 vehicles.

The news comes as the United Nations reported that Mexican cartels now dominate drugs trafficking in the US.

Last year, Mexico saw more than 2,000 people die in violence relating to drugs cartels. Some of the victims were tortured or beheaded.

Arrests Reflect A New Focus On Fighting Steroid Sales (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore, Serge F. Kovaleski And Duff Wilson

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

ALBANY, Feb. 28 — The arrests of four people in Florida on Tuesday and the indictments of at least six doctors around the country linked to a pharmacy in Orlando, Fla., present striking evidence that authorities in several states have opened a new front in the war against illegal online sales of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs.

Albany County prosecutors, working with federal investigators and Florida officials, have linked 11 doctors to the pharmacy. Six face felony charges that they wrote prescriptions to patients they had never met.

The pharmacy, Signature Pharmacy, has dispensed thousands of prescriptions in recent years and has sold tens of millions of dollars' worth of controlled substances nationwide, including at least $10 million in New York State, the authorities said.

Signature sold a variety of medications and supplements, some of them prescribed or provided legally, according to the officials. They described the typical Signature customer as a well-off man in early middle age, but confirmed that the clientele included people whom the Albany County district attorney described only as "celebrities."

It remains unclear who those people were or what they bought, although The Times Union of Albany has reported that professional athletes were among the customers of Signature and at least one other online pharmacy that is under investigation.

Law enforcement officials said that investigators were still sorting through thousands of prescription orders for customers in Albany County and elsewhere, part of a vast haul of evidence taken Tuesday during the raids at two Signature offices in Florida and during the investigation.

The Albany County district attorney, P. David Soares, emphasized in a news conference on Tuesday that his investigation would focus on doctors and pharmacists — the suppliers and distributors for the illegal drug network — rather than on buyers.

"A business like this doesn't work unless you have other participants, including doctors, who have parted company with their oath," Mr. Soares said.

One of the doctors indicted, Anna Maria Santi, 68, of Queens, lost her medical license eight years ago after a string of offenses, including drinking while practicing and giving anesthesia to a patient who died during a procedure. But she continued providing prescriptions to Signature and other Internet pharmacies for years, under variations of her name and those of at least one other doctor, before her arraignment in Albany in February, the authorities said.

The names of the other doctors are in sealed indictments and have not been made public. But a law enforcement official with knowledge of the investigation said the remaining doctors — who live in New York and other states — would be arrested in the coming days, along with pharmacists and other people connected to the ring. The goal, the official said, is to shut down the entire drug network connected to Signature.

Meanwhile, two officials of a Mobile, Ala.-based pharmacy services firm have been indicted by an Albany County grand jury, according to one of the law enforcement officials with knowledge of the investigation. It was unclear on Wednesday whether those officials or the company were linked to Signature.

Travis T. Tygart, general counsel for the United States Anti-Doping Agency, described the investigation and arrests as "the logical next step in getting at these drugs."

"It is a natural outgrowth of BALCO and stiffer sentencing guidelines involving the illegal distribution of these performance-enhancing drugs," Mr. Tygart said, referring to the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative case, in which six people were convicted of helping distribute anabolic steroids to athletes.

A track coach, Trevor Graham, and an Olympic cyclist, Tammy Thomas, have been charged with making false statements, and a grand jury is continuing to investigate whether the baseball player Barry Bonds committed perjury.

Mr. Tygart added, "Many people have seen these as professional athlete drugs, but they are also middle America, white-collar, feel-good and get-buff drugs."

The arrests in Florida, which involved at least 20 branch offices of state, local and federal law enforcement agencies, were only one prong of a series of overlapping investigations into the underworld of Internet drug sales. Law enforcement officials described the investigations as cooperative, with different agencies keeping in regular contact and assisting each other as local investigations sprouted leads in other states.

In 2005, in the largest steroid enforcement action in United States history, charges were filed against 23 people and eight Mexican manufacturers and veterinary companies that federal prosecutors said were responsible for 80 percent of the steroids illegally used in the United States.

Since then, the authorities say, more illegal performance drugs have been coming to the United States from China and Eastern Europe. More are finding their way to users through pharmacies, often operating on the Internet, and through doctors who find ways to write prescriptions to skirt the law.

Anabolic steroids are illegal for any human use. While human growth hormone is legal for only a handful of medical uses, violations of the law have rarely been punished.

Mr. Soares's investigation into Internet drug sales began two years ago in Albany County, but quickly became linked to inquiries in other states.

In November 2005, law enforcement officials from several states, including New York and Florida, and federal authorities held a pivotal meeting to discuss ways to better coordinate the investigations into illegal online sales of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs.

In Rhode Island, for instance, a task force within the Food and Drug Administration's office of criminal investigations began an examination in August 2005 into whether two New York doctors and the owner of a pharmaceutical company in New Jersey had illegally prescribed anabolic steroids and human growth hormones. A significant percentage of the business's customers were in Rhode Island.

Soon after the November meeting, a knowledgeable law enforcement official said, the Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation, a multi-agency task force in Florida made up of federal, state and local authorities, was assigned to help the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the state in their inquiry into Signature Pharmacy in Orlando. About six months later, Florida investigators and law enforcement from New York State learned that they were all investigating Signature and linked up.

"The M.B.I. and a group of agents from the D.E.A. were conducting a separate investigation into the online sales of steroids and human growth hormones, and at some point the investigators crossed paths with their New York counterparts," Lt. Carl Metzger of the Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation's Orlando office said in a telephone interview Wednesday.

More than half a year after that, New York law enforcement authorities and investigators with the Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation carried out Tuesday's raid on Signature, along with the D.E.A. and representatives of the New York Bureau of Narcotics, among others.

Mr. Metzger and other law enforcement officials said that the arrests were led by New York investigators because Mr. Soares's investigation was more advanced than local inquiries, and because New York, unlike most states, punishes illegal prescription sales as felonies.

"New York was in a position to make the arrests since they were a little further along and more advanced in their investigation, and we were in a position to issue the search warrants," Mr. Metzger said.

Ms. Santi was also indicted in February in Rhode Island on charges of illegal drug distribution, health care fraud and money laundering, along with Daniel McGlone, 54, of North Brunswick, N.J. Victor Mariani, a New York doctor, is named in the indictment but is charged separately with participating in the same conspiracy. The three are accused of running a scheme to illegally prescribe anabolic steroids and human growth hormones.

Steroids' Reach Grows (ALBANYTU)

By Pete Iorizzo, Staff Writer

Albany Times Union, February 28, 2007

Link to athletes not a surprise

Clarification: An earlier version of this story incorrectly reported several athletes were linked to Signature Pharmacy in Orlando. In fact, the names of former professional boxer and heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield, Los Angeles Angels center fielder Gary Matthews Jr., and retired baseball star Jose Canseco, an admitted steroid user, were allegedly included on customer lists for Applied Pharmacy Services in Mobile, Ala., whose two owners have been indicted by an Albany County grand jury.

Tuesday's raid of an Orlando, Fla., pharmacy accused of trafficking performance-enhancing drugs over the Internet may prove to be one of the most significant steroids busts in history, a leading expert said.

Sources said the investigation, led by Albany County District Attorney David Soares' office, revealed that Signature Pharmacy customers included several former and current professional athletes.

Among those linked to the company were former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley and a team doctor for the Pittsburgh Steelers.

In a related case in Mobile, Ala., two owners of Applied Pharmacy Services have been indicted by an Albany County grand jury. Their customer list allegedly includes former professional boxer and heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield, Los Angeles Angels center fielder Gary Matthews Jr., and retired baseball star Jose Canseco, an admitted steroid user.

More names of professional athletes, college athletes and even high school coaches may surface as the investigation continues.

"This has the potential to be a huge story," said Gary Wadler, a physician and member of the World Anti-Doping Agency's prohibited list and methods committee. "The question is, will it result in actions that try to deal with this problem?"

Steroids long has been a salient issue in sports, from stories in the 1950s about weightlifters using testosterone to the 2005 congressional hearings about performance-enhancing drugs in baseball. But rare is the instance when so many high-profile athletes across different sports are connected to an accused steroids provider.

Representatives for the athletes alleged to be customers of the pharmacy said they only learned about the investigation Tuesday.

Tim Mead, the Angels' vice president for communications, said he informed Matthews Jr. about the Times Union report before a spring training game Tuesday.

"There's nothing much to say," Mead said. "A name is mentioned. It's sketchy at best. Certainly as we acquire more information, we'll look into it."

Matthews Jr., a 32-year-old veteran, signed a $50 million contract with the Angels this past off-season. He enjoyed a career year in 2006, batting .313 and hitting 19 home runs for the Texas Rangers.

The agents for Matthews Jr. and Grimsley declined comment, as did a spokesman for Major League Baseball.

Representatives from the Steelers, as well as the doctor, repeatedly declined comment when contacted over the past two weeks.

NFL spokesman Greg Aiello said, "We just became aware of this, and we will look into it."

A spokesman for Holyfield said when the former heavyweight champion was asked about Signature Pharmacy, Holyfield said he never heard of the company.

Holyfield, 44, is slated to fight Vinny Maddalone on March 17 in Corpus Christi, Texas.

Wadler, an associate professor at the New York University School of Medicine and lead author of the book "Drugs and the Athlete," said he wasn't taken aback by the revelations. He said because of poor testing standards in professional sports, athletes only tend to be caught when their names surface in connection with trafficking stings.

"Does this surprise me? No," Wadler said. "It's almost an inevitability."

Links between steroids and sports can be traced to the world's first organized competitions, when ancient Greek wrestlers ate meat for weeks to build muscle. By the 1950s, athletes experimented with testosterone. And during the 1980s, a black market for performance-enhancing drugs ballooned, leading to some of the first anti-doping policies in professional and Olympic sports.

Today, both the NFL and MLB test for some performance-enhancing drugs and outline penalties for those caught doping. But even with stricter rules and more public awareness, questions shroud some of the sports world's predominant figures.

Wadler said he believes more athletes than the public might guess use performance-enhancing drugs.

"I'm very sad to say, none of this surprises me anymore," he said.

Steroid Raids Net 4 In Orlando (OS)

Orlando Sentinel, February 28, 2007

The four people arrested as part of a raid on two Orlando pharmacies face a court appearance on Thursday morning, officials said today.

Authorities raided the pharmacies Tuesday and arrested the four as part of a nationwide probe into the illegal distribution of steroids. A hearing is scheduled for 9 a.m.

The case, being led by a prosecutor in New York, involves doctors, pharmacists and business owners who have been, or will be, arrested in Florida, New York and Texas. Sealed indictments charge them with various felonies on suspicion of unlawfully distributing steroids and other drugs, according to Albany County District Attorney David Soares.

At a brief news conference Tuesday evening, Soares repeatedly refused to say whether professional athletes were involved as consumers of the drugs.

Ultimately, he conceded: "There are celebrities involved in this case. They are not our priority." Arrested in Orlando were Naomi Loomis, 33, of Windermere, founder and chief executive officer of Signature Compounding Pharmacy; her husband, Robert "Stan" Loomis, 55, chief operating officer; Kenneth "Mike" Loomis, 59, of Orlando, head compounding pharmacist and Stan Loomis' brother; and Kirk Calvert, 37, of Winter Park, director of business development for the pharmacy. All four were charged with 20 identical felony counts, including insurance fraud and criminal diversion of prescription medications. They are being held without bail at the Orange County Jail.

Soares said the Orlando raids were part of a two-year probe of drug trafficking over the Web.

Here's how it worked: Customers would search the Internet for Web sites that would put them in touch with doctors who prescribed drugs ranging from oxycodone to anabolic steroids without a doctor's visit. Soares said pharmacies such as Signature helped fill the prescriptions.

The prosecution of a doctor in Albany County who wrote some of the illegal prescriptions helped authorities track illicit prescription and steroid dealing, he said.

"A business like this doesn't work unless you have other participants, including doctors who have parted company with their oath, doctors who will, in fact, prescribe drugs, steroids without ever visiting with a patient. It requires that kind of participation," Soares said.

Soares said court records remain sealed in the case, that it was at a "sensitive stage" and more arrests were expected in Florida and elsewhere. A hearing on extradition is not yet set.

Central Florida's Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Internal Revenue Service, New York State Bureau of Narcotic Enforcement and other federal and state health and law-enforcement agencies participated in the daylong search at Signature Compounding Pharmacy. Agents raided the Signature locations at 1200 Kuhl Ave. in Orlando and 2304 Aloma Ave. in Winter Park, seizing drugs and dozens of boxes of documents.

There were no court documents available in New York or Florida on Tuesday to give more insight into the case. But on its Web site Tuesday, the Times Union of Albany, which first reported the story, described the case as one that could expose widespread steroid use by athletes, celebrities and thousands of people across the nation.

The newspaper cited some court records unavailable to other media and had a reporter and photographer in Orlando when the raid took place.

Numerous calls to the Albany County District Attorney's Office were not returned Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0138582

Florida Chief Assistant Statewide Prosecutor Rick Bogle on Tuesday said his Orlando office along with MBI and other federal agencies were merely "assisting" New York authorities and had not filed any Florida criminal charges against the defendants. Bogle said a local state judge signed the two sealed search warrants that were used to raid Signature locations.

Compounding pharmacies make customized prescription medicines that are not available at traditional drugstores. According to its Web site, which had been taken down by Tuesday, Signature Compounding Pharmacy claimed it is leading the way in the "timeless search for a true fountain of youth."

Stan, Naomi and Mike Loomis are listed as licensed pharmacists on the company Web site. Stan Loomis' biography also states he served as director of pharmacy for the "prestigious" Orlando Regional Healthcare System for some time.

Mike Loomis is described as the "head compounding pharmacist" and "director of laboratory services." The brothers once owned and operated Loomis Drugs, a local drugstore chain that they sold in 1989.

Calvert, according to Signature's Web site, is director of business development.

"We focus primarily on age management products and services that relate primarily to hormones for both men and women," he said. "We work with a physician to tailor a dose or specific product for a patient."

Although affidavits in the arrests have not been made public, Signature Pharmacy was mentioned in a federal indictment filed last week in Rhode Island.

The document charges two people with conspiracy, illegal distribution of human-growth hormone and other steroids as well as health-care fraud. It also states Daniel McGlone of American Pharmaceutical Group in New Jersey peddled the drugs to bodybuilders and used Signature to fill prescriptions written by unlicensed or retired physicians.

"McGlone would forward these prescriptions via facsimile or mail to various large compounding pharmacies, including primarily Signature Pharmacy . . . to deliver human growth hormone, anabolic steroids and other prescription medications to customers all over the United States," the indictment reads.

While agents sealed off the building, several unsuspecting customers were turned away as they tried to fill prescriptions.

An Orlando couple, whose premature son was born three weeks ago, said their doctor sent them to Signature on Tuesday.

"We need the prescription and [to] learn how to use it before we can take him home," said Erik Garbus, 29, the father.

Steroids, HGH And Records Seized In Orlando Raid (MCT)

McClatchy Newspapers, February 28, 2007

ORLANDO, Fla. - With BALCO still churning on the West Coast, a new front on the steroid war opened in the East on Tuesday when law-enforcement officers raided two Orlando pharmacies and seized steroids, human growth hormone and records that could connect those drugs to dozens of athletes.

In a raid led by the Albany (N.Y.) County District Attorney's office, officers from several Florida and national agencies arrested four employees of Signature Compounding Pharmacies Tuesday and charged them in an alleged scheme to provide steroids and growth hormone over the Internet.

A source told the Daily News that another pharmacy outside of Florida will be raided in the near future, and that Tuesday's action was related to recent arrests at a Mobile, Ala., pharmacy.

The Albany Times-Union, which broke news of the raids Tuesday, reported that drugs from the Mobile lab were allegedly received by former heavyweight boxing champion Evander Holyfield, Los Angeles Angels outfielder Gary Matthews Jr., former slugger and best-selling author Jose Canseco and former major league pitcher Jason Grimsley, whose home was raided last year by IRS agents.

The paper also said an investigator flew to Pittsburgh last month to ask a Steelers physician why, in 2006, he allegedly used a personal credit card to buy $150,000 in testosterone and human growth hormone.

"I think this is going to put a significant dent in distribution," Albany DA David Soares said.

When agents raided Signature's primary pharmacy, a three-story building a block from the Orlando Regional Medical Center, at about 9:30 a.m. Tuesday, employees had cards at their desks instructing them to call a number of lawyers in the event of a DEA or FDA raid.

"Apparently they were expecting it," said Lt. Carl Metzger of the Florida Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation. "If they're truly innocent and just going about their business, it's a strange thing to have."

Several raids and arrests were pending, one source close to the investigation said, adding, "This is really the first of two waves."

Clients included MLB and NFL players, as well as bodybuilders and celebrities, the source said.

DOJ_NMG_0138583

According to the source, as many as 50 doctors and pharmacists may be indicted by the time the case is complete, but the professional clients who received drugs are not targets, Soares said. Three "distributors" from Sugarland, Tex., were also arrested, he said.

"The involvement of athletes and celebrities makes this a sexy story, but I assure you at this point that that is not our focus," he said.

Soares would not say how many targets there were in the investigation, but when asked if it could be "scores," he said, "scores is a safe word."

Approached by a Daily News reporter in New York, Holyfield shook his head when asked about the report. Pat English, the attorney for Holyfield's promotion company Main Events, called the accusation "bull----."

"I've known Evander 20-something years. Plain bull----," English said. "And by the way, he's been regularly tested (for steroids) when he fights in Vegas."

Matthews' agent, Scott Leventhal, did not return several calls for comment. Canseco's attorney, Robert Saunooke, said his client obviously has admitted his steroid use, but doubts he ever ordered anything over the Internet.

"My understanding is every time Jose did steroids, he got them through either a teammate or somewhere at the gym or a doctor. All his (prescriptions) he's had in recent years have been through doctors.

"He does take testosterone now because one side effect of taking them so long is that he's got low testosterone levels," Saunooke said. "I would doubt very seriously that Jose bought any prescriptions online. The reason I would doubt that is because he doesn't know how to use a computer. Just getting him to check my E-mails is next to impossible."

At Signature's Orlando location Tuesday, police arrested pharmacy founder Stan Loomis, his wife, pharmacy CEO Naomi Loomis, Loomis' brother, Michael and Kirk Calvert, an officer in the company. The three Loomises are licensed pharmacists.

Law-enforcement agents spent the day cataloging, packing and loading boxes of files onto a U-Haul truck parked in front of the building. Several large metal filing cabinets were loaded, as well as a computer hard drive that a source described as "crucial" to the investigation.

All four defendants will be arraigned Wednesday while Soares seeks to have them extradited to New York for prosecution on felony charges of criminal diversion of prescription medication and prescriptions, criminal sale of controlled substances and insurance fraud.

Under the alleged scheme, they were part of a system in which clients would log onto a Web site, request drugs, then have their requests forwarded to a physician who would write a prescription for whatever the client wanted.

That prescription was then allegedly filled by Signature or other pharmacies under investigation.

"That's illegal," Soares said.

Soares said the investigation began two years ago, when his officer prosecuted a Rome, N.Y., emergency room physician named David W. Stephenson. Stephenson, who was sent to the Albany County Correctional Facility, received drugs from Signature, Soares said.

A source said that investigators worked closely with the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency over the past two years.

USADA legal director Travis Tygart would not comment on whether his organization was involved, but speaking generally, he said, "We have always known that doctors, coaches and even companies illegally prey on our athletes to use drugs in order to win at all costs."

First BALCO, Now An East Coast Steroid Scandal (AP)

The West Coast had BALCO. Now the East Coast could be in the midst of its own steroid scandal.

An illicit steroid distribution network, which may be responsible for Internet sales of performance-enhancing drugs nationwide, has been targeted by an upstate New York prosecutor. Customers reportedly included Los Angeles Angels outfielder Gary Matthews Jr., former heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield and former baseball star Jose Canseco.

"We have investigated, and are prosecuting, one of the largest narcotics and steroid distributors in the nation," P. David Soares, district attorney of Albany County, N.Y., said in a statement Wednesday.

His comments came a day after federal and state agents raided two pharmacies in Orlando, Fla. So far, eight people in three states have been arrested, and prosecutors say 24 could face felony charges by the time their investigation is over.

Former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley and a doctor for the Pittsburgh Steelers were reportedly linked to Signature Pharmacy in Orlando, according to the Times Union of Albany, which first disclosed the widespread investigation.

The paper also said Matthews, Canseco and Holyfield were allegedly on the customer list of Applied Pharmacy Services in Mobile, Ala., whose two owners have been indicted by an Albany County grand jury.

DOJ_NMG_0138584

SI.com, meanwhile, reported that Matthews allegedly was sent Genotropin, a brand of synthetic growth hormone, in August 2004. The drug, which came from Applied Pharmacy, was sent to the address in Mansfield, Texas, of one of Matthews' former minor league teammates, according to the Internet site.

Matthews, speaking to reporters at the Angels' spring training camp in Mesa, Ariz., said he wasn't "in a position to answer any specific questions."

"I do expect it to resolve itself here in the near future. ... Until we get more information, I just can't comment on it," he said.

Canseco's attorney, Robert Saunooke, told The Associated Press he would be surprised if the former slugger had been a client.

"I would find it highly unlikely," he said. "All the steroids that he got were prescribed to him or were from people in the gym. There's never been anything he's gotten online."

A message left with Holyfield was not immediately returned. Grimsley's agent, Joe Bick, declined comment, and his attorney did not return a phone call.

Investigators say they've found evidence that testosterone and other performance-enhancing drugs may have been fraudulently prescribed to users who included professional and college athletes.

"We've known for a long time that coaches, doctors, even companies prey and enable our athletes to use drugs against the rules," Travis Tygart, counsel for the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency, said. "It's these types of national law enforcement efforts that will be most successful in bringing the manufacturers and distributors of these drugs to their knees.

"And that's good for all of sports and our athletes."

Soares has refused to answer most questions about the case, which involves sealed indictments. But he did say his two-year investigation began after an Albany doctor was arrested for allegedly trafficking in narcotics online.

"I understand that the involvement of athletes and celebrities makes this a sexy story, but I assure you we are not, at this point, we are not concerned with the celebrity factor," Soares said Tuesday in Orlando, where federal and state agents raided two Signature Pharmacy stores and arrested four company officials.

And that's what makes this latest steroid investigation so significant, doping officials said.

BALCO involved some of the biggest names in sports — Barry Bonds, Marion Jones and Jason Giambi — as well as "designer" steroids, performance-enhancing drugs concocted specifically for elite athletes. But its scope largely has been limited to the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, those who worked there and those got performance-enhancing drugs from there.

The Albany investigation, though — coupled with federal charges filed last week in a similar probe in Providence, R.I. — is targeting the distribution networks that supply steroids to big-name and no-name users throughout the country. And it's focusing squarely on operations that peddle their illegal wares over the Internet.

According to Albany prosecutors, Signature Pharmacy repeatedly filled prescriptions even though it knew they were not the result of face-to-face meetings between doctor and patient, a violation of New York law.

"Historically, people who abuse these things were fearful of drug testing," said Dr. Gary Wadler, a member of the World Anti-Doping Agency. "Now they've got to be fearful not only of drug testing, they've got to be fearful of law enforcement. ... `Are the persons I'm getting it from under some federal investigation and am I going to get snagged?'

"I'm quite confident that this had nothing to do with the investigation of athletes," Wadler added. "It happened to deal with an investigation of a doctor or pharmacist and, lo and behold, there were people's names. They weren't targets. They're collateral, if you will."

Officials from the Food and Drug Administration questioned the doctor for the Pittsburgh Steelers about hormone purchases from the Orlando pharmacy.

The Times Union reported that Dr. Richard Rydze was asked about his purchase last year of about $150,000 in testosterone and human growth hormone. The purchase was made on Rydze's personal credit card.

"There is no evidence that Dr. Rydze prescribed or provided any hormone treatments to any of our players," Steelers president Art Rooney II said. "Dr. Rydze has assured me that this has never happened and will never happen."

Meanwhile, the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center said it was investigating the purchase made by Rydze, who works there.

"We have initiated an internal review and at this time we have no further factual information or comment," said Susan Manko, a UPMC spokeswoman.

During the raid in Orlando, investigators seized drugs, including anabolic steroids and human growth hormone, said Carl Metzger, narcotics commander for Orlando's Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation.

Testing for performance-enhancing drugs can only go so far -- and nab so many people. Bring state and federal law-enforcement officials in, and it could change the landscape of the anti-doping fight.

Illicit steroid distribution networks, which may be responsible for Internet sales of performance-enhancing drugs nationwide, have been targeted by prosecutors in upstate New York and Rhode Island. Customers reportedly included Los Angeles Angels outfielder Gary Matthews Jr., former heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield and former baseball star Jose Canseco, as well as a doctor for the Pittsburgh Steelers.

"We've known for a long time that coaches, doctors, even companies prey and enable our athletes to use drugs against the rules," Travis Tygart, general counsel for the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency, said Wednesday. "It's these types of national law enforcement efforts that will be most successful in bringing the manufacturers and distributors of these drugs to their knees.

"And that's good for all of sports and our athletes."

Testing may expose athletes who cheat, but it does little to punish those who make, market and distribute performance-enhancing substances, let alone stop the flow of drugs. That's why these new investigations have the potential to be so significant.

Instead of the stars and designer drugs in the BALCO scandal, authorities are targeting those who supply steroids to big-name and no-name users alike across the country.

"I understand that the involvement of athletes and celebrities makes this a sexy story, but I assure you we are not, at this point, we are not concerned with the celebrity factor," said P. David Soares, district attorney of Albany County, N.Y.

Federal and state agents raided two pharmacies in Orlando, Fla., on Tuesday in connection with an investigation by Soares' office. Eight people in three states have been arrested, and prosecutors say 24 could face felony charges by the time their investigation is over.

An Albany County grand jury also has indicted the two owners of a pharmacy in Mobile, Ala., according to the Times Union of Albany, which first disclosed the widespread investigation. An attorney for Applied Pharmacy Services told Mobile's WALA-TV that federal authorities raided the company last August.

And last week, federal prosecutors in Rhode Island announced charges in an alleged scheme to illegally prescribe anabolic steroids and human growth hormone to bodybuilders in several states.

"Historically, people who abuse these things were fearful of drug testing," said Dr. Gary Wadler, a member of the World Anti-Doping Agency. "Now they've got to be fearful not only of drug testing, they've got to be fearful of law enforcement. ... `Are the persons I'm getting it from under some federal investigation and am I going to get snagged?'

"I'm quite confident that this had nothing to do with the investigation of athletes," Wadler added. "It happened to deal with an investigation of a doctor or pharmacist and, lo and behold, there were people's names. They weren't targets. They're collateral, if you will."

Former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley and a doctor for the Pittsburgh Steelers were linked to Signature Pharmacy in Orlando, according to the Times Union. Grimsley's agent, Joe Bick, declined comment, and his attorney did not return a phone call.

The paper also said Matthews, Canseco and Holyfield were allegedly on Applied Pharmacy's customer list. SI.com reported that Matthews allegedly was sent Genotropin, a brand of synthetic growth hormone, in August 2004.

The drug, which came from Applied Pharmacy, was sent to the address in Mansfield, Texas, of one of Matthews' former minor league teammates, according to the Internet site.

Matthews, speaking to reporters at the Angels' spring training camp in Mesa, Ariz., said he wasn't "in a position to answer any specific questions."

"I do expect it to resolve itself here in the near future. ... Until we get more information, I just can't comment on it," he said.

A message left with Holyfield on Wednesday was not returned. Canseco's attorney, Robert Saunooke, told The Associated Press he would be surprised if the former slugger had been a client.

"I would find it highly unlikely," he said. "All the steroids that he got were prescribed to him or were from people in the gym. There's never been anything he's gotten online."

Soares has refused to answer most questions about the case, which involves sealed indictments. But Albany prosecutors allege Signature Pharmacy repeatedly filled prescriptions even though it knew they were not the result of face-to-face meetings between doctor and patient, a violation of New York law.

During the raid in Orlando, investigators seized drugs, including anabolic steroids and human growth hormone, said Carl Metzger, narcotics commander for Orlando's Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation.

Officials from the Food and Drug Administration questioned the doctor for the Pittsburgh Steelers about hormone purchases from the Orlando pharmacy.

The Times Union reported that Dr. Richard Rydze was asked about his purchase last year of about $150,000 in testosterone and human growth hormone. The purchase was made on Rydze's personal credit card.

"There is no evidence that Dr. Rydze prescribed or provided any hormone treatments to any of our players," Steelers president Art Rooney II said. "Dr. Rydze has assured me that this has never happened and will never happen."

Holyfield Allegedly Received Steroids, HGH Via Alias (SI/CNN)

Sports Illustrated/CNN, February 28, 2007

Sports Illustrated reporters Luis Fernando Llosa and L. Jon Wertheim are tracking the investigation of an illegal steroid distribution network that has implicated pro athletes. On Tuesday, they accompanied agents on a coordinated raid of an Orlando compound pharmacy and a Jupiter, Fla., "anti-aging" clinic that investigators allege conspired to fraudulently prescribe steroids, human growth hormone and other performance enhancing drugs over the Internet.

SI.com: In addition to major league outfielder Gary Matthews Jr., another prominent athlete whose name has surfaced in media reports is Evander Holyfield, the four-time heavyweight boxing champ. What do you know about his situation?

Llosa/Wertheim: Ironically, Holyfield's name does not appear in the law enforcement documents we reviewed. However, a patient by the name of "Evan Fields" caught investigators' attention. "Fields" shares the same birth date as Holyfield -- Oct. 19, 1962. The listed address for "Fields" was 794 Evander, Fairfield, Ga. 30213. Holyfield has a very similar address. When we called the phone number that, according to the documents, was associated with the "Fields" prescription, Holyfield answered.

SI.com: Is he tied to raids of compound pharmacies and "anti-aging" clinics as well?

Llosa/Wertheim: This case appears to be a little different. Rather than using the internet and receiving the prescriptions through the mail, "Fields" allegedly picked them up from a private Georgia urologist whose offices were raided as part of this ongoing investigation. But authorities tell us the drugs came from Applied Pharmacy, the Mobile, Ala., compound pharmacy the DEA raided last fall.

SI.com: Do you know which drugs were involved?

Llosa/Wertheim: According the records we reviewed, in June 2004, the individual that authorities believe to be Holyfield picked up three vials of testosterone, two vials of Glukor (a drug believed to be used during and after steroid cycles) and injection supplies. Less than a week later, according to the document, he picked up five vials of Saizen, a brand of human growth hormone (HGH), and related supplies. In Sept. 2004, he returned for a follow-up visit for hypogonadism.

SI.com: Does Holyfield have an explanation?

Llosa/Wertheim: We contacted him today. He denied knowledge and offered to get back to us, which he never did. He did, however, release a statement through Main Events, the boxing promotion company. "I do not use steroids. I have never used steroids. I resent that my name has been linked to known steroid users by sources who refuse to be identified in order to generate publicity for their investigation. I'm disappointed that certain members of the media fell for this ploy and chose to use my name in headlines and publish my photo alongside stories ... about an investigation into a practice that has nothing to do with me or what I stand for."

SI.com: At 44, Holyfield is still fighting. What is boxing's policy with respect to steroids and HGH?

Llosa/Wertheim: Most commissions do ban steroids and HGH. But again -- and we can't stress this enough -- this investigation is about the chain of supply and this network. It's not about which athletes are or aren't using performance-enhancing drugs. The document makes no assertion that Holyfield used the drugs that he is alleged to have received.

Boxing is not like other sports where there is a league and union that agrees on standard policies such as drug testing. In boxing, anti-doping rules can vary by state commission. We spoke with several officials with the Nevada Athletic Commission, and while HGH is on a list of banned substances, boxers are not tested for it. Marc Ratner, the former head of the Nevada commission, also told us that boxers are only tested when they fight -- not out of competition. Still, a number of fighters in recent years, including James Toney and Fernando Vargas, have been sanctioned for using performance-enhancing drugs, serving suspensions of 90 days and nine months, respectively.

SI.com: Has Holyfield's name come up before?

Llosa/Wertheim: He has never tested positive. However Dr. Margaret Goodman, chairman of the medical advisory board of Nevada Athletic Commission, says that as early as 1994, when Holyfield fought Michael Moorer and suffered heart problems, the medical arm of the Commission questioned Holyfield about possible HGH use. "There were questions [because] the abnormalities Evander had with his heart were findings that could have been consistent with growth hormone use. The problem was there was no test and Evander denied any use of growth hormone."

Goodman went on to say that she believes that use of HGH is widespread in the sport. "I think it's readily available and used in boxing," she says. "I think we should have adopted the World Anti-Doping Agency (WADA) standards years ago. Boxing continues to hide its head in the sand that there's a problem with anabolic steroids and drugs like growth hormone -- and also substances like clenbuterol that guys are using in combination with growth hormone and anabolic steroids to give them an unfair advantage."

Abuse Of Prescribed Medicines About To Eclipse That Of Illicit Drugs (PPG)

By Michael A. Fuoco

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 1, 2007

After treating more than 2,000 people for OxyContin addiction since 2000, Dr. Neil A. Capretto, Gateway Rehabilitation Center's medical director, wasn't surprised by the findings of the United Nations-affiliated International Narcotics Control Board that abuse of prescription drugs is about to exceed the use of illicit narcotics worldwide.

"There's just been a growing, nonmedical, addictive use of prescription drugs," he said, particularly opioid drugs like OxyContin, codeine, morphine, Percocet, Vicodin and Dilaudid. Opioids possess some properties characteristic of opiate narcotics like heroin and morphine but are not derived from the opium poppy.

"The good news is we're treating pain better than we did 10 years ago," Dr. Capretto said. "The bad news is there are more people abusing and misusing [prescription drugs]. Unfortunately, from our end, I'm really afraid it's going to get worse before it gets better."

In a report yesterday, the International Narcotics Control Board said abuse of prescription drugs is about to exceed the use of illicit street narcotics worldwide. The shift has spawned a lethal new trade in counterfeit painkillers, sedatives and other medicines potent enough to kill.

Prescription drug abuse already has outstripped traditional illegal drugs like heroin, cocaine and Ecstasy in parts of Europe, Africa and South Asia, the board said in its annual report for 2006.

In the United States alone, abuse of painkillers, stimulants, tranquilizers and other prescription medications has gone beyond "practically all illicit drugs with the exception of cannabis," with users increasingly turning to them first, said the group, based in Vienna, Austria.

Unregulated markets in many countries make it easy for traffickers to peddle a wide variety of counterfeit drugs using courier services, the mail and the Internet.

"Gains over the past years in international drug control may be seriously undermined by this ominous development if it remains unchecked," Narcotics Control Board President Philip O. Emafo said.

The problem is compounded in Western Pennsylvania, Dr. Capretto said, because it is "one of the OxyContin epicenters of the world." The powerful drug is prescribed here more than in other areas because of the region's large elderly population and large number of former industrial workers who suffered work-related injuries.

Since 2000, Gateway has experienced a 600 percent increase in admissions for addictions to opioids, both prescription pills and heroin, he said.

The prescription and heroin addictions are often linked, Dr. Capretto noted, because abuse of OxyContin has led many addicts to heroin for economic reasons. While an 80-milligram OxyContin pill can sell for up to $80 on the street, a stamp bag of heroin has dropped to $10, even as purity levels have reached 90 percent.

"Someone spending hundreds of dollars a day on OxyContin can buy heroin for one-third, one-fourth that amount now," he said. "You have suburban kids who never thought they'd stick a needle in their arm shooting up.

Richard Goldberg, Allegheny County deputy district attorney in charge of the narcotics unit, agreed that OxyContin users are turning to heroin because dealers of both drugs are reacting to market forces of "supply and demand" in a price war.

Dr. Capretto said he's treated OxyContin abusers who enlisted others to stand outside of doctors' offices to buy partial prescriptions from elderly patients.

"They'd buy half a prescription for $200 and sell it for 10 times that much," he said.

He said he knows of high school students from an upper-middle-class school district who broke into a fellow student's home to steal his father's OxyContin, prescribed for a car accident; of addicts who go to real estate open houses to go through medicine cabinets; and addicts who go from doctor to doctor with fake medical records, knowing just how to act and just what to say.

DOJ_NMG_0138588

Mr. Goldberg said prosecutions in Allegheny County involving prescription drugs peaked about two years ago when they made up about 30 percent of nearly 6,000 drug cases. Now, that number has dropped back to the 20 percent range where it was previously, he said.

After an upswing involving OxyContin prosecutions several years ago, the pendulum has swung back to Vicodin, he said.

"Vicodin has been there and will always be there. It's one drug doctors are more comfortable in prescribing," he said.

The number of Americans abusing prescription drugs went from 7.8 million in 1992 to 15.1 million in 2003, nearly doubling, the Narcotics Control Board said. Among their prescription drugs of choice: the painkillers oxycodone, sold under the trade name OxyContin, and hydrocodone, sold as Vicodin and used by 7.4 percent of college students in 2005.

Although the number of U.S. high school and college students abusing illicit drugs declined in 2006 for a fourth consecutive year, "the high and increasing level of abuse of prescription drugs by both adolescents and adults is a serious cause for concern," it said.

Counterfeiters are exploiting intense demand for prescription drugs that can give a "high" comparable to cocaine, heroin or methamphetamine, the watchdog group said.

It singled out Scandinavia, where demand for flunitrazepam -- a sedative sold as Rohypnol and widely known as a "date rape drug" -- increasingly is being met by unauthorized production, and North America, where widespread abuse of prescription drugs, including the narcotic fentanyl -- 80 times as potent as heroin -- has been blamed for a spike in deaths.

"The very high potency of some of the synthetic narcotic drugs available as prescription drugs presents, in fact, a higher overdose risk than the abuse of illicit drugs," Dr. Emafo said.

AP, March 1, 2007

Abuse of prescription drugs is about to exceed the use of illicit street narcotics worldwide â€"Â and the shift has spawned a lethal new trade inÂ counterfeit painkillers,Â sedatives and other medicines potent enough to kill, a global watchdog warned Wednesday.

Already, prescription drug abuse has outstripped traditional illegal drugs such as heroin, cocaine andÂ Ecstasy in parts of Europe, Africa and South Asia,Â the UN-affiliated International Narcotics Control Board said in its annual report for 2006.

In the United States alone, the abuse ofÂ painkillers, stimulants, tranquilizers and otherÂ prescription medications has gone beyond "practically all illicit drugs with the exception of cannabis,"Â with users increasingly turning to them first, theÂ Vienna-based group said.

And unregulated markets in many countries make it easy for traffickers to peddle a wide variety ofÂ counterfeit drugs through courier services, ordinary mail and the internet.

"Gains over the past years in international drugÂ control may be seriously undermined by this ominousÂ development if it remains unchecked," INCB presidentÂ Philip Emafo said.

Discount medications that seem to be authenticÂ often turn out to be cheap but powerful knockoffs concocted from recipes posted on the web, Emafo added.

"Instead of healing, they can take lives," he said, characterizing the danger as "real and sizable."

Up to 50 per cent of all drugs taken in developing countries are believed to be counterfeit, the boardÂ said, citing estimates from the World HealthÂ Organization.

Buprenorphine, an analgesic, is now the mainÂ injection drug in most of India, and it is also trafficked and abused in tablet form in France, where the INCB estimates 20 to 25 per cent of the drug sold commercially as Subutex is being diverted to theÂ black market. Canadians ditching heroin for prescription narcotics

A study published in November 2006Â in the CanadianÂ Medical Association Journal found that heroin was no longer the opiate of choice among many substance abusers in Canada â€" prescription narcotics such asÂ morphine and OxyContin were taking its place.

Researchers studied street users in seven cities across the country in 2005, and found that heroinÂ remained the No. 1 illicit opiate only in Vancouver and Montreal. In the five other cities â€" Edmonton,Â Toronto, Quebec City, Fredericton and Saint John â€" more often than not, getting high meant taking prescription opioids like Percodan.

When the study was released, lead author BenediktÂ Fischer, an addiction researcher at the University ofÂ Victoria, said the switch to highly addictiveÂ prescription narcotics among street users likelyÂ represents just the tip of the iceberg

HeÂ said he suspected the numbers would be much higher ifÂ the general population was factored in.

The INCB said the number of Americans abusing prescription drugs nearly doubled from 7.8 million in 1992 to 15.1 million in 2003. Among theirÂ prescription drugs of choice: the painkillers oxycodone, sold under the trade name OxyContin, andÂ hydrocodone, sold as Vicodin and used by 7.4 per centÂ of college students in 2005.

Counterfeiters are exploiting intense demand forÂ prescription drugs that can give a "high" comparableÂ to cocaine, heroin or methamphetamine, the watchdog group said.

Military, ATF Expand Bomb Training (CHIT)

By Andrew Zajac, Washington Bureau

Chicago Tribune, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Struggling for more effective responses to the suicide and roadside bombings that have wreaked havoc in Iraq and increasingly in Afghanistan, the Defense Department has beefed up an explosives training program with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Military bomb technicians will receive additional training in countering homemade explosives and in identifying bomb components after a blast, under the expanded program to be run in six sessions annually at the ATF's training center in Ft. A.P. Hill in Virginia.

About 180 technicians from all branches of the armed forces will be trained in a course that has been expanded to one week, according to Steven Beggs, ATF chief of explosives training. Previously, about 90 technicians, mostly from the Army, received three days of training.

Homemade roadside bombs, also called improvised explosive devices, have exacted a devastating toll on American troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. This month the government alleged that sophisticated variants of the devices used in Iraq are being supplied by a branch of Iran's armed forces.

Suicide bombs have been employed against both military forces and civilians.

A suicide bombing Tuesday at the gates of Bagram Air Base in Afghanistan killed at least 23 people, including two Americans. Vice President Dick Cheney was on the base at the time but was unharmed.

Military bomb technicians traditionally have focused on disarming or detonating a bomb, but increasingly they are trying to use physical evidence, such as a bomb's remains, to trace the weapon to its source.

"What they've been asked more and more to do is collect evidence, or intelligence," which is the ATF's strength, Beggs said.

The goal of the expanded training is to allow bomb technicians to glean whatever information they can about a bomb's components--switches, timers and the nature of the explosive --in less than 30 minutes, Beggs said.

Understanding how a bomb is built can provide clues about who made it and enable the military to take countermeasures.

"It affects the way we build our vehicles, the way we go down the road," Beggs said.

Feds Charge Suspected Bomb-maker Anew (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), February 28, 2007

A Flomaton man whose federal trial on bomb charges ended in a hung jury last month faces new charges under an indictment handed down last week by a grand jury in Mobile.

At the January trial in U.S. District Court in Mobile, jurors could not agree about whether Gregory Wendell Nichols was guilty of possessing a bomb. The new federal indictment accuses him of two bomb-related charges formally known as possession of an unregistered firearm and making a firearm.

Nichols is scheduled to be arraigned on the charges today.

"It is a separate offense to actually make a firearm," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Vicki Davis, who has taken over as lead prosecutor in the case.

During Nichols' trial, senior federal appeals Judge Emmett "Rip" Cox, who presided over the trial, dismissed one of two counts against the defendant -- possession of a firearm in violation of law -- on grounds that it duplicated the other charge, possession of an unregistered firearm.

"They're just retreading the indictment," said Assistant Federal Defender Peter Madden, who added that his client intends to plead not guilty. "A count was dismissed. Now, they're trying to add another one."

Agents for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives confronted Nichols at a convenience store in Atmore on July 5 after getting a tip. Nichols permitted the agents to search his pickup truck; they reported finding five homemade explosive devices.

Nichols admitted that he made the devices using spent carbon dioxide cartridges from BB guns. He told jurors last month that he packed the cylindrical canisters -- which were about 2 inches long -- with a black powder substitute called Pyrodex. He then sealed it with plumber's tape and electrical tape, and attached a firecracker fuse.

Nichols testified that he made the devices -- which he called "firecrackers" -- to drop into a river to watch the explosions. He said he and his fiancée did this with a batch of devices he had made in June and planned to do it again before ATF agents arrested him.

Prosecutors offered testimony from a ballistics expert who conducted tests he said proved the devices were dangerous. A defense expert witness told jurors that the devices were weak explosives.

Jurors could never agree whether those devices were firecrackers -- and thus legal -- or illegal firearms.

Davis said she has discussed a possible plea deal with defense lawyers, but Madden said he expects the case to go to trial again next month.

"We're going full speed ahead," Madden said. "I'm assuming it will go pretty much the same. But I'll do it better this time. The government doesn't have any more evidence."

Judge Hits Politics In Choice Of Marshals (BOS)

By Sean P. Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, March 1, 2007

A rare rebuke from US bench

A federal judge in Boston has blasted the US Marshals Service as a "second rate" agency because it is headed by a patronage appointee, and called on Congress to "professionalize" the law enforcement agency.

Judge William G. Young , in an unusual addendum to a ruling in an employment discrimination case last week, went out of his way to criticize the way marshals are appointed throughout the country.

The appointees "are all direct political patronage appointments. These are not executive department policy-making positions; they are vital law enforcement positions," Young wrote.

"Surely here in America direct command of law enforcement officers in harm's way could never be entrusted to political patronage appointees," he wrote. "How smug we are -- and how wrong."

Young's remarks were striking, in part because federal judges work closely with the marshals, who are responsible for securing courthouses, protecting judges, juries, witnesses, and other court officials. They also play a role in capturing fugitives and transporting prisoners.

Young wrote that it was unimaginable that another federal law enforcement agency, such as the FBI or the Drug Enforcement Agency, would put a political appointee in charge of a regional office. He said Congress has professionalized those agencies.

"Until Congress does the same for the Marshals Service, it will always be considered a second rate political agency in the eyes of true professionals," Young wrote.

Traditionally, the marshal's job has gone to a prominent political figure from the same political party of the president in office. The White House has usually allowed local political figures in the 94 marshal districts to reach a consensus on a candidate for the job.

Reed Hillman , last year's unsuccessful Republican candidate for lieutenant governor and a former State Police commander, is expected to be nominated for the presidential appointment.

In a story published Monday, the Globe quoted two unnamed Massachusetts Republican officials who said that the White House has decided to give Hillman the job.

If President Bush nominates him, Hillman may face opposition in the Senate, which must confirm presidential nominations.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy has long advocated for professionalizing the Marshals Service, and last year added a provision to the Patriot Act establishing criteria for marshals, including four years of "command-level law enforcement management duties" and experience in courts or protecting court personnel.

Ask whether Kennedy intended to try to block Hillman's appointment, Melissa Wagoner , Kennedy's spokeswoman, pointed out that the White House has not submitted a nomination to the Senate.

Bush's previous appointee for US marshal in Boston was Anthony Dichio, a former state trooper later dismissed by the president for neglect of duty. Former governor Paul Cellucci, a Republican like Bush, nominated Dichio, who had spent several years at Cellucci's side as part of a State Police detail assigned to drive the governor to appointments and provide security for him.

DOJ_NMG_0138591

Bush dismissed Dichio in 2005, after two Globe reporters documented Dichio's lax work habits and use of his government-owned vehicle for personal errands. An investigation by the US Justice Department, prompted by the Globe report, confirmed the newspaper's findings.

Dichio was named to the $130,000-a-year job over objections from the state's two US senators and from nine of its 10 House members, all of them Democrats. Critics said Dicho lacked experience in antiterrorism and management. The Marshals Service in Massachusetts includes a staff of about 120.

Nancy McGillivray, who served as marshal from 1994 to 2002, was an anomaly in the Marshals Service because she rose through the agency's ranks to get the top job. Yesterday, she echoed Young's assessment.

"You don't have the luxury of a learning curve as marshal," McGillivray said yesterday. "It's a demanding, professional law enforcement job."

Young's comments on the Marshals Service came at the end of a ruling in which he denied the claims of a deputy marshal who alleged that Dichio passed her over for a promotion due to gender bias.

In his ruling, Young wrote that Dichio's actions were a result of personal hostility toward the deputy marshal, not gender discrimination.

Dichio could not be reached for comment last night.

IMMIGRATION:

Report: Man Shot By Agents Smuggled Pot Again (EPT)

El Paso Times, February 28, 2007

Eight months after he was shot in the buttocks by two former El Paso Border Patrol agents, a Mexican drug smuggler delivered $1 million worth of marijuana to a stash house in El Paso County, according to an investigative report by the Drug Enforcement Administration now in possession of a California congressman.

U.S. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., held a news conference in Washington, D.C., today and held a redacted copy of the document up for reporters but did not pass out copies. Rohrabacher said he had been asked by the Justice Department not to do so because the report contained sensitive information.

U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton had repeatedly denied that the smuggler, Osvaldo Aldrete Davila, had been arrested again after he was shot in the buttocks by agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean in February 2005 during a botched smuggling attempt near Fabens. Rohrabacher said it was technically correct because Davila was not arrested but said Sutton was playing with words.

"They call that lying when you're not a lawyer," he said.

Ramos and Compean were convicted last year of violating Davila's civil rights and of tampering with evidence because they did not report the shooting and because Compean picked up his shell casings.

Ramos was sentenced to 11 years in prison and Compean of 12 years in prison. They started serving their time in January and are appealing the conviction. Their cause has been picked up by conservative activists, such as Minutemen groups, and elected officials.

It is not clear what the DEA report will mean for the agents as it is not directly related to the February shooting, but Rohrabacher said he smeared the character of the smuggler as the prosecution's star witness.

Rohrabacher said that prosecutors ignored the DEA report to "promote the false image of the smuggler" during trial. Prosecutors said that Davila was smuggling drugs because he didn't have enough money to renew his commercial driver's license in Mexico.

The second smuggling incident allegedly occurred Oct. 9, 2005, during a sting operation at a stash house where occupants identified Davila as the man who had just driven a load of marijuana to the house. Davila was gone by then but "They used his name, all the way down to his colostomy bag. How many smugglers carry a colostomy bag?" Rohrabacher said.

U.S. Attorney's officials issued a written statement, saying "The U.S. Attorney's office cannot comment about matters that are under seal or ongoing investigations. This office will pursue criminal charges where there is prosecutable criminal activity and competent evidence to prove it."

Davila's lawyer, Walter Boyaki, couldn t be reached for comment today. Davila is in Mexico and hasn't been back to El Paso since his court testimony.

Asked whether the publicity around the second incident could jeopardize possible efforts to prosecute Davila for the second offense, Rohrabacher said his focus was on freeing Compean and Ramos.

Davila was offered immunity in exchange for his testimony for the first incident, but not the second.

The DEA report was sealed evidence during the trial, according to trial transcripts in which lawyers refer to the incident as "the October load," and to the witness against Davila as Cipriano Ortiz. The defense's motion to unseal it was denied by a federal judge. But the evidence will be passed, sealed, to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

"My opinion is, your honor, that he's trying to portray himself as a very innocent person, and would not have any clue how marijuana is packaged. And I would like to ask, You didn't have any other experience with how marijuana was packaged?" she said according to official transcripts posted at www.usdoj.gov/usao/txw.

Her request was denied and Davila was allowed to plead the Fifth on any questions about his illegal activities before or after the shooting.

Smuggler Given Immunity Is Tied To New Drug Case (FWST)

By Dave Montgomery

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — A Mexican drug smuggler who testified under immunity that he was shot by two now-imprisoned Border Patrol agents was linked to a second drug-smuggling case in Texas that happened nearly eight months after the shooting, according to a Drug Enforcement Administration report.

The disclosure of the report, dated Oct. 25, 2005, sparked new demands for a congressional inquiry into the prosecution of agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Compean.

Each of the agents was sentenced to more than a decade in prison for shooting Mexican national Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila in the buttocks after he abandoned a van loaded with marijuana near Fabens, outside El Paso.

According to the previously sealed DEA report, Aldrete-Davila came to the attention of federal agents after being granted limited immunity to testify as the key witness against the two agents.

The occupant of a “stash house” in Clint, also near El Paso, identified “Osvaldo Davila” as the person who dropped off a 1990 Chevrolet Astro van containing six bundles of marijuana, the report said.

Agents seized 752.8 pounds of marijuana, valued at $602,240, from the van and a storage shed after an informant’s tip led them to the house Oct. 23, 2005.

Cipriano Ortiz-Hernandez, who lived in the house, told agents that “Osvaldo Davila” had delivered the van a day earlier.

“Ortiz-Hernandez stated that he did not know that the van contained marijuana,” the report said.

Davila was identified in the report as an illegal immigrant “who has a colostomy bag.” Aldrete-Davila was forced to wear a colostomy bag after being treated in the United States for the wound inflicted in the shooting.

During his testimony Feb. 22-23, 2006, Aldrete-Davila acknowledged that he had been given limited immunity to testify against the two agents, but the government stressed that the immunity applied to his actions only on the day of the shooting.

He also said he planned to sue the government for $5 million to compensate for his injuries.

The DEA report, which began circulating on Capitol Hill on Wednesday, raised new questions about the government’s handling of the case — particularly why Aldrete-Davila remained free after being tied to further trafficking activities.

Conservative lawmakers who have rallied behind the two agents also intensified their criticism of U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton of San Antonio, whose office prosecuted the case.

“We cannot comment about matters that are under seal or ongoing investigations,” Sutton’s office said in a statement. “This office will pursue criminal charges where there is prosecutable criminal activity and competent evidence to prove it.

“We have clearly stated that the immunity necessarily afforded to Aldrete-Davila in the investigation and trial of Ramos and Compean for the [Feb. 17] incident would not extend to any subsequent or future criminal activity that may be alleged.”

The Inland Valley Daily Bulletin in Ontario, Calif., reported this week that DEA investigators believed that they had sufficient evidence to indict Aldrete-Davila in the second case, but their requests to do so were denied by prosecutors.

Rep. Ted Poe, R-Humble, a former district judge and prosecutor, called for a new trial for the two agents since the allegations in the DEA report were kept from jurors in the El Paso trial.

“I want to know why the federal government was so relentless in prosecuting the Border Patrol agents and not prosecuting a drug smuggler,” Poe said. “He smuggled drugs on at least two occasions and he’s more than just some mule.”

More than 30 Republican House members, including Poe, urged House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and three key committee chairmen to open immediate hearings “into all aspects of this case.”

“Numerous and repeated attempts by members of Congress to ascertain the facts of this case with relevant federal agencies have been unsuccessful,” the lawmakers said in a letter released late Wednesday.

Man Shot By Agents Stashed Drugs After He Got Immunity (WT)

By Jerry Seper
The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

A Mexican national who was shot by U.S. Border Patrol agents after abandoning 743 pounds of marijuana on the Texas border brought a second drug load into the United States while waiting to testify under a grant of immunity against the now-imprisoned agents, according to unreleased federal documents.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) documents, which remain under seal, show that Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila was the focus of a drug investigation into his reported stashing of 750 pounds of marijuana in a van at a house in Clint, Texas, in November 2005 -- nine months after he was shot in the buttocks near Fabens, Texas, while running from Agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean.

The agents have since been sentenced to 11 and 12 years, respectively, in prison. Clint is eight miles northwest of Fabens in what law-enforcement authorities describe as a popular drug smuggling corridor.

The DEA's investigative reports, according to law-enforcement authorities and others, said a witness identified Aldrete-Davila as the van's driver, and that the owner of the house, Cipriano Ortiz-Hernandez, picked Aldrete-Davila from a display of several photos.

The authorities also said the reports show that the homeowner's brother, Jose Ortiz, told agents that Aldrete-Davila had brought the marijuana into the country from Juarez, Mexico, and identified him as "the person who was shot by Border Patrol agents."

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, California Republican, said the DEA reports show that prosecutors misled the public about their "star witness" in the transport of a second load of drugs, adding that U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton knowingly presented a false picture of the drug smuggler "to justify his ruthless prosecution."

He said that under Mr. Sutton's direction, prosecutors characterized the smuggler as an innocent victim, "which is clearly not the case," and when Mr. Sutton's office was told by the DEA of Aldrete-Davila's involvement in a second offense, "chose to disregard the information."

"Sutton's continuous attempts to paint a benign picture of the drug smuggler is not only disingenuous, but amounts to misleading the jury and the public when questioned about the second offense," he said. "Only an unscrupulous lawyer would believe this is an acceptable tactic."

Shana Jones, spokeswoman for Mr. Sutton, told The Washington Times yesterday that the prosecutor's office could not comment about matters under seal or on ongoing investigations.

"This office will pursue criminal charges where there is prosecutable criminal activity and competent evidence to prove it," Ms. Jones said. "We have clearly stated that the immunity necessarily afforded to Aldrete-Davila in the investigation and trial of Ramos and Compean for the February 17 incident would not extend to any subsequent or future criminal activity that may be alleged.

"It is truly unfortunate that some members of Congress have inaccurately implied that such immunity would be extended beyond the scope of this trial," she said.

Mr. Rohrabacher's spokeswoman, Tara Setmayer, confirmed yesterday that her boss had a copy of the reports but said he had no intention of disclosing information from them that could be damaging to an ongoing investigation. She said he sought only to establish Aldrete-Davila's suspected involvement in a second drug-smuggling incident.

Ramos, 37, and Compean, 28, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso, Texas, on charges of causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

The conviction came after Aldrete-Davila was located in Mexico by Homeland Security investigators and given immunity by Mr. Sutton's office in exchange for his testimony against the agents. The immunity agreement protected Aldrete-Davila from being charged in this country with drug smuggling.

Aldrete-Davila was shot after he ignored orders by the agents to stop his vehicle. Court records show he jumped from his van and ran south to the Rio Grande, where he was confronted on foot by Compean. Although wounded, Aldrete-Davila crossed the border and escaped in a waiting van.

Both agents testified that they thought Aldrete-Davila had a gun in his hand and feared for their lives when they fired shots at him.

Fox News, February 28, 2007

The Mexican drug runner whose testimony sent two Border Patrol agents to prison for shooting him in the buttocks brought drugs into the United States more than once, thereby diminishing his credibility as a witness in the investigation, according to a California congressman.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., presented new evidence in a Capitol Hill press conference Wednesday that revealed what he says was U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton's deliberate attempt to mislead the public about Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila's involvement in the transport of a second load of drugs in October 2005.

Aldrete-Davila testified before a jury that former Border Patrol Agents Jose Compean and Ignacio Ramos shot him in February 2005 as he tried to run away from them near the U.S.-Mexico border in Texas. He was given immunity from prosecution in March 2005 for his cooperation in that investigation and subsequent trial, which culminated last year.

The Mexican was smuggling more than 700 pounds of marijuana into the United States at the time. Compean and Ramos were convicted last year and are serving 11 and 12 years, respectively, in separate federal prisons for the non-fatal shooting.

But the Drug Enforcement Agency found that Aldrete-Davila brought in another vanload of drugs into the United States while he waited to testify against the agents. Some reports say he stashed up to 750 pounds of marijuana at a house in Clint, Texas.

"The U.S. Attorney's Office presented to the jury and presented to the public as if this guy Davila was a benign, hapless Mexican man who had just been recruited to drive a truck in order to raise money for medical expenses for his mother," Rohrabacher told FOXNews.com.

"Had the jury known that there were indications that he was a professional and he lied to his handlers even after they had granted him immunity for the first time, his testimony would have been worthless and it also suggests that he was more likely to have been carrying a weapon."

One of the border agents claimed they may have seen a weapon in Aldrete-Davila's hand during the incident. But the prosecutor said there was no evidence that he had a gun.

Aldrete-Davila was given immunity by the U.S. government and also received a border crossing card to come to and from Mexico to get free medical care in the United States for a bullet lodged in his body. Rohrabacher's office said it's unsure how many times Aldrete-Davila crossed the border during this time.

But the congressman says evidence has emerged that Sutton's office was notified by the DEA of Aldrete-Davila's direct involvement in the second offense but that it was ignored.

"The second offense goes just to the heart of the credibility of the Justice Department's primary witness against Compean and Ramos," Rohrabacher told FOXNews.com.

The documents Rohrabacher has is the report of investigation completed by the DEA.

"Our purpose here is not to endanger any agents" or reveal any information that may hurt the government's case, the congressman's spokeswoman, Tara Setmayer, told FOXNews.com on Wednesday. "But we do want people to understand we are in possession of documents that support the reports about Davila's involvement in a second drug-smuggling incident."

The DEA directed calls regarding what's known as the 'October load' investigation to Sutton, who represents the Western District of Texas. A prosecutor under Sutton handled the Compean-Ramos case.

"We cannot comment about matters that are under seal or ongoing investigations. This office will pursue criminal charges where there is prosecutable criminal activity and competent evidence to prove it," Sutton said in a statement.

"We have clearly stated that the immunity necessarily afforded to Aldrete-Davila in the investigation and trial of Ramos and Compean for the Feb. 17 incident would not extend to any subsequent or future criminal activity that may be alleged. It is truly unfortunate that some members of Congress have inaccurately implied that such immunity would be extended beyond the scope of this trial."

Some lawmakers in Congress, as well as Border Patrol activist groups, claim Sutton failed to prosecute the "real" criminal in the matter — the drug runner — and instead went after two Border Patrol agents just doing their jobs. Sutton, for his part, has argued that the law clearly states the mandatory sentences for such a shooting, and that there is no exemption for law enforcement. He has acknowledged to FOXNews.com, however, that 11 and 12 years in prison for such a crime may be extreme.

Champions of Ramos and Compean have asked President Bush to pardon the two agents, but to no avail.

A Justice Department lawyer on Wednesday told FOXNews.com that so far, the agency had not received any petition for clemency for either of the agents.

DOJ_NMG_0138595

But in order to be eligible for a pardon approved by the Justice Department — which makes pardon recommendations to the president — five years must have elapsed from the day an individual was released from prison. Commutation is a shortening of one's sentence, but in order to be eligible for that, the person serving the sentence cannot be legally challenging his case.

However, the president can also make either decision on his own, regardless of the Justice recommendation.

Friends of the Border Patrol on Wednesday called for the firing of Sutton, along with other assistant U.S. attorneys who helped prosecute Compean and Ramos for what it calls "the malicious prosecution" of the two ex-agents and for "hiding key evidence from and lying to the American people, as well as harboring, aiding and providing comfort to a known drug smuggler, Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, who illegally entered the U.S. from Mexico, assaulted Agent Compean, brandished a firearm towards two federal agents, resisted arrest and transported narcotics across international boundaries on multiple occasions."

The prosecution in the case says Aldrete-Davila did not have a gun, even though at least one of the agents thought he saw what could have been a weapon in his hand at the time of the shooting.

Friends of the Border Patrol also called for the resignation of Judge Kathleen Cardone, who it says "did everything possible to aid the prosecution in this witch-hunt, including sealing evidence and testimony that clearly would have damaged the credibility of the government's case and their alleged 'victim.'"

Fresh Start On Immigration Overhaul (LAT)

By Adam Schreck

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush is committed to working with Congress on an overhaul of immigration laws, two Cabinet officials told a Senate panel Wednesday, but they hedged on the contentious issue of whether people who come to the U.S. illegally should have a path to citizenship.

The administration's priority is to secure the nation's borders and convince the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants to "come out of the shadows," Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez told the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"I'm not sure that everyone wants to be a U.S. citizen. Many just want to be able to work, and if they can work legally, one day they would like to go back home," he said. "So I don't think that citizenship is what will make them come out of the shadows."

In the first hearing on immigration policy since the Democrats took over Congress, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff emphasized that any changes in the law should not amount to amnesty.

"We cannot give those who are here illegally because they've broken the law a leg up and an advantage over those who have played by the rules," he said.

Many Republicans, particularly in the House, broke with Bush last year over his support for what the White House has called "comprehensive immigration reform."

"I don't believe that House Republicans would support a bill that creates a path to citizenship for people who came to the country illegally," said Amos Snead, a spokesman for House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.).

In his testimony, Chertoff emphasized the need for tighter border security and tougher workplace enforcement measures. Praising a workplace crackdown last week in California and 16 other states, he said harsher penalties were needed to prevent workers from entering the country illegally.

But under questioning by committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), Chertoff and Gutierrez conceded that, for the most part, illegal workers were not taking jobs away from Americans. Asked about the likelihood of rounding up everyone here illegally, Chertoff acknowledged that "it would be a gargantuan task to try to locate, detain and deport 12 million people."

The hearing follows a renewed behind-the-scenes push by the White House to get a comprehensive overhaul passed before 2008 presidential and congressional campaigning swings into high gear. At least in broad terms, Bush agrees with congressional Democrats that the immigration laws — last revised on a large scale in 1986 — need significant retooling.

Last year, the Senate, then under GOP control, approved legislation that hewed closely to Bush's proposals. The bill, passed by a vote of 62 to 36, would have given many illegal immigrants a chance to pursue citizenship, created a guest worker program, tightened sanctions on companies employing illegal workers and authorized hundreds of miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

But the House refused to consider anything beyond a tight focus on border security and enforcement, dooming the wider approach.

Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.), who drafted last year's bill, plan to introduce a new version soon. Reps. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and Luis V. Gutierrez (D-Ill.) are working on similar legislation on the House side. Flake said in a written statement that the issue offered a rare chance for the president and Congress "to come together and enact meaningful, substantive legislation."

DOJ_NMG_0138596

"Republicans as a whole aren't that much different than Democrats as a whole — they want some type of comprehensive reform," he said in a telephone interview.

Not everyone is on the same page, however. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) suggested during Wednesday's hearing that senators "may have reached too far in the comprehensive bill" last year and would be better off tackling the issue piece by piece.

"This is going to be a long process," he said. "The most important point in this whole thing is where the president is going to be, and where he's going to be publicly on this."

White House Renews Effort To Overhaul Laws (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush waded gingerly back into the debate over immigration Wednesday, as two of his top lieutenants urged Congress to grant "legal status" to an estimated 12 million people now living in the country illegally.

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff stopped short, however, of endorsing a plan to give illegal immigrants a chance at citizenship. "I believe what people want first and foremost is to have legal status," Gutierrez said. "I don't think everyone wants to be a citizen."

RELATED: Fee increase could curb citizenship applications

The two men's appearance before the Senate Judiciary Committee marks the beginning of an effort to revive a sweeping overhaul of the nation's immigration laws — a debate that last year set off a wave of demonstrations across the country. Legislation bogged down late in the last Congress when House Republican leaders refused to take up a Senate-passed bill that won Bush's public stamp of approval.

The Senate bill provided for improved border security, tougher penalties for employers who hire illegal aliens, a tamper-proof Social Security card, an expanded "guest worker" program to allow foreigners to work in the USA and a chance at citizenship for those living and working in the country illegally. But some Republican critics, such as Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., said the bill was too lenient, equating the citizenship provision to amnesty.

Last year's election improved the bill's chances for passage by putting Democrats in charge of both the House and Senate and ousting several leading Republican critics of the Senate immigration bill, such as J.D. Hayworth of Arizona and John Hostettler of Indiana. Voters were "clearly rejecting … the hard-line, tough-guy posture," said Cecilia Muñoz of the National Council of La Raza, a Hispanic advocacy group that backed the legislation. Muñoz said this year — a non-election year — is "the best window we're going to have" for passage of legislation that "could be a, if not the, major piece of the president's domestic legacy."

Bush seems to agree. At a press conference last month, the president said he sees "an interesting opportunity" to work with Democrats to enact legislation he has sought since his first term.

Once again, the chief sticking point appears likely to be fate of the nation's illegal population. "We can't kick them out of our country," Bush said at his press conference in February. At the Senate hearing, Chertoff said deporting all of them would be "a gargantuan task."

Democrats argue that offering an eventual chance at citizenship is the only way to guarantee the elimination of an exploitable underclass of workers. "We need to establish a path to citizenship that is fair and predictable," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., was to have said in remarks scheduled for delivery Wednesday night to the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund. "It may be a path of many steps, but the endpoint must be clear and attainable."

Under last year's Senate bill, illegal immigrants could seek citizenship if they hold a job, pay taxes, take English classes, pay a fine for their illegal entry and have not committed any felonies. "This is not amnesty," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., who was one of the leading opponents of the Senate bill and who is now the third-ranking member of the Senate Republican leadership, said in an interview outside the hearing that the two Cabinet secretaries refusal to commit to the citizenship approach was deliberate.

"Everybody's being cautious about being very specific there because clearly that's where the final compromises have to come if there's going to be legislation," Kyl said. The senator said that Republican opponents of last year's Senate bill might be willing to go along with a deal that offers some, but not all, illegal immigrants a chance to gain legal status "if there are other factors put into the mix." He put the chances of enacting a bill this year at "better than 50-50."

Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., warned that enacting a bill "is not going to be an easy process." That cheers Ira Mehlman of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which opposed last year's Senate-passed bill. He predicted that lawmakers will remain split over the immigration bills most controversial provisions. "There aren't very many Republicans left who are prepared to go marching off a cliff with George Bush anymore," Mehlman said.

On the other end of the spectrum, Sonia Ramirez of the AFL-CIO said labor won't back an immigration bill unless it contains safeguards that protect foreign workers from abuse and domestic workers from job loss. She also said the unions favor "a path to citizenship" for those who have been living and working in the country illegally.

Bush Aides Pledge Work For Immigration Bill (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — Two senior Bush administration officials vowed on Wednesday to work with Congress to ensure passage of immigration legislation this year but publicly distanced themselves from proposals that would place most illegal immigrants on a path to citizenship.

Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff suggested that offering temporary legal status, instead of citizenship, to illegal immigrants would be enough to persuade them to emerge from the shadows and register with the government, which has been a key national security goal.

The officials were testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee as lawmakers worked out the final details of a broad immigration bill that could be introduced in the Senate as early as next week. Last year, the Senate passed bipartisan immigration legislation that would have provided citizenship to most illegal immigrants who paid fines and back taxes and learned English.

That legislation stalled in the face of fierce opposition from House Republicans, but this year's bill is expected to include a similar proposal. Democrats and Republicans believe that prospects for passage are far better in this Democratic-controlled Congress, but the contentious debate over citizenship underscores the difficulties ahead.

The citizenship measure has been derided by conservatives as amnesty and hailed by some Democrats, Republicans and immigrant advocates as a provision that will encourage millions of illegal immigrants to come forward. In August, President Bush suggested that he supported such proposals, saying they sounded like "a reasonable way to treat people with respect."

But on Wednesday, Mr. Gutierrez and Mr. Chertoff declined to endorse the measure. Mr. Gutierrez said many illegal immigrants might prefer working here for several years and returning home.

"That is something we need to discuss, we need to think through," Mr. Gutierrez said. "There is a path today to citizenship, so it is not as if we need to create a new path to citizenship."

"What people want first and foremost is legal status," he said. "I'm not sure everybody wants to be a U.S. citizen. Many just want to be able to work. And if they can work legally, one day they would like to go back home."

Mr. Chertoff noted that only about a third of the illegal immigrants granted legal status as a result of legislation passed in 1986 actually ended up applying for citizenship. "A significant majority did not become citizens," he said.

It was unclear whether the officials were simply trying to ease conservative concerns about the citizenship question or whether Mr. Bush had actually shifted his position. Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman, said Mr. Bush still supported a path to citizenship that would include payments of fines back taxes and a requirement to learn English, among other things. But it seemed unlikely that the two cabinet secretaries would make such remarks without first consulting the White House.

But advocates for immigrants warned that legislation without a path to citizenship would be unacceptable to many Democrats and some Republicans. They also objected to another proposal suggested by Mr. Chertoff, which would limit judicial review of decisions made by immigration officials determining eligibility for the legalization program.

"Without the inclusion of a path to citizenship in a legalization program, you are essentially creating a permanent underclass in our country," said Bishop Gerald Barnes of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops Committee on Migration.

Lawmakers also highlighted other concerns. Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who was a key architect of last year's bill, complained that he and other Republicans were being shut out of negotiations over the new legislation.

Meanwhile, Senator Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat who supported the bill last year, said she now believed it was overly broad and susceptible to fraud.

Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said Mr. Bush would have to ensure that lawmakers came together. "It's not going to be an easy process," Mr. Leahy said.

Immigration Minefield For '08 Hopefuls (HILL)

By Elana Schor And Ian Swanson

The Hill, March 1, 2007

The imminent release of a new Senate immigration bill exposes a minefield of political hazards for the six senators chasing their parties' presidential nominations.

DOJ_NMG_0138598

Senate leaders on both sides of the aisle have expressed readiness to restart the debate over combining border enforcement with a path to earned citizenship for illegal immigrants in the country. Yet Democrats now face high expectations on immigration after campaigning on last year's failure to reach a conference on comprehensive reform, and the Senate GOP's two 2008 candidates face their own backlash over backing the bill last year.

The White House contender most openly staking his electoral fortunes on immigration is Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who is putting the finishing touches on this year's edition of the reform bill he offered last year with Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.). Their measure could emerge as quickly as next week, with McCain helping corral Republican conference members who are wary of sitting down with newly empowered Democrats.

At a Judiciary Committee hearing yesterday that kick-started the immigration debate, ranking Republican Arlen Specter (Pa.) reflected the concerns of some members and aides that McCain and Kennedy were not bringing their colleagues to the table early on.

"I have been concerned about reading what is happening behind the scenes in the newspapers," Specter said, adding that he had told Kennedy twice of the lack of staff-level communication.

Kennedy spokeswoman Laura Capps disputed the notion that members were on the sidelines, citing informal talks that have occurred off the floor. One key Republican not present at those talks, however, was Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), now among McCain's presidential primary foes.

Brownback is as conscious as McCain of the conservative base's discontent with last year's Senate immigration bill, and any changes seen as left-leaning — such as the elimination of the three-tiered path to citizenship in last year's legislation — could sway the Kansan to vote no this time around.

One Senate GOP aide noted that Republicans were more willing to swallow unsavory elements of the dense immigration bill because they knew their leadership was ultimately in control: "Even if they somehow come up with a bill that's where it was last year, the conferees are going to be Democrats, not Republicans."

Another Republican staffer agreed that McCain has much to lose in this year's run at immigration reform.

"[For conservatives], the fight is going to be multiplied this year because of concerns that [Speaker Nancy] Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Ted Kennedy and McCain will be in charge," the aide said. "This is definitely a strange timing for this in [McCain's] courtship of conservatives."

Meanwhile, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) voiced grievances of her own that could haunt presidentially inclined Democrats. Feinstein said earlier this week that she had seen no details of the Kennedy-McCain draft, adding plainly that she has "no investment" in that bill.

Feinstein, whose state boasts the highest number of electoral votes in the nation, said yesterday that she favored pursuing two narrower immigration plans instead of comprehensive reform: AgJobs, which would provide temporary worker visas to agricultural workers; and the DREAM Act, which calls for children of illegal immigrants to achieve legal status while seeking college degrees.

Four 2008 candidates already have cosponsored Feinstein's AgJobs bill this year: Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), Barack Obama (D-Ill.), Joseph Biden (D-Del.) and McCain. Potential candidate Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) has also signed on. All five have been sponsors since 2005, and Democratic candidate John Edwards was also a sponsor during his time in the Senate.

Democrats like Clinton and Obama are caught between groups representing Hispanics, the fastest-growing voting bloc in the U.S., and traditional allies in organized labor who want to ensure an immigration bill does not hurt U.S. workers.

Labor organizations took different positions on last year's bill. Unite Here! which represents textile workers, and the Service Employees International Union supported the Kennedy-McCain bill, but the nation's broadest union, the AFL-CIO, opposed it, as did the Teamsters.

AFL-CIO legislative representative Sonya Ramirez described this as "more of a fracture than a split" and said it would be a mischaracterization to think labor was not fully engaged in last year's debate.

"I think that's a convenient notion," she said. "Because we refused to actively oppose bills in the last cycle, people think we had disagreements and kept them to ourselves."

She said the AFL-CIO's engagement on the issue resulted in amendments added to the Kennedy-McCain bill by Obama, which Ramirez said are likely to be included in the bill Kennedy and McCain are preparing.

Amendments introduced by the Illinois senator last year were approved by voice vote and required that temporary workers be paid a "prevailing wage." Obama also would have restricted the use of a new visa for low-skilled workers in areas with unemployment rates above 9 percent.

This year, however, Ramirez said there is no guarantee that the group won't actively oppose immigration-reform legislation. For example, the AFL-CIO did not support any of the major immigration bills considered in the upper chamber last year, and has clear policies stating that temporary-worker programs would be disastrous to U.S. labor standards, Ramirez said.

Angela Kelley, deputy director of the National Immigration Forum, acknowledged that Democratic presidential candidates will want to show they are not soft on immigration. Still, she added, it will be difficult for presidential candidates not to support immigration reform because of the burgeoning engagement of Latino voters.

The Democrats' dilemma was illustrated earlier this year, when Hispanic-American radio host and blogger Mario Solis-Marich seized upon an interview with former national party chairman and Clinton ally Terry McAuliffe. Solis-Marich launched McAuliffe's comment that "you've got to shut the borders down" around the blogosphere, reminding Clinton that "Latinos have a choice in '08." The Clinton campaign promptly noted that McAuliffe did not speak for the senator.

Secrecy Could Kill Immigration Reform (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's secret work on an immigration bill threatens the chance of passing any guest-worker program this year, warned Sen. Arlen Specter, the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee.

"If you want to be in at the landing, you have to be in at the takeoff," Mr. Specter of Pennsylvania yesterday cautioned Mr. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, and Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, saying Mr. Kennedy has broken a promise to consult with other senators' staffs on a new bill. That bill, details of which were first reported by The Washington Times, would grant citizenship rights to most illegal aliens already in the U.S.

President Bush dispatched two Cabinet secretaries to testify to the Judiciary Committee yesterday as the Senate restarted the immigration debate, which stalled last year because of a deep split among Republicans on the issue.

But Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez undercut Mr. Bush's own rationale for supporting citizenship rights for illegal aliens. Mr. Gutierrez said a temporary-worker program alone would be enough to encourage illegal aliens to come forward, even without the prospect of citizenship.

"I don't think that citizenship is what will make them come out of the shadows, it's just the opportunity to have legal status so they don't have to be in the shadows," Mr. Gutierrez said.

Mr. Specter's warning and Mr. Gutierrez's comments underscore how even with a Democratic majority, which is in line with Mr. Bush on immigration, Congress will struggle to pass a bill this year.

The Senate last year passed a bill that created a path to citizenship for illegal aliens for those who have lived here the longest, while denying it to recent arrivals. It also boosted homeland security and created a new foreign worker program that included a path to citizenship for future workers.

That had the support of Mr. Bush, who called it "a good immigration bill."

But House Republicans said it amounted to an amnesty for most illegal aliens, and they refused to bring it up, instead forcing the Senate to pass an enforcement bill that includes building hundreds of miles of double-tier fence along the U.S.-Mexico border.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick V. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, called the barrier a "Potemkin fence" and said the money would be "wasted" in building it.

Yesterday, he and other senators bristled at the "amnesty" label. Some of them pleaded with the secretaries to help them come up with a way to avoid the label.

"This amnesty question will dominate this debate," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, who supports citizenship rights for most illegal aliens.

Even as Mr. Kennedy and Mr. McCain work in private, they appear to have lost one key Democratic supporter. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, said that bill was too broad, that the guest-worker program for future workers was too big and that splitting illegal aliens based on their time here was too open to fraud.

"I am now of the opinion that we may have reached too far in the comprehensive bill and that we ought to take a look at doing this" in stages, she said.

Three years after Mr. Bush proposed his own guest-worker plan -- at the time it included a temporary guest-worker program but not a path to citizenship for illegal aliens -- the administration still does not have specifics on cost or even how long it would take to get a program up and running.

Under questioning by Mr. Kennedy, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff could not say how much time it would take to create and issue tamperproof identity cards or create the infrastructure for businesses to check on workers' identities. But Mr. Chertoff said the administration has made big strides on immigration law enforcement.

"I want to emphasize we're not done, but we're moving in the right direction," he said. "I think it's beginning to earn some credibility with the public."

Also at yesterday's hearing, Mr. Chertoff said the federal government will insist that states adopt secure driver's licenses that can weed out illegal aliens and identity fraud, turning back moves by several states to opt out of the requirements of the Real ID Act.

"Secure driver's licenses was maybe the top recommendation made by the 9/11 commission. It's not only critical for national security and homeland security; it also happens to be a very big step forward in protecting privacy," he said.

Mr. Chertoff also said he expects today to announce the rules to implement the 2005 law.

Fee Increase Could Curb Citizenship Applications (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, March 1, 2007

Construction worker Martin Delgado paid $845 to the U.S. government to have the chance for his wife and children join him as citizens in Arizona.

Under a proposed set of fee increases, Delgado would have had to pay nearly three times as much, or $2,595. The Tucson resident said citizenship for his family is worth the higher price.

"I'm willing to sacrifice to give my family the opportunity to live here legally," says Delgado, 41, a native of Mexico who has worked in the USA since 2000.

RELATED: White House renews effort to overhaul laws

The Citizenship and Immigration Service says the fee hikes will allow it to hire more staff and upgrade its creaky system so applications can be approved faster. Among its proposals is to raise the application fee for citizenship from $330 to $595 and the fee for legal permanent residency from $325 to $905.

Advocates for immigrants say the cost may price out the poor from becoming citizens.

"I've never seen an increase like that. It's outrageous," she says.

Emilio Gonzalez, director of the Citizenship and Immigration Service, says he knows some people may have to save more to become U.S. citizens. But Gonzalez says most people seeking residency here are, like the Delgados, able to afford the higher fees and consider their families worth the price.

According to agency records, the vast majority of people who apply for the required first step of permanent legal residency (commonly referred to as having a "green card") have jobs in the USA or are joining their spouses or parents as citizens.

In 2005, 1.1 million people received legal permanent resident status. Of those:

·649,000 are applications to unify with family members

·220,000 were people working and seeking entry based on their professions, job skills, or because they had jobs considered a priority by the U.S. government.

Of those, 134,861 had jobs in management or similar positions.

·160,000 people had sales, service, farming or similar jobs.

"This is a user fee, and the people benefiting from the service should be the ones to foot the bill," says Ira Mehlman, spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform in Los Angeles.

Mehlman's group, which seeks to improve border security and reduce immigration levels to about 300,000 people a year, says the proposed new fees are still a bargain for U.S. residency. "When you compare value to cost, it is fairly insignificant," he says.

Covering agency costs

The fee for the most commonly filed application, permanent residency or "green card," will increase $580 under Gonzalez's proposal. Other fees will be reduced and some will rise even more.

The fee for an investor (someone who qualifies as having the means to create jobs) seeking a green card would go from $475 to $2,850. About 45 applications a year fall in that category, says Rendell Jones, chief financial officer of the agency.

Gonzalez says the impact of the proposed increase for a green card is not as steep as it sounds.

He says under the current system, many people periodically pay $180 for work permits while waiting for permanent residency. Under the proposed fee structure, those work permit fees will disappear, Gonzalez said.

The law makes provision for fees to be waived in some cases, and 6% of green cards are granted without fee, according to the agency. Most waivers are for refugees and those seeking political asylum.

All of the fee increases proposed are undergoing a 60-day period of public comment. That ends April 2. And if all goes as planned, Gonzalez says he hopes the agency can implement the fees in June. "Any time you raise fees, it's going to affect people. That's a given," he says. Even so, higher fees are "something we feel is not onerous," especially given what the money will do.

The Citizenship and Immigration Service gets its entire budget from its fees. The increases will add an estimated $1 billion a year to its annual budget of close to $2 billion, says Michael Aytes, associate director for operations.

Aytes says higher fees will allow the agency to digitize applications and hopefully reduce waiting times for applicants by 20% by 2009.

"It's far more important that we charge a fee to cover the necessary cost of processing cases in the right way, in the right amount of time, than to lowball fees" and have poorer services, Aytes says.

Long waits, system glitches

Wait times for processing average six months. The agency says applicants sometimes complain that they become lost in the system. That happened to the Delgados, whose original applications were lost by the agency and had to be refiled, says Mejia, their lawyer.

Some in Congress such as Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., chairwoman of a House Judiciary subcommittee on immigration, questions whether the fee increases will prevent impoverished people from trying to become Americans.

The agency says it grants waivers to those who can show they can't afford to pay fees. But to get a green card, immigrants must make enough income to support themselves or have a financial sponsor. Pleading poverty to get a fee waiver could make one ineligible.

Gonzalez admitted "there is an inconsistency" in the policy. Mejia said people who can't pay the higher costs may choose to do something both sides of the debate dislike: remain in the country illegally.

Delgado, who brought carpentry skills with him from Mexico, makes about $32,000 a year and considers himself fortunate to have a job that allows him to bring his family here. As good a life is not possible where he is from, he says. He, his wife Ana Maria, and their sons Daniel, 11, and Luis, 13, are all here from Mexico under temporary permits.

For him, almost no price seems too high to pay.

"It's something I'm willing to do because it will give my family more stability, more opportunities here in the United States," Delgado says.

Colorado To Use Inmates To Fill Migrant Shortage (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

DENVER — Ever since passing what its Legislature promoted as the nation's toughest laws against illegal immigration last summer, Colorado has struggled with a labor shortage as migrants fled the state. This week, officials announced a novel solution: Use convicts as farmworkers.

The Department of Corrections hopes to launch a pilot program this month — thought to be the first of its kind — that would contract with more than a dozen farms to provide inmates who will pick melons, onions and peppers.

Crops were left to spoil in the fields after the passage of legislation that required state identification to get government services and allowed police to check suspects' immigration status.

"The reason this [program] started is to make sure the agricultural industry wouldn't go out of business," state Rep. Dorothy Butcher said. Her district includes Pueblo, near the farmland where the inmates will work.

Prisoners who are a low security risk may choose to work in the fields, earning 60 cents a day. They also are eligible for small bonuses.

The inmates will be watched by prison guards, who will be paid by the farms. The cost is subject to negotiation, but farmers say they expect to pay more for the inmate labor and its associated costs than for their traditional workers.

Advocates on both sides of the immigration debate said they were stunned by the proposal.

"If they can't get slaves from Mexico, they want them from the jails," said Mark Krikorian of the Center for Immigration Studies in Washington, which favors restrictions on immigration.

Ricardo Martinez of the Denver immigrant rights group Padres Unidos asked: "Are we going to pull in inmates to work in the service industry too? You won't have enough inmates — unless you start importing them from Texas."

Farmers said they weren't happy with the solution, but their livelihoods are on the verge of collapse.

"This prison labor is not a cure for the immigration problem; it's just a Band-Aid," farmer Joe Pisciotta said.

He said he needed to be sure he would have enough workers for the harvest this fall before he planted watermelons, onions and pumpkins on his 700-acre farm in Avondale. But he's not thrilled with the idea of criminals working his fields.

"I've got young kids," he said. "It's something I've got to think about."

Pisciotta said he hoped the program highlighted what he viewed as the absurdity of Colorado's position — dependent on immigrant labor but trying to chase migrants away. He said the people leaving were not just those who entered the country illegally.

"Some of them have said, 'We think our paperwork is in order, but how about if it's not and we get caught on a glitch,' " he said.

Ever since the Democratic-controlled Legislature took a tough turn on immigration, the new requirements have worried those in the country legally and illegally.

Immigrant advocates allege that some sheriffs have authorized deputies to pull over Latino drivers on supposed speeding violations and ask them whether they are in the country legally.

And more stringent requirements put into effect last year made it harder to get a driver's license. Numerous U.S. citizens, including the daughter of a state legislator, were refused licenses because they lacked proper proof of citizenship. A judge has since ruled that the requirements must be revised.

Social service agencies say they have discovered few illegal immigrants on public assistance since the laws were passed.

Immigrant and business groups agree that the heated rhetoric has led to an exodus of Latinos — though no one is sure how many. Businesses including carwashes and construction firms have complained of a worker shortage.

"It's like, 'Don't go visit that house, there's a guy with a shotgun at the door,' " said state Rep. Rafael Gallegos, who represents a heavily Latino agricultural district in south-central Colorado. He voted against most of the legislation.

Farmers on Monday met with state officials at the Capitol here to discuss using inmate labor. The Department of Corrections expects to begin sending about 100 prisoners to work on farms near Pueblo this month.

Some of the state's 22,000 prisoners have agricultural experience. Convicts can participate in programs on prison grounds to break wild horses and grow crops. About 700 inmates work in other jobs outside prison, such as on fire crews.

Ari Zavaras, the executive director of the Department of Corrections, said he knew of no other prison system in the nation using convicts to fill agricultural labor shortages.

In California, where growers also have complained about a lack of workers, inmates have not labored in private fields since the 1940s. Prisoners then were used as farmhands while laborers were fighting in World War II, said Terry Thornton, a spokeswoman for the California Department of Corrections.

"The idea [of using prisoners on farms] has been floated before, but these are not unskilled jobs. They're jobs that require a lot of training and supervision," said David Kranz, a spokesman for the California Farm Bureau Federation. "It doesn't seem like a very practical alternative."

Krikorian, of the Center for Immigration Studies, said the Colorado prison experiment was "a sign that there are solutions other than importing foreign labor."

He said "ultimately they're going to have to improve the wages and working conditions" to attract legal workers, as well as to mechanize parts of their farming operations.

Colorado's experience shows that hard-line measures have an effect on illegal immigrants, Krikorian added, noting that arrests had dropped along the U.S.-Mexico border since security was increased last year.

"We're seeing enforcement work, not just in Colorado," he said, "but all over the country."

TAX:

I.R.S. Finds Tax Errors In Reports Of Nonprofits (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

Some 600 charities and foundations have had to file amended tax forms after an Internal Revenue Service study found flaws in the way they reported payments to executives and other employees.

The I.R.S. has also asked 40 individuals to pay a total of $20 million in excise taxes, which is the penalty it imposes when it determines a nonprofit executive has been paid excessively.

“We found some problems,” said Steven T. Miller, the commissioner in charge of the I.R.S. division overseeing tax-exempt and government entities. “Whether they were due to confusion, poor design of the tax forms used by these organizations or something more nefarious, I can’t tell you.”

He said the results of the inquiry, which found flaws in the tax forms of a third of the 1,800 charities and foundations examined, convinced the agency that it needed to do more in the area of compensation at nonprofits.

The names of the affected organizations and executives were not released.

Organizations that had to file amended returns either failed to report, or reported incorrectly, perquisites like an executive's personal use of an organization's vehicles, travel payments for spouses of executives or other payments and reimbursements, I.R.S. officials said.

Those whose executives have been asked to pay penalties may have failed to use comparable figures from similar organizations in setting compensation or otherwise failed to justify executive pay levels.

"That shouldn't be read to mean that high compensation wasn't paid in the other cases," Mr. Miller cautioned. "What it means is that in some cases where we found high compensation — and we did find it — the organization has done a good job of using comparables and establishing a procedure to determine it."

The results of the study highlight problems with what many regard as primary tools for assessing nonprofits, the forms they file with the I.R.S. and many state governments, which become public record.

"For better or for worse, the tax form is the nonprofit disclosure instrument," said Peter Swords, an expert on nonprofit tax reporting and the former head of the New York Nonprofit Coordinating Committee. "It is to nonprofits what the whole S.E.C. regime is to regulated companies, and it is something that ought to be taken very seriously."

Last week, Dan Prives, a blogger and former finance director at World Relief, questioned the way Yale University completes parts of its tax forms.

Mr. Prives noted on his blog, www.wheremostneeded.org, that the university, which has one of the largest endowments in the nation, does not fully report on its securities transactions, nor does it describe what portion of specific expenses were spent on its programs, administration and fund-raising. In contrast, Harvard provides that information in its tax forms.

"It surprised me because usually A-list nonprofits like Yale are pretty accurate in their reporting," Mr. Prives said in a telephone interview. "It threw a whole monkey wrench into my thinking about what's being achieved by publishing these forms. You can have errors in plain sight and nobody's picking it up."

Tom Conroy, a Yale spokesman, said the university did not break down specific expenses but did report totals spent on administration and fund-raising. "We believe we follow an option that's provided for in the instructions that accompany the form," Mr. Conroy said.

Mr. Swords said reporting about compensation, in particular, is fraught with problems.

"For obvious, human reasons, people are reluctant to have salaries disclosed," he said. "It's one of the biggest topics of gossip, so there's been a tendency to underreport it or not to report it at all."

Many charities simply do not adequately understand the reporting requirement, experts say. For example, the Buckley School, a private boys school in New York City, stopped listing compensation for its headmaster and other top officials several years ago. Its tax forms stated that "compensation information can be obtained at the school."

"That's not adequate, flatly not adequate," Mr. Swords said.

Ogden N. Lewis, a Buckley board member, said the school had just filed an amended 2005 tax form spelling out the compensation of its five highest-paid employees.

Mr. Lewis said a parent had brought the problem to his attention in a letter. "I checked on the rules when I received that information and learned that we needed to report compensation differently," he said. "Once I was aware of it, it seemed clear, very clear."

The I.R.S. study, the largest ever undertaken by the exempt organizations division, began in 2004 amid heightened interest in the issue of nonprofit compensation in the news media and Congress. It involved two new units, one devoted to monitoring tax law compliance among nonprofit groups and the other focused on data analysis.

Among its aims were to identify and stop excessive compensation to nonprofit executives and other insiders through audits and questionnaires and to help nonprofits better understand laws governing reporting and payments to senior employees.

Mr. Miller said the exercise had spawned further ideas for I.R.S. inquiries. The agency has already begun a deeper inquiry into loans made to insiders at charities and foundations, contacting 200 organizations by letter and starting audits at 50 others, he said.

The potential for recovering additional revenue challenges what current and former I.R.S. officials describe as a long-held belief at the agency that policing nonprofits produces little reward, unlike scrutiny of individuals and for-profit companies. Mr. Miller said that with 70 audits still open, he expects the I.R.S. to recoup more than $20 million in excise taxes.

"There are penalties, too, for incomplete returns, and one of the things we need to look at is are we assessing those penalties in the right circumstances," he said.

Don't Get Pulled In By Tax Scams (WP)

By Michelle Singletary

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138604

Every year the Internal Revenue Service announces the top 12 tax scams. This tax season, topping the latest Dirty Dozen are fraudulent schemes connected with the one-time telephone excise tax refund available to most taxpayers.

The excise tax refund is available only on your 2006 federal income tax return and is intended to refund the tax collected on long distance telephone service. It's available for anyone who paid such taxes on a land line, fax, computer or cellphone for the period following Feb. 28, 2003, and before Aug. 1, 2006.

To make it easier for taxpayers, the IRS set a standard refund amount ranging from $30 to $60, based on the number of exemptions claimed on your return.

You don't need to present proof to take the standard refund amount. However, you can figure the refund using the actual amount of tax paid, based on your phone bills and other records.

Because taxpayers can request a refund for the exact amount of the taxes collected, unscrupulous tax preparers have persuaded people to claim a higher refund than they are entitled to. In some cases people are asking for thousands of dollars. Others are requesting what looks to be the entire amount of their phone bills for the period in question. In the most egregious cases, some individuals have asked for a refund of $30,000, which means they would have had a long-distance bill of $1 million from the end of February 2003 until the beginning of August last year. That 41-month period covers the time the 3 percent excise tax was collected.

To stop the abusive use of the telephone excise tax refund, the IRS is conducting site visits with tax preparers across the country to stop inflated requests. The visits started with 22 tax preparers who have handled more than 1,500 returns.

"We are taking this unusual step to confront blatant abuse of this important refund program," said IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson. "We want tax preparers to prepare accurate tax returns. If they don't, we will move swiftly to impose civil penalties and, where warranted, seek criminal sanctions."

Everson said individuals requesting what appear to be inflated refunds will have those refunds frozen and they may be subject to an audit.

This year's Dirty Dozen list features five new scams. You can get the full list by going to IRS.gov. Here are a few that caught my attention:

Â· Zero Wages. In this scam, the intent is to dispute income reported on a W-2 form. A person will file a Form 4852 (Substitute Form W-2) or a "corrected" Form 1099 showing zero or little income. The IRS says the individual may include some reference that his employer refused to issue a corrected W-2 for fear of retaliation from the IRS.

Â· American Indian Employment Credit. This scam reminds me of a scheme in which African Americans were persuaded they were entitled to a slavery tax credit. Thousands of African Americans were duped into filing for refunds for a nonexistent "slave reparations" tax credit. Now the schemers are moving on to Native Americans, who are encouraged to submit returns claiming their taxable income should be reduced because of an American Indian employment or treaty credit. It's a lie. It might sound believable because there is an "Indian Employment Credit." The intent of this credit is to give businesses an incentive to hire certain individuals who live on or near an Indian reservation. This credit is available for businesses that employ Native Americans or their spouses. In a somewhat similar scam, unscrupulous promoters have informed Native Americans that they are not subject to federal income taxation.

Â· Trust Misuse. This is a tried-and-true tax scam in which promoters get taxpayers to transfer assets into trusts. They promise reduction of income subject to tax, deductions for personal expenses and reduced estate or gift taxes. However, some trusts do not deliver the promised tax benefits. There are more than 150 abusive trust investigations underway, and 49 injunctions have been obtained against promoters since 2001, according to the IRS. The IRS has been aggressive in cracking down on these types of illegal trusts.

In all these cases, don't try to play innocent when it comes to a fraudulent tax return. "If you sign your return, you are liable," says Edward Smith, a tax partner in the Boston accounting firm BDO Seidman.

"You should carefully go through and make sure every item that relates to your tax return is true," Smith said.

You would think this advice is obvious. But looking at the Dirty Dozen, it is clear that many people don't mind cheating.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congressman In Probe Wants Papers Back (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0138605

AP, March 1, 2007

Attorneys for Democratic Rep. William Jefferson asked a federal appeals court Wednesday to force the Bush administration to return all documents that were seized during an FBI raid last year on the congressman's office.

In their 52-page request, lawyers for Jefferson, D-La., argued that the Justice Department violated Congress' right to withhold certain information from the executive branch when it conducted the unprecedented 18-hour search last May 20-21.

The raid was part of a 16-month international bribery investigation of Jefferson, who allegedly accepted $100,000 from a telecommunications businessman — $90,000 of which was later recovered in a freezer in the congressman's Louisiana home.

Jefferson's attorneys said nearly 19,000 pages of documents and electronic files seized by prosecutors and the FBI are covered by Congress' separation of powers privilege to shield certain legislative material from executive review.

But the FBI "inspected every document in the office suite and copied every computer hard drive or other electronic storage device they could find," the attorneys wrote in their request filed Wednesday with the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia. "Once that occurs, the privilege is breached."

"Because this case involves the first time in United States history that a search warrant has been executed on a congressional office, it is vital that the remedy imposed be sufficiently stringent to deter future searches that exceed constitutional boundaries," Jefferson's team concluded. "The only remedy that will vindicate and protect the fundamental principles of separations of powers and legislative independence ... is return of all of the seized materials."

The Justice Department had no immediate comment.

Last summer, the appeals court agreed to delay the Justice Department's review — and therefore, the bulk of its investigation — of more than a dozen computer hard drives, several floppy discs and two boxes of documents that were seized as he challenges the legality of the raid.

House GOP Pushes Floor Vote For Rep. Jefferson Appointment (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

House Republicans plan to force a floor vote on the appointment of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.), who is the subject of a federal bribery investigation, to a seat on the Homeland Security Committee.

The decision to put Jefferson on the panel was made by Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), and House Democrats endorsed the move at a private meeting Tuesday night, but his appointment must be confirmed by a vote on the House floor. Such an action would normally be a formality, but Republicans said yesterday that they would pursue a rarely used maneuver to force a recorded vote on the matter.

"This is a terrible mistake by the Democratic leadership, to take someone with serious ethical allegations against him and put him on one of the most sensitive and important committees in Congress," said Rep. Peter T. King (N.Y.), the ranking Republican on the committee.

Pelosi ousted Jefferson from his seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee in June after federal investigators raided his Capitol Hill office. In an earlier search of his home, $90,000 was found in a freezer. The money allegedly was accepted in a bribery sting involving an African technology company. Jefferson, who has not been charged, has maintained his innocence and was elected to a ninth term in December after a runoff election.

"You gotta wonder where Jefferson's gonna store all those homeland security secrets," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (N.C.), a deputy Republican whip. Other Republicans said Pelosi's decision contradicted her promise to create "the most ethical Congress in history." Said King: "It shows hypocrisy. Before the election, they made a big point of pulling him from Ways and Means and after the election, they put him on Homeland Security."

A spokesman for Pelosi said she opted to place Jefferson on Homeland Security because the panel oversees the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Jefferson had been a vocal critic of FEMA's performance during Hurricane Katrina, which affected thousands of his constituents.

But his appointment must be formally approved by the House, and Republicans said they would take the rare step of challenging the vote and requiring members to record their votes so Democrats will be forced to go on the record in their support of Jefferson.

"I have a hard time seeing how the Democrats will vote in the open to put a person with serious ethical charges against him on Homeland Security," King said. "If he was too unethical to be writing tax law, he certainly shouldn't be on Homeland Security where he has access to intelligence materials and ongoing operations. Even with FEMA, we're going to be looking into allegations of corruption related to contracting around Hurricane Katrina."

Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Pelosi, said that if Republicans follow through on their threat, they would set a "dangerous precedent. A number of their own members are under investigation," he said, referring to Republicans allegedly under scrutiny by the Justice Department.

Jefferson called the Republican criticism "politics as usual."

"Speaker Pelosi did the right thing by placing the congressional member who represents hurricane-ravaged New Orleans on this committee," he said. "My district desperately needs a voice on this panel."

Jefferson Seat Sparks Battle (RC)

By Susan Davis And Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, March 1, 2007

Breaking with longstanding but unwritten rules of comity in the House, Republican leaders plan to object to a Democratic resolution to seat embattled Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) on the Homeland Security Committee, arguing that Jefferson is ethically unsuited for the assignment.

Rarely, if ever, do the parties attempt to intervene on each other's committee assignments or internal party business. Yet Minority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) told reporters Wednesday following the weekly Republican Conference meeting that they would object to the unanimous consent request usually granted to approve mundane House business such as committee assignments. Republicans argue that because Jefferson is under federal investigation, he should not be given access to national security information.

Democrats could offer the resolution on the floor as early as today to formally assign Jefferson to the panel, but since it is a privileged resolution Democrats can bring it to the floor at any time without notice and may opt to hold off until next week. The Democratic Steering Committee and the full Democratic Caucus already have approved the assignment without opposition. Homeland Security Chairman Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) said Wednesday he had no objection to the decision.

"Not as far as I'm concerned ... I have not heard any," Thompson said, adding that no one has brought up the matter to him and that Jefferson "is a Member of Congress, who, like every other American, is innocent until proven guilty."

Jefferson already has taken part in committee business and attended a Wednesday hearing on reforming the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which played a widely criticized role in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina that devastated Jefferson's New Orleans-based district.

At the hearing, Rep. Henry Cuellar (D-Texas) made a unanimous consent request to allow Jefferson and three other Members who do not sit on the subcommittee to join the panel and question the witnesses. No one objected.

Jefferson was the only one of the four to show up and he took part in the questioning of FEMA Director David Paulison and other Homeland Security Department officials regarding reforms the DHS is making in response to last year's FEMA overhaul legislation.

Furthermore, Jefferson is scheduled to travel with President Bush on Air Force One today to tour the Gulf Coast along with other lawmakers from the Katrina-affected area.

The GOP's objection will force a roll call vote on Jefferson's assignment designed to put Democrats on record supporting Jefferson, but that effort is not expected to change the outcome as it is likely to fall on party lines.

Blunt could not recall a time in his career when one party objected to the other's committee assignments, but he said there was no doubt Republicans were going to draw attention to Jefferson. "I don't think we ever seriously discussed not having a vote," Blunt said.

In a statement, House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said the decision to seat Jefferson on Homeland Security conflicted with Democrats' earlier decision to remove him from Ways and Means.

"The Democrats previously determined Congressman Jefferson is unfit to serve on the Ways and Means Committee, which oversees the nation's finances and trade, so it is difficult to comprehend how they can approve of Congressman Jefferson's fitness for a seat on the Homeland Security Committee, with access to America's most sensitive and closely guarded intelligence information," Boehner said. "House Democrats and their leaders should immediately reconsider this baffling and troubling decision."

In his own statement Wednesday evening, Jefferson said the GOP's tactics were simply "politics as usual" and that his district "desperately needs a voice" on the Homeland panel.

The Louisiana lawmaker had served on the exclusive Ways and Means committee until June, when the House removed him from that post after the Democratic Caucus voted 99-58 to strip him of his assignment in light of the ongoing investigation.

Although he has not been indicted, at the time of the Caucus' decision in June, the FBI asserted it had videotaped Jefferson allegedly accepting $100,000 in marked bills from an informant last year. A subsequent search of the lawmaker's home reportedly turned up $90,000 of the marked cash in Jefferson's freezer.

Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing, but indictments have been handed down in the case that have implicated him in a business scheme to benefit a Kentucky-based technology company that also involved officials in African nations.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said Wednesday morning that he was unaware of Blunt's comments, but suggested that GOP leaders should consider applying the suggestion equally to those members of their delegation who currently are under investigation by the Justice Department.

"Is [Blunt] going to ask them to step aside?" Hoyer asked.

Democrats point to what they see as Republican hypocrisy on the issue because while they are taking the partisan step to oppose Jefferson's assignment, they have chosen to seat Members such as Appropriations Committee ranking member Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), who also is under investigation by the FBI and has paid nearly $1 million in legal bills in the past year.

A spokesman for Boehner declined to comment on Lewis, deferring to Boehner's statement. However, a GOP leadership aide said the situations were not comparable. "There's a big difference," the aide said. "There have been no indictments or convictions surrounding the allegations against Congressman Lewis. This is not the case with Mr. Jefferson. He was caught on FBI video surveillance accepting a $100,000 bribe, found with $90,000 of it in his freezer, and the authorities have made several convictions that directly implicate him in a crime."

House Democrats approved Jefferson's new committee assignment by voice vote at their weekly Caucus meeting Tuesday, during which no objections were raised, Hoyer said.

Jefferson, who also serves on the Small Business Committee, won his re-election bid in December, defeating state Rep. Karen Carter (D) by a resounding 57 percent to 43 percent in a runoff election in the 2nd district.

Hoyer acknowledged that the victory played a significant role in handing Jefferson an additional committee assignment: "He needs to be able to serve on their behalf," Hoyer said.

"Mr. Jefferson was taken off Ways and Means ... in recognition of the issues he is confronting," Hoyer added, noting that Jefferson's seat could be returned to him pending the outcome of the corruption probe.

Ways and Means has jurisdiction over international trade issues, and one of the allegations against Jefferson is that he may have taken bribes to help win a Nigerian telecommunications contract for an American company.

House Democratic leaders had announced in December that Jefferson would remain on "suspension" from the Ways and Means panel in the 110th Congress.

Rep. Alcee Hastings (D-Fla.) criticized the suggestion that the House would be asked to confirm Jefferson's new assignment, stating: "I consider it ridiculous."

Hastings, a member of the Intelligence Committee, also decried suggestions that Jefferson would receive greater access to classified information as a member of the Homeland Security panel, calling such statements untrue.

Veto Threat Looms Over House Labor Bill (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, March 1, 2007

President Bush would veto legislation championed by Democrats and labor groups that would make it easier to organize unions by eliminating employer rights to demand secret-ballot elections, the White House said Wednesday.

The House is to vote on the legislation Thursday and, with help from pro-labor Republicans from the Northeast, it is almost certain to pass. But the margin of support is expected to fall well short of the two-thirds needed to overturn a presidential veto.

The Employee Free Choice Act, also known as the card check bill, is the top legislative goal of labor groups eager to reassert themselves with the emergence of the Democratic majority.

The current system is broken because employers can coerce and intimidate workers into rejecting unionization, AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said in a phone interview this week. The House bill, he said, is "the most important improvement in labor law in many decades."

But the White House, in a statement, said the measure "would strip workers of the fundamental democratic right to a supervised private ballot election." Substituting a card check mechanism under which unions would get bargaining rights as soon as a majority of workers at a plant sign approval cards, "would turn back the clock 60 years and return us to a failed system."

Rep. George Miller, D-Cal., chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, urged the president to reconsider the threatened veto. "The administration's statement ignores the fact that it is employers, not unions, who routinely harass, intimidate, fire and reassign workers who try to form a union," he said.

Under the bill a company would no longer have the right to demand a secret-ballot election, overseen by the National Labor Relations Board, before a union can be certified.

The legislation also imposes tougher penalties on companies that violate the rights of workers trying to organize and sets up a binding arbitration process to prevent companies from thwarting a new union by bargaining in bad faith on an initial contract.

Unions see obstacles to organizing as a major reason union membership has dropped from 20 percent of waged and salary workers in 1983 to 12 percent in 2006. Discounting civil servants, that percentage is 7.4 percent, the Labor Department says.

Both business groups opposed to the bill and organized labor have launched major ad and lobbying campaigns. The Coalition for a Democratic Workplace, an anti-bill business coalition, said it would run radio ads in three formerly Republican districts captured by Democratic freshmen Tim Mahoney of Florida, Nancy Boyda of Kansas and Heath Shuler of North Carolina.

"We want to put members of the House and Senate on notice that we are watching how they vote on this issue," said coalition spokesman Todd Harris.

Democrats shrugged off GOP charges that the bill was payback for union financial support that helped put them in the majority.

For the past 12 years when Republicans controlled the House, Rep. Robert Andrews, D-N.J., told workers at a news conference Wednesday, oil companies, pharmaceutical companies and defense contractors profiting in Iraq had their day. "Tomorrow is your day," he said.

Unions and their Democratic allies say employers use the time before elections to pressure workers. The labor rights group American Rights at Work said 80 percent of employers hire union-busting consultants and 90 percent force employees to attend one-on-one anti-union meetings with their supervisors.

John Schmitt, senior economist for the Center for Economic and Policy Research, says that about one out of five union activists can expect to be fired as part of organizing activities.

But opponents argue that eliminating elections would allow the hard-sell tactics of organizers to go unchecked. People trying to get workers to sign cards "are not going to tell workers about the downsides of organizing. They are not going to talk about how expensive the dues are," said James Sherk, policy analyst at the Heritage Foundation.

Bush has issued only one veto so far in his presidency, to kill a bill expanding federal backing for stem cell research. It's unclear if this bill will ever reach his desk: Democrats in the Senate would need 60 votes to overcome a likely GOP-led filibuster.

Keep Union Ballots Secret (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

THE HOUSE of Representatives is expected today to approve a bill, favored by organized labor, whose stated purpose is glaringly at odds with its key provision. The Employee Free Choice Act is portrayed by its supporters as a way to allow workers to choose whether to join a union.

Unfortunately, the legislation would do away with a secret ballot in so-called organizing elections, making it easier for union leaders to pressure co-workers in what should be a free choice. Instead of having the option of insisting on a secret ballot election, employers would have to accept a union formed on the basis of authorization cards signed by workers — not by a secret process.

Unions and their supporters in the Democratic-controlled Congress say the so-called card-check system is the only way to overcome aggressive (and sometimes illegal) anti-union tactics by employers. In announcing support for the bill, Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez) complained that employers often fire workers who seek to organize. Such reprisals are illegal, and part of the Employee Free Choice Act increases the sanctions for employer violations.

Unfair labor practices deserve tougher penalties. But improper influence can work both ways. As a rule, union membership improves worker prosperity and safety. Even so, the bedrock of federal labor law is not unionism under any conditions, but the right of workers to choose whether they want to affiliate with a union.

Obviously, employers shouldn't punish workers for wanting to join a union, float falsehoods in trying to influence an organization election or bar union representatives from the workplace. Just as obviously, the penalties they face for doing so are laughable and need to be strengthened. By the same token, however, supporters of unionization shouldn't be able to pressure unwilling or hesitant employees to join a union. And you don't have to be a critic of unions to recognize that the card-check system invites such abuses.

Unions once supported the secret ballot for organization elections. They were right then and are wrong now. Unions have every right to a fair hearing, and the National Labor Relations Board should be more vigilant about attempts by employers to game the system. In the end, however, whether to unionize is up to the workers. A secret ballot ensures that their choice will be a free one.

Walter Reuther's Ghost (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0138609

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

The House of Representatives has scheduled a vote as early as today on a bill that strips 140 million U.S. workers of the right to decide in private whether to unionize. Naturally, it's called the Employee Free Choice Act.

Big Labor has been agitating to ease union-formation requirements for more than a decade. And prior to last year's election, the AFL-CIO, AFSCME and their allies made it clear to Democrats that this vote would be the most important return they expected on their investment in a Nancy Pelosi Speakership. This is payback day.

The union claim is that employers are engaging in rampant unfair labor practices to prevent employees from exercising their right to organize. But data from the National Labor Relations Board, which oversees union elections, show no rise in such activities. The reality is that union membership has been in decline for decades, and labor leaders are desperate to rig the rules in order to reverse the trend. In the 1950s, 35% of private-sector workers were unionized. By the early 1980s the number had fallen to 20%, and today it stands at just 7.4%.

The reason for this decline isn't illegal management meddling in organizing efforts. The problem is that unions haven't been able to persuade the workers themselves. Our own, longstanding position is that when a company is organized it is almost always the company's fault. But workers of all classes and skills can also read the news and understand that unions no longer provide job security, if they ever did. The most heavily unionized industries -- such as airlines and Detroit carmakers -- are typically those that are financially beleaguered and shedding jobs. Workers know that unions often provide short-term wage gains at the cost of longer-term job insecurity.

All of which explains the drive to rewrite the rules and do away with secret-ballot elections administered by the NLRB, a procedure in place since the 1935 Wagner Act. Under current rules, once 30% of employees at a workplace express interest in unionizing by signing an authorization card, organizers can go to management and demand voluntary "card-check" recognition. The employer then has the option of recognizing the union or demanding an election.

It shouldn't be surprising that many workers who sign these cards later have second thoughts after getting the employer's side of the story. Workers sign cards for all kinds of reasons, including peer pressure and intimidation. It's not uncommon for an organizer to approach an employer with cards that show 90% of the workforce wants to unionize, only to have the percentage plummet once employees hear about the downside of a union shop and have a chance to vote by secret ballot. So Big Labor wants to dispense with these petty elections and make union recognition mandatory as soon as a simple majority of workers sign a card.

Notably, nearly every American business group is united in opposing this affront to worker freedom. They understand this will make organizing that much easier, thus making their own businesses that much less competitive. One business response would surely be to hire fewer workers -- the opposite of what the unions claim to want.

The bill nonetheless has 234 co-sponsors, including seven Republicans, mostly from blue Northeast states such as New York, New Jersey and Connecticut. Because the Senate is expected to filibuster the bill and the White House is threatening a veto, these Republicans may figure they can have it both ways: Score points with the unions by supporting a measure that isn't going anywhere. But Members who go on record opposing secret-ballot elections will also have some explaining to do the next time they ask for business support.

So far this Congress, Democrats have been trying to present themselves as "moderates" who won't return to their bad special-interest selves pre-1994. But this union-enabling bill strips away that mask and exposes an anti-business animus out of the 1970s, if not the 1930s. Even if it fails this Congress, this week's vote is a warning about what could become law if Democrats and their union backers hold all the levers of power after 2008.

Big Labor's Payback (WT)

By Tom Price

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

Not even two months into the new Congress, the bipartisan facade of the highly poll-tested, heavily orchestrated first 100 hours is a distant memory. The real agenda of the new Democratic majority is coming to light, and many of the special interests that helped rally support for Democratic candidates during the last election cycle are lining up to cash in.

According to the Center for Responsive Politics, organized labor gave nearly $60 million in hard-dollar PAC contributions to Democratic candidates in the last election cycle — with tens of millions more for "get out the vote" efforts piled on top. So what are they getting for their efforts? Nothing less than an unabashed attempt to destroy one of democracy's most sacred rights.

The fact is, organized labor has seen its best days. It's hemorrhaging members at a steady pace — losing 325,000 members last year, down to 12 percent nationwide. That's quite a fall from 20 percent a quarter-century ago and a 35 percent high-water mark in the 1950s. But even last year's dismal number is inflated by the sole bright spot for unions — government employees, 36 percent of whom are unionized. In the private sector alone, where Big Labor's bread was buttered for decades, union membership has dropped to a meager 7.4 percent.

Faced with this reality, union bosses have reverted to full panic mode. And after they helped usher into Congress a new Democratic majority, they see a small window of opportunity; one final, desperate attempt to stop the bleeding.

That window has taken the form of the cleverly worded Employee Free Choice Act, which strips workers of their right to a secret ballot in union recognition elections. Instead, it would force workers to submit to a "card check" — a process that places them at risk of intimidation, coercion and threats from labor bosses, all to get them to sign a card to demonstrate their "support" for unionization.

The card-check legislation is the No. 1 priority of unions — and considering the bill's quick committee action and hastily scheduled appearance on the House floor this week, Big Labor has succeeded in making it a top priority for Democrats as well. After all, Big Labor shouldn't have to wait too long for a return on their staggering investment in last year's campaign, should it?

What's truly amazing about the Big Labor and congressional Democratic push for the card check bill is the absolute hypocrisy of it all. The labor bosses behind the effort to strip workers of their rights to a private ballot in union organization elections are the very same people who have argued passionately for such rights in union decertification elections. In fact, using quite stirring language, Big Labor once told the National Labor Relations Board that the secret ballot election is a "solemn" occasion, imperative to preserving "privacy and independence."

But Big Labor doesn't have a monopoly on hypocrisy in this debate. Congressional Democrats are giving them a run for their money. Consider this: Writing to Mexican — yes, Mexican — officials in August 2001 in advance of an election between two competing labor unions in that country, 16 House Democrats — 11 of whom remain in the House and sponsor the card-check bill, including the bill's lead sponsor himself, Rep. George Miller of California — plainly stated: "We understand that the secret ballot is allowed for, but not required by Mexican labor law. We feel that the secret ballot is absolutely necessary in order to ensure workers are not intimidated into voting for a union they may otherwise not choose." Not only do Democratic card-check proponents seem to support rights for Mexican workers that they aren't even willing to protect for their own constituents, but they also have admitted that the process is deeply flawed and prone to intimidation.

Usually, what's good for the goose is good for the gander, but not when Big Labor and their allies in Congress are involved. The fact is, whether in Mexico or the United States, in decertification or recognition elections, the card check takes free choice away from workers and leaves them completely exposed to coercion.

But, faced with plummeting membership and an ever-loosening stranglehold on American workers, organized labor isn't about to let bad policy — or blatant hypocrisy — get in their way. They're ready for their payback. And congressional Democrats stand ready to deliver. Indeed, it appears that democratic principles and the sanctity of the secret ballot are not the concerns of the new majority party.

Rep. Tom Price, Georgia Republican, is a member of the House Education and Labor Committee.

Bush And Democrats Talk Trade (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration and congressional Democrats are attempting to negotiate a grand compromise on trade that would allow several deals to move forward by elevating the importance of labor rights in those agreements.

After Democrats won control of Congress in November, in part by attacking free-trade agreements, President Bush's globalization agenda seemed all but dead for the rest of his term. Among priorities were bilateral deals with Peru, Panama and Colombia; the Doha round of multilateral talks; as well as renewal of a broad presidential authority to negotiate agreements and push them through Congress, which expires in June.

But the White House and lawmakers have decided to try to find common ground, as Mr. Bush has signaled flexibility on labor standards after years of resisting. The talks are being led by U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab, House Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel of New York and Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the ranking Republican on the committee. Much of the negotiations have been at the staff level, but the three principals have played a role, conferring in face-to-face meetings on Capitol Hill or over the phone.

It isn't clear a deal will be reached soon, if at all, given the bitter history surrounding the issue. The Democrats' main demand is to incorporate into trade agreements a requirement that other countries embrace the basic principles for workplace rights outlined by the Geneva-based International Labor Organization. These ban forced labor and child labor, limit workplace discrimination and reserve for workers the right to organize and bargain with employers.

Negotiators are struggling to find a way to translate those general goals into specific language that works for the U.S. and would-be partners in free-trade agreements, especially for developing countries where labor rights vary widely. They are also discussing ways to craft wording that would prevent the agreements from being used to challenge the U.S.'s own labor standards.

A successful agreement could clear passage of the Latin America deals and help jump-start the stalled Doha round. It could also presage bipartisan cooperation on other fronts, such as climate change, middle-class taxes and immigration.

"If you're serious about addressing problems, you've got to be serious about working with the other party," said Mr. McCrery of Ways and Means, which has jurisdiction over health and tax policy as well as trade.

Democratic critics of Mr. Bush, pushed by organized labor, want to elevate the importance of labor rights, according them the same status as business priorities such as patent protections that U.S. negotiators pursue on behalf of drug makers. Mr. Bush so far has preferred to deal with labor rights outside any actual pact. Critics say that strategy has made it difficult to enforce labor commitments, since they aren't subject to the same sanctions that back up business priorities.

A few weeks after the November elections, Ms. Schwab signaled in a U.S. Chamber of Commerce appearance that she wanted to deal with those concerns.

For Democrats, Mr. Rangel said, the goal is "not to do damage to trade" but to find a compromise that shows "this great country is at least concerned" with minimum labor-rights standards.

The issue of labor rights began to take on broader significance in the mid-1990s, when nations moved to lower trade barriers and integrate their economies. Critics worried that workers would suffer and pushed for enhanced protections. These efforts culminated in a U.S. trade pact with Jordan at the end of the Clinton presidency that affirmed the ILO standards. Critics say securing similar protections under Mr. Bush has been difficult.

In the current talks, one challenge vexing negotiators is how in concrete terms to carry out any agreement. The Panama pact, which was concluded recently, was left open to accommodate any labor commitments the administration might agree to with Congress. But the details of the Peru and Colombia deals have been settled since last year, and it remains uncertain whether they would be reopened or whether Democrats would agree to address their concerns in side commitments.

A problem that especially worries Republicans and the administration is how to ensure new labor commitments don't unintentionally rebound at home, where American businesses already have high workplace standards under U.S. law. Some officials fret about the limits imposed by U.S. law on the ability of government workers to organize and worry that putting ILO principles in a bilateral trade deal might lead to legal actions over whether the U.S. itself fully complies with the basic international rights.

"What we're trying to do is make sure everyone else lifts their game up, but not do it in a way that would affect U.S. law," said Schwab spokesman Sean Spicer.

Of course, other hurdles, from environmental concerns to port security, could arise. And a labor-rights deal between Democrats and the White House wouldn't likely be supported by the AFL-CIO, given its concerns with globalization.

But the Bush team is betting that a deal backed by Mr. Rangel and Michigan Democratic Rep. Sander Levin, a senior Ways and Means member, would strengthen support for trade among House Democrats and perhaps begin to rebuild the bipartisan coalition for free trade that existed for much of the 1990s.

For Democrats, the issue is fraught. After years of being frozen out of trade policy, Messrs. Rangel and Levin want to show they are players. But their ability to compromise may be limited, since trade was an election-turning factor last fall.

"If Rangel and Levin can't achieve a large amount of change, they can't move," said Lori Wallach, head of Public Citizen's Trade Watch, a labor-backed advocacy group. She said Democrats need to demonstrate for voters that they have made real changes to Mr. Bush's trade agenda. "If they do more of the same, they will not be in the majority after 2008."

OFF THE JOB Federal Aid Does Little For Free Trade's Losers (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

GALAX, Va. -- For more than 80 years, the people of Webb Furniture crafted wooden dressers and other furniture here at the foot of the Blue Ridge Mountains. In January, under pressure from Chinese imports, Webb shuttered its Galax plant and fired all 309 employees.

Tonya Graber lost more than her job painting furniture. The single mother also lost health insurance for herself and her 12-year-old son. Under a government program aimed at helping workers harmed by trade, Ms. Graber was eligible for federally subsidized health insurance, but she couldn't afford it.

She isn't alone. The Health Coverage Tax Credit, tucked into a 2002 trade bill to win support in Congress, is supposed to cushion the blow to factory workers hurt by imports by paying 65% of the cost of health insurance. (The subsidy is also available to workers whose companies have dumped their pension plans on the government's pension insurer.) More than four years after the program began, just 11% of those potentially eligible for the subsidy are taking it -- or about 28,000 of the roughly 250,000 people the government estimates may qualify in a given year.

"It's just not realistic to say that a laid-off worker who's uninsured is going to come up with 35% of the premium," says Stan Dorn, who has studied the program at the Urban Institute think tank. Even those who can find the money say they're struggling to figure out the rules and deal with as many as five state and federal agencies.

The troubles illustrate the shortcomings of a program pivotal to the debate over free trade and the globalization of business. A common political compromise in Washington involves keeping trade barriers low in exchange for programs compensating those hurt by imports. Free-trade advocates are generally happy to make such a compromise. They figure the winners from trade -- principally consumers who save money on imported goods -- can afford, through the government, to help compensate the losers. (See related article.3)

The problem is that compensation programs often add bureaucracy without helping many people. Even if the health-insurance assistance program were working well, it would aid only a fraction of those who lose their jobs. The Labor Department must certify that workers have lost their jobs to imports from certain countries or to a shift in production there. Most workers in call centers or other service industries whose jobs are sent overseas don't qualify.

Another struggling program is wage insurance, designed for workers over 50 who lose their jobs because of trade and then take a lower-paying job. The government makes up half the difference in wages, up to $10,000 a year, but it requires that workers prove they don't have "easily transferable skills." Some can't do that.

The issue: Should Washington give up on such programs, or should it expand them and try to make them work better? For the moment, people on both sides on Capitol Hill say President Bush will need to beef up programs for those hurt by imports if he wants congressional backing for new trade legislation.

Mr. Bush wants Congress to extend his authority to negotiate trade deals and put them to an up-or-down vote in Congress. The administration also is trying to restart the Doha Round of global trade talks.

The White House has promised to offer legislation to "extend and improve" the Trade Adjustment Assistance program, which includes both the health-insurance assistance and wage insurance. However, it didn't include many specifics in its budget for the year beginning in October. Several Democrats and Republicans in Congress are proposing to expand TAA to cover more workers, including those in service industries.

"There has to be more cushioning for people caught in the maws of free trade," says Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat who has criticized China's trade policy. "The fact that TAA has not done the job gives those who want to build walls around the U.S. greater currency."

Town's Lost Jobs

The issue is on vivid display in Galax, population 6,800. More than 2,000 jobs in this western Virginia town have been eliminated over the past two years as several furniture manufacturers and textile plants either closed or reduced their work forces in the face of cheaper imports, mostly from China.

Almost all of the displaced workers were eligible for the federal health-insurance subsidy, yet only about 100 have signed up, says Linda Nuckolls, who works in Galax for the Virginia Employment Commission. "These people have worked in a furniture factory for $7 or $9 an hour and they just don't have the money," she says.

Results were similar in a January 2006 survey by the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress. The GAO looked at five trade-related plant closures and found that no more than 12% of workers at any site were taking the credit. Among those who knew of the program but didn't use it, the most common complaint was that they couldn't afford to pay their part of the premium, the GAO said.

Laid-off employees usually can buy insurance through their old employers, who are required by federal law to offer it temporarily but not to pay for it. Another option in many states is to buy insurance through a health plan arranged by the state. On average, according to the Internal Revenue Service, the insurance costs $720 a month, with the federal government picking up $468, or 65%, of the cost and the former employee paying the $252 remainder. Although the program is officially called a tax credit and is run by the IRS, in practice it works like a federal subsidy.

Law's Constraints

David Williams, who oversees the program at the IRS, says the agency is working hard to make eligible people aware of it. He notes that the law Congress passed includes constraints that mean some of the 250,000 or so people reported each year as potentially eligible actually aren't. "Some may be ineligible if they may be entitled to Medicare, may not meet the age requirements, may be using a spouse's insurance or may be in a plan that doesn't qualify," he says.

The administration acknowledges problems. The White House Office of Management and Budget has called the program "not performing," and cited as a reason "the affordability of coverage to potential recipients." Mr. Bush's budget for fiscal 2008 proposes several changes to the program, though none to make it cheaper.

Ms. Graber, 32 years old, followed her family into the furniture mills. Factory jobs, like the hardwood used in furniture, were long plentiful here. Ms. Graber says it was hot and dirty work, but the $7.66-an-hour job came with health benefits, which were a big draw since her son has asthma and needs medication. "The reason I held on to that job was because of the health insurance," she says.

At Webb, Ms. Graber paid about $200 a month for insurance, which included dental and vision care. She looked into the tax credit and discovered that coverage for herself and her son would run about $400 a month, not including dental or vision. After the government picked up 65% of the tab, her portion would have been $140 a month -- plus a $500 annual deductible and $20 co-payments for doctor's office visits and medication.

"It was way too much with what I was drawing in unemployment," she says. She gets an unemployment check of $404 every two weeks, meaning her monthly income is under $900.

She enrolled her son in a children's health program that falls under Medicaid, the state-federal program for low-income families. She didn't qualify for Medicaid herself -- she says she was told her income is too high -- so she goes without health insurance. "I just pray to God and try not to get sick," says Ms. Graber, who is training at Wytheville Community College near Galax to become a respiratory therapist. Her tuition is paid through the TAA program.

Larry Kenny of Galax was making $45,000 a year as a maintenance mechanic at National Textiles LLC when he was laid off in May 2006. Mr. Kenny, 61, took the tax credit, in large part because his wife has lupus. His portion of the insurance bill takes $240 of the $1,200 a month he draws in unemployment benefits.

"I told my wife the only way we could afford it is if we don't owe anything to anyone," Mr. Kenny says. He cashed out $43,000 in his 401(k) retirement plan, sold his truck for $6,000 and used the money to pay off his mortgage and his car loan. "It's kind of scary because I was always used to having $20,000 in my savings account and now when I look there's just $200, if that much," he says.

Some in Congress argue it's unreasonable to expect someone who lost a job to pay 35% of his health-insurance bill. Those who get health coverage on the job typically pay closer to 15% to 25% of the total cost of their insurance. The Senate Finance Committee chairman, Max Baucus of Montana, says he plans to introduce legislation this year "to make this benefit work better."

Workers who seek the health-care tax credit must bear upfront costs. The federal subsidy often doesn't begin until 60 days after they lose their jobs because of a government-imposed waiting period before they are eligible to apply for benefits, so any insurance they hold in the interim is their responsibility.

Also, IRS paperwork often holds up final approval until well after the 60-day period. While waiting for the official sign-off, people must continue to pay the full cost of insurance. Some states have received grants from the Labor Department to help people with the upfront costs.

If laid-off workers decide to let the dust settle for a few months before doing anything about their health care, they may lose out. Forty-three states offer group plans that may have better terms than the insurance available from the former employer, but workers must apply for the state plans quickly. Under the Bush administration's interpretation of the law, workers applying for the new insurance must have three months of continuous health coverage prior to enrolling in the tax credit, with no more than a 63-day gap. Otherwise they can be rejected for pre-existing health conditions.

Applicants 'Overwhelmed'

The health-care tax credit "is a program you can be overwhelmed by," says Ms. Nuckolls of the Virginia Employment Commission. "The people we deal with don't have the education level to understand it."

Last April, Virginia Gov. Tim Kaine established the Galax Strike Force to help displaced workers navigate the bureaucracy. On a recent Monday morning, dozens of people crammed into the Strike Force's office in a strip mall with questions about the tax credit.

John and Barbara Farmer, who both lost jobs at National Textile, said they got a letter informing them their premiums would be increasing in 2007 and asking them to fill out a form they didn't understand. Ralph Ellis, who lost his job at Webb Furniture in January 2006, said the Strike Force helped him each of the three times his tax credit was canceled and when he was denied coverage because of earlier heart surgery.

However, privacy rules prevent state officials from talking directly to the IRS about individual clients. Ms. Nuckolls says she'll often dial the IRS from her desk and then put the client on the phone to relay information.

"On more than one occasion I've wanted to pull my hair out because the IRS would say, 'We can't tell you that,' " says Anna Rice-Wright, who oversaw administration of the health coverage tax credit in Virginia. "I would ask something as simple as, 'Can you tell me when their packages are going to be mailed out?' and they'd say, 'No.' " The IRS says it needs strict rules to ensure the confidentiality of financial information.

Other states offer less assistance. John Lewia, 62, was laid off in August 2004 from his job at the Eastern Paper Mill in Brewer, Maine. His wife, Sheila, says she got plenty of information from state and federal agencies but could make little sense of it, and had nowhere to get help. Her husband, who worked in the mill for 23 years, isn't able to read, she says.

The couple is going without health insurance for now, although Ms. Lewia suffers from diabetes and recently battled breast cancer. They try to avoid going to the doctor, and pay out of pocket when they do. "I think we paid $300 or something like that the last time we went," she says.

Hospital Officials Knew Of Neglect (WP)

By Anne Hull And Dana Priest

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Top officials at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, including the Army's surgeon general, have heard complaints about outpatient neglect from family members, veterans groups and members of Congress for more than three years.

A procession of Pentagon and Walter Reed officials expressed surprise last week about the living conditions and bureaucratic nightmares faced by wounded soldiers staying at the D.C. medical facility. But as far back as 2003, the commander of Walter Reed, Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, who is now the Army's top medical officer, was told that soldiers who were wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan were languishing and lost on the grounds, according to interviews.

Steve Robinson, director of veterans affairs at Veterans for America, said he ran into Kiley in the foyer of the command headquarters at Walter Reed shortly after the Iraq war began and told him that "there are people in the barracks who are drinking themselves to death and people who are sharing drugs and people not getting the care they need."

"I met guys who weren't going to appointments because the hospital didn't even know they were there," Robinson said. Kiley told him to speak to a sergeant major, a top enlisted officer.

A recent Washington Post series detailed conditions at Walter Reed, including those at Building 18, a dingy former hotel on Georgia Avenue where the wounded were housed among mice, mold, rot and cockroaches.

Kiley lives across the street from Building 18. From his quarters, he can see the scrappy building and busy traffic the soldiers must cross to get to the 113-acre post. At a news conference last week, Kiley, who declined several requests for interviews for this article, said that the problems of Building 18 "weren't serious and there weren't a lot of them." He also said they were not "emblematic of a process of Walter Reed that has abandoned soldiers and their families."

But according to interviews, Kiley, his successive commanders at Walter Reed and various top noncommissioned officers in charge of soldiers' lives have heard a stream of complaints about outpatient treatment over the past several years. The complaints have surfaced at town hall meetings for staff and soldiers, at commanders' "sensing sessions" in which soldiers or officers are encouraged to speak freely, and in several inspector general's reports detailing building conditions, safety issues and other matters.

Retired Maj. Gen. Kenneth L. Farmer Jr., who commanded Walter Reed for two years until last August, said that he was aware of outpatient problems and that there were "ongoing reviews and discussions" about how to fix them when he left. He said he shared many of those issues with Kiley, his immediate commander. Last summer when he turned over command to Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, Farmer said, "there were a variety of things we identified as opportunities for continued improvement."

In 2004, Rep. C.W. Bill Young (R-Fla.) and his wife stopped visiting the wounded at Walter Reed out of frustration. Young said he voiced concerns to commanders over troubling incidents he witnessed but was rebuffed or ignored. "When Bev or I would bring problems to the attention of authorities of Walter Reed, we were made to feel very uncomfortable," said Young, who began visiting the wounded recuperating at other facilities.

Beverly Young said she complained to Kiley several times. She once visited a soldier who was lying in urine on his mattress pad in the hospital. When a nurse ignored her, Young said, "I went flying down to Kevin Kiley's office again, and got nowhere. He has skirted this stuff for five years and blamed everyone else."

Young said that even after Kiley left Walter Reed to become the Army's surgeon general, "if anything could have been done to correct problems, he could have done it."

Soldiers and family members say their complaints have been ignored by commanders at many levels.

More than a year ago, Chief Warrant Officer Jayson Kendrick, an outpatient, attended a sensing session, the Army's version of a town hall meeting where concerns are raised in front of the chain of command. Kendrick spoke about the deterioration and crowded conditions of the outpatient administrative building, which had secondhand computers and office furniture shoved into cubicles, creating chaos for family members. An inspector general attending the meeting "chuckled and said, 'What do you want, pool tables and Ping-Pong tables in there?' " Kendrick recalled.

Army officials have been at other meetings in which outpatient problems were detailed.

On Feb. 17, 2005, Kiley sat in a congressional hearing room as Sgt. 1st Class John Allen, injured in Afghanistan in 2002, described what he called a "dysfunctional system" at Walter Reed in which "soldiers go months without pay, nowhere to live, their medical appointments canceled." Allen added: "The result is a massive stress and mental pain causing further harm. It would be very easy to correct the situation if the command element climate supported it. The command staff at Walter Reed needs to show their care."

In 2006, Joe Wilson, a clinical social worker in the department of psychiatry, briefed several colonels at Walter Reed about problems and steps that could be taken to improve living conditions at Building 18. Last March, he also shared the findings of a survey his department had conducted.

It found that 75 percent of outpatients said their experience at Walter Reed had been "stressful" and that there was a "significant population of unsatisfied, frustrated, disenfranchised patients." Military commanders played down the findings.

"These people knew about it," Wilson said. "The bottom line is, people knew about it but the culture of the Army didn't allow it to be addressed."

Last October, Joyce Rumsfeld, the wife of then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, was taken to Walter Reed by a friend concerned about outpatient treatment. She attended a weekly meeting, called Girls Time Out, at which wives, girlfriends and mothers of soldiers exchange stories and offer support.

According to three people who attended the gathering, Rumsfeld listened quietly. Some of the women did not know who she was. At the end of the meeting, Rumsfeld asked one of the staff members whether she thought that the soldiers her husband was meeting on his visits had been handpicked to paint a rosy picture of their time there. The answer was yes.

When Walter Reed officials found out that Rumsfeld had visited, they told the friend who brought her -- a woman who had volunteered there many times -- that she was no longer welcome on the grounds.

Last week, the Army relieved of duty several low-ranking soldiers who managed outpatients. This week, in a move that some soldiers viewed as reprisal for speaking to the media, the wounded troops were told that early-morning room inspections would be held and that further contact with reporters is prohibited.

Yesterday, Walter Reed received an unscheduled inspection by a hospital accreditation agency. Members of the Joint Commission, formerly the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations, began a two-day visit "for cause" to examine discharge practices that have allowed soldiers to go missing or unaccounted for after they are released from the hospital.

'Senior Administration Official' Sounds A Lot Like Dick Cheney (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - Ever wonder about the identities of those "senior administration officials" who always seem to get quoted talking about President Bush's policies?

It wasn't hard to figure out who was doing the talking when the White House released a transcript of a question-and-answer session this week aboard Air Force 2, Vice President Dick Cheney's plane. One big clue: The unnamed official used the pronoun "I" when discussing Cheney's visit to Afghanistan and Pakistan.

"I would describe my sessions both in Pakistan and Afghanistan as very productive," the official said.

"I have spoken with the vice president's office, and the ground rules that were laid out are going to remain in effect," Snow told reporters Wednesday.

The exchange during Cheney's flight to Oman on Wednesday highlighted the absurdity of a practice that's damaged the credibility of journalists and government officials alike. It's much easier to believe what people say when their names are attached to their words. Statements from unidentified people invite readers to doubt that the speakers exist outside of the reporter's imagination. If anonymity is designed to promote candor, it's difficult to find in the anonymous official's quote.

The Bush administration's use of anonymous sources has become a sore spot for reporters in the wake of a series of journalistic scandals involving fabricated quotes. Yet sometimes the need for anonymity is obvious: Some sources could lose their jobs or even their lives if their identities were disclosed.

So there may be a good reason to protect sources in Iraq, but in Washington, anonymity is too often a cloak for cheap shots and self-serving comments. Some officials insist on anonymity to minimize damage if they misspeak or say something that might be embarrassing. Reporters play along to maintain good relations or out of fear that they might miss something if they refuse to participate.

The Air Force 2 transcript was unusual only because it was so easy to identify the unnamed official.

"This has definitely achieved absurdity," said Lucy Dalglish, executive director of The Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, an organization that helps journalists protect their sources. "I don't look at this as anonymous sourcing. I look at this as big-time game playing. The only way to describe it is stupid."

The White House has cut back on anonymous briefings in recent years in response to reporters' objections, but some officials still insist on anonymity, especially when discussing foreign policy. Snow defended the practice, saying that anonymity allows administration officials to be more open with reporters.

Cheney is particularly press-shy when traveling overseas. Mark Silva of The Chicago Tribune reported that he and other journalists on the vice president's nine-day, seven-country tour got a total of 18 minutes to speak with Cheney on the record. (Cheney did offer two exclusive interviews to ABC during the trip.)

In a blog about the trip, Silva adhered to the Air Force 2 ground rules even as he vented his frustration over "facing someone important with something meaningful to talk about, but insisting on anonymity as the condition for a conversation."

Cheney seemed to have some frustrations of his own. He objected to press reports that suggested he'd demanded more action from Pakistani officials against terrorism. Some of the press accounts relied on unnamed officials.

"I've seen some reporting that says, 'Cheney went in to beat up on them, threaten them.' That's not the way I work," the "senior administration official" said. "I don't know who writes that, or maybe somebody gets it from some source who doesn't know what I'm doing or isn't involved in it. But the idea that I'd go in and threaten someone is an invalid reading of the way I do business."

But don't quote him on that.

Cheney's Trip Renews Debate Over Attribution In News Accounts (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

The reporters traveling with Vice President Cheney as he flew from Afghanistan to Oman yesterday were granted an interview with someone who would be identified only as a "senior administration official." But the official's identity would not remain a state secret for long.

"Let me just make one editorial comment here," the SAO said about the vice president's talks with Pakistan's leader. "I've seen some press reporting says, 'Cheney went in to beat up on them, threaten them.' That's not the way I work. I don't know who writes that, or maybe somebody gets it from some source who doesn't know what I'm doing, or isn't involved in it. But the idea that I'd go in and threaten someone is an invalid misreading of the way I do business."

The SAO also said that "I was very careful" in choosing words to criticize House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) on Iraq strategy.

The first-person pronoun gave away the game. But it also raised the question: Why did Cheney feel the need to speak on a not-for-attribution basis, and why did the seven journalists on the trip go along?

Lee Anne McBride, Cheney's press secretary, could not, under the ground rules, confirm the obvious. But, she said, "it was important to provide the press and public with briefings on these meetings, and it was determined that a more comprehensive readout could be provided on a background basis."

Mark Silva, a Chicago Tribune reporter who made the trip, was among those pressing Cheney's staff for an on-the-record briefing, saying the vice president has been elected twice.

"At the start of our meeting with a senior administration official, in which he advised us that he insisted this talk be on background, we asked him, too, to go on the record," Silva said. Cheney agreed to be identified only while discussing the suicide bombing at Bagram air base in Afghanistan that occurred while he was there.

Silva credited the White House with releasing an accurate transcript despite numerous "I" references. "But it's also a measure of how absurd the entire business of speaking as an SAO is."

Holly Bailey, a Newsweek correspondent, said she was "very surprised at how quickly the SAO laid out the ground rules," adding that "it was done so quickly that we didn't have a lot of chance to object." She said the trip was frustrating because reporters had no more than 20 minutes' access to the vice president on the nine-day trip.

Cheney's backgrounder took place as a federal jury is weighing perjury charges against his former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, related to his role in telling reporters about covert CIA operative Valerie Plame without being identified. Libby testified that the vice president directed him to conduct the background discussions with Judith Miller, then a New York Times reporter.

Senior U.S. officials have been briefing reporters without their names attached since Henry A. Kissinger was engaged in Middle East shuttle diplomacy. Sometimes these officials appear in the White House briefing room. President Bush and several of his predecessors have conducted such background sessions with, for example, network anchors and friendly columnists.

Journalists have occasionally objected to the ground rules in these sessions, but for the most part they have become an accepted ritual.

Time magazine blogger Ana Marie Cox called the senior official's Air Force Two transcript "as blatant as birdshot in the face," adding: "The willingness of the press corps to go along with this not-even-trying level of deception is especially embarrassing."

McConnell Fighting Bush's Battles In Senate (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

President Bush tomorrow will raise money for his political field general, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, who has stymied Democrats at almost every turn of the Iraq war debate.

"We think Mitch McConnell is a terrific and able minority leader," said White House spokesman Tony Snow, who declined to comment on how Democrats have fared in their attempts to halt the president's surge of troops to Iraq.

"You say Democrats are in disarray?" Mr. Snow said, feigning ignorance.

With the congressional debate over the war at fever pitch, Democratic leaders who rode to victory last fall on the promise of bringing the troops home are under fire from virtually every direction. The far left is growing impatient with the lack of progress, while more conservative Democrats are unhappy with the ideas proposed so far.

Mr. McConnell, 65, who looks more like a bookkeeper than a power broker, is "savagely political," according to one high-placed Democratic source. The Kentucky Republican has twice defeated Majority Leader Harry Reid's attempts to push through an anti-war measure that would have shut out Republican amendments.

"I don't think there's anybody in the Senate who is better than he is at managing the Senate and using the Senate rules," said Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican.

"I think that's what Senator McConnell principally has been trying to do, to make sure that all sides get a hearing," Mr. Snow said.

But Mr. McConnell's effectiveness has drawn attention from far-left Web loggers, as well as calls for the four-term senator to be targeted for defeat in 2008.

"When Reid can't get anything through the Senate, like ... the minimum wage or a vote on Iraq, the reason is Mitch McConnell," Matt Stoller wrote at MyDD.com this week. "It's time to do to Mitch McConnell what the GOP did to [former Majority Leader] Tom Daschle -- make him the symbol of everything that is wrong and get rid of him in a presidential year."

The latest polls show that more Kentucky voters approve of Mr. McConnell's performance than disapprove. However, a poll by the Louisville Courier-Journal last month showed that while 54 percent approved of Mr. McConnell, 52 percent said he should oppose Mr. Bush's surge plan.

Kentucky Democratic Party Chairman Jerry Lundergan said it would be hard to unseat Mr. McConnell, "but I do believe that if he has ever been vulnerable, it is now."

Mr. McConnell has more than $3 million in his campaign war chest, spokesman Don Stewart said. He would not comment on how much the campaign expects to raise at the fundraiser Mr. Bush will headline tomorrow in Louisville to kick off the senator's 2008 re-election campaign.

The most prominent likely challenger to Mr. McConnell is wealthy Louisville businessman Charlie Owen, who ran for the Senate in 2002 but lost in the primary.

"I just don't see anything materializing as a serious challenge to him. He's just done too good of a job," said Darrell Brock, chairman of the Kentucky Republican Party.

This Year's Toughest Balancing Act (WP)

By Paul Kane

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Rep. John Spratt's wife grew angry with him. He repeatedly fumbled a simple question in the spate of interviews he's given since becoming the new House Budget Committee chairman: What are his hobbies?

"You better . . . figure out how you're going to answer that question," his wife, Jane, yelled, as the South Carolina Democrat recollected the scolding.

The self-described bookworm has no other hobbies. His idea of fun at the beach is burrowing into the latest 10-year estimates from a Congressional Budget Office report. After a dozen years on the sidelines in the minority, Spratt has been thrust into the role he's longed for, as committee chairman. But now comes the hard part.

Spratt is in charge of drafting a budget plan that will close a deficit of more than $200 billion within five years. And, as Spratt explained, he has to "squirrel away a little money" for up to a dozen key Democratic priorities, including big increases for education and children's health care. And he's not supposed to raise taxes to cover the additional spending and eliminate the deficit.

"We want to do it [eliminate the deficit], and be able to meet our priorities," Spratt said in a recent interview.

Unlike his colleagues, Spratt cut short his congressional recess to return to Washington last week to work on trial runs of various budget proposals. Spratt will unveil his first budget the week of March 12 and submit it for passage by his committee. It's a prospect he's looking forward to with some trepidation: "Beware the ides of March," he warned, half joking.

But Democrats say he's the perfect fit for such a delicate task. A lawyer by training -- Yale Law School -- Spratt, 64, became a small-town banker in South Carolina's northernmost county before winning election to Congress in 1982. A Southern gentleman, Spratt has engendered some of the most loyal staff members on Capitol Hill. Thomas S. Kahn, his committee staff director, has worked for him for 21 years, and a handful of staffers in his personal office have worked with Spratt even longer.

By virtue of his state's prominent presidential primary placement, Spratt and Rep. Jim Clyburn (D-S.C.) are two of the most sought-after endorsements in the nonstop White House race. He's tried to push off the campaigners with a neutrality pledge, but that hasn't stopped the calls. The morning she announced her campaign via a Web video, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) caught a surprised Spratt on the phone.

"I didn't even know she had announced," he said.

Despite the respect Spratt has engendered on both sides of the aisle, Republicans relish the chance to pounce on anything Spratt produces remotely resembling a tax increase to help reduce the deficit. "They'll call it revenue-enhancement measures. We'll call it tax increases," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), the former party campaign operative who otherwise praises Spratt for the "certain consistency" in his legislative dealings.

Democrats are adamant that won't happen. "We are not talking about tax increases," Kahn said.

To help with the heavy lifting, Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) has sat in on meetings with top committee chairmen and leaders of the key coalitions within the Democratic caucus. It's part of an effort to measure which programs are most essential, trying to build consensus in advance and send a warning that some constituencies won't necessarily like what they see in two weeks.

Regardless of the assist from leadership, Spratt said he expects some credit or all of the blame to fall on his shoulders, depending on how things work out.

"I know what my marching orders are," he said.

Hard Recovery For Failed US Schools (CSM)

By Stacy A. Teicher And Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, March 1, 2007

BOSTON AND OAKLAND, CALIF.

Something had to change at Sobrante Park. Year after year, the elementary school in the poor flatlands of Oakland failed to meet test-score targets that, under state and federal laws, have consequences attached.

Sobrante Park overhauled the curriculum, turned over staff, moved the school schedule later, and rolled back bilingual education. After a difficult five years, the school now tests above Oakland's average and has freed itself from government intervention.

Yet Sobrante Park is a rare bright spot in a new and cautionary assessment of how challenging it is to reform public schools under the most sweeping national school reform in decades. A new study of California's public schools found that the number identified as chronically struggling has risen 75 percent in one year. Those schools now account for nearly 8 percent of the state's public schools. Just as noteworthy, most schools who fall into that category have not yet found a way to get out again.

California is a harbinger of the magnified problems that public schools around the country will face as the last phase of the reform timeline outlined by No Child Left Behind (NCLB) kicks in this year.

That is why experts are studying schools like Sobrante Park to understand which reforms work.

Under the mandates of the five-year-old NCLB, low-performing schools undergo a series of interventions. The last phase is "restructuring." After five years of not meeting targets for adequate yearly progress (AYP) on test scores, schools must plan for significant reform and implement it the following year.

DOJ_NMG_0138619

But a few states, such as California, put accountability measures into place prior to NCLB. Out of 245 California schools that restructured in 2005-06, just 11 percent met AYP targets, said the new report, released Wednesday by the Center on Education Policy (CEP) in Washington. The center has also studied Michigan, another early adopter of accountability reforms.

"What we're finding is that school districts that implement a variety of changes are more likely to improve their test scores than those that implement only one change, such as changing [a school's] staff," says CEP's president and CEO Jack Jennings. It's good that NCLB is no longer allowing officials to turn a blind eye to low-performing schools, he says, but improving schools "is a very challenging task ... and we should have a little bit of humility when it comes to telling schools how to bring about changes."

NCLB allows several restructuring options: turning the school over to the state or a management company, reopening as a charter, replacing much of the staff, or any other major action that will significantly change school governance.

In California, that last option – "any other" major action – is what 89 percent of schools in restructuring have opted for. The first options are a way for Congress to "sound tough" about reform, Mr. Jennings says, "but when you're running a school, they don't make a lot of sense."

But some others say the "any other" option is too often used as a loophole to avoid significant reforms. As NCLB reauthorization is debated this year, various proposals are on the table for how to make restructuring requirements more effective.

The Department of Education (DOE) proposes taking the "any other" option off the table. They would also give superintendents the opportunity to suspend collective-bargaining agreements in order to bring highly qualified staff to troubled schools to target students' needs.

At Sobrante Park, Principal Marco Franco opted for the "any other" option and changed four out of 14 staff members – a smaller percentage than the district wanted. "I knew the staff and I knew I wanted to keep them," Mr. Franco says. "If I lost the proportion the district wanted me to lose, I don't know if we would be in the same place."

Staff changes in Oakland's restructuring efforts are mostly a matter of moving teachers between schools in the district, with principals' hiring options limited by teacher contracts.

CEP found that 30 percent of schools in restructuring in California opted to change their staff, but only 5 percent of these schools went on to meet AYP.

Jennings acknowledges that the research is still too new to draw broad conclusions about what works.

Giving superintendents flexibility to bring better teachers into schools with the highest needs is a good proposal on the part of the DOE, says Amy Wilkins of The Education Trust, a group in Washington, D.C., which advocates for closing achievement gaps. But such moves need to go hand in hand with measuring teachers' effectiveness, she says. "Just getting different faces in the classroom is not the point."

After a year of hearings in communities around the United States, the nonpartisan Commission on No Child Left Behind came out last month with a set of recommendations. On the subject of restructuring, there was agreement that "when a school is struggling consistently, they need to take more aggressive action," says Gary Huggins, the commission's director.

The commission suggests, as does the CEP report, that schools be required to choose a comprehensive set of actions rather than a single intervention. But it also says they should have more time to show results once changes are made.

But it's unfair to mandate restructuring options when "none has any track record of success," says Bob Schaeffer of the National Center for Fair & Open Testing in Cambridge, Mass., which opposes NCLB.

The Oakland Unified School District, run by a state-appointed administrator since 2003 due to financial difficulties, decides case by case how much latitude to give schools in choosing restructuring plans. This year it says it might intervene in 14 schools, possibly closing four.

The plan drawn up by Franco and his staff had many components, but he sums up the philosophy this way: "If something is not working, toss it, man."

That got Franco, a Latino, into hot water with parents when he ended the bilingual program in the upper grades. The complaints tapered off after parents saw test scores improve, he says.

The teachers adopted a more scripted and uniform curriculum, making it easier for them to collaborate and for the principal to evaluate them. The school day was changed to allow teachers time to work with individual students. Franco hired a writing coach and used some money to reopen the school library, which had been converted to storage.

California school update

401 – The number of schools required to plan or implement NCLB restructuring in 2005-06.

701 – The number of such schools in 2006-07.

207 – The number of schools in restructuring that have failed to make adequate yearly progress on tests for seven consecutive years.

DOJ_NMG_0138620

10 – The number in restructuring that improved enough between 2005-06 and 2006-07 to have that label removed.

Poor Education Found In States (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times
The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

U.S. Chamber of Commerce leaders yesterday said states are doing a poor job educating America's children for the future, citing a new report by the chamber that graded each state in areas from academic achievement and teacher quality to how wisely a state is spending its education dollars.

"This is an effort to do what is responsible for America's youth," said chamber President Thomas J. Donohue. "Our study has found that when it comes to education, the states aren't making the grade."

The study, conducted with help from the Center for American Progress (CAP) and the American Enterprise Institute, compiled and analyzed data from other research, the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP) and a national survey of teachers. States received letter grades in nine categories but no overall rankings.

Arthur Rothkopf, senior vice president of the chamber, said the report identifies "leaders and laggards."

Massachusetts, Minnesota and New Hampshire topped the list of 10 states that received A's for academic achievement. New Mexico, Mississippi and the District took the three lowest slots among the 10 that received F's. Grades were based on an analysis of the 2005 NAEP, a test given to a sampling of students nationwide.

John Podesta, president and chief executive officer of CAP, pointed out variations. He said Massachusetts, the top state for academic achievement, showed only 44 percent of fourth-graders proficient in reading and 49 percent proficient in math -- numbers he called "unconscionable."

The study also examined whether states presented accurate information or overstated student performance. Massachusetts, Maine, South Carolina, Wyoming and Missouri received A's for honesty. Oklahoma and Tennessee received F's, and 15 other states that were deemed to be sugarcoating performance got D's.

Most states received A's or B's on teacher quality. Six received D's, and Rhode Island got an F. The scores were based largely on whether states test teachers in both basic and subject-specific areas, and whether they recruit and test non-teaching professionals.

In a comparison of education spending with student performance, 10 states -- including Utah, North Carolina and Washington -- received A's. The District and nine states -- including Hawaii and New Mexico -- failed.

The report was issued as the National Governors Association ended its winter meeting. Governors considered a federal framework to help states, institutions of higher learning and the private sector work together on innovations to improve proficiency in math and science, increase the number of science and engineering students, among other goals.

The chamber yesterday suggested higher starting salaries for teachers, removing ineffective educators and giving principals more control over budget and personnel. Chamber officials said the business community can give schools examples of management improvements, data collection and innovation.

A Critique Of Pure Reason (NYT)

By David Brooks
The New York Times, March 1, 2007

All the presidential candidates this year will talk about education. The conventional ones will talk about improving the schools. The creative ones will talk about improving the lives of students.

The conventional ones, though they don't know it, are prisoners of the dead husk of behaviorism. They will speak of education as if children were blank slates waiting to have ideas inputted into their brains with some efficient delivery mechanism.

The creative ones will finally absorb the truth found in decades of research: the relationships children have outside school shape their performance inside the school.

The conventional candidates will give the same old education reform speeches, trumpeting this or that bureaucratic reshuffle. The creative ones will give speeches like the one David Cameron, who is reviving the British Tory party, gave last month. They will talk, as Cameron did, about the mushy things, like love and attachment, and will say, as Cameron did, "Family relationships matter more than anything else."

They will understand that schools filled with students who can't control their impulses, who can't focus their attention and who can't regulate their emotions will not succeed, no matter how many reforms are made by governors, superintendents or presidents.

These candidates will emphasize that education is a cumulative process that begins at the dawn of life and builds early in life as children learn how to learn. These candidates will point out that powerful social trends — the doubling of single-parent families over the past generation, the rise of divorce rates — mean that government has to rethink its role. They'll note that if we want to have successful human capital policies, we have to get over the definition of education as something that takes place in schools between the hours of 8 and 3, between the months of September and June, and between the ages of 5 and 18.

As Bob Marvin of the University of Virginia points out, there is a mountain of evidence demonstrating that early childhood attachments shape lifelong learning competence.

Children do have inborn temperaments and intelligence. Nevertheless, students make the most of their natural dispositions when they have a secure emotional base from which to explore, and even the brightest children stumble when there is chaos inside.

Research over the past few decades impressively shows that children who emerge from attentive, attuned parental relationships do better in school and beyond. They tend to choose friends wisely. They handle frustration better. They're more resilient in the face of setbacks. They grow up to become more productive workers.

On the other hand, as Martha Farah of the University of Pennsylvania has found, students who do not feel emotionally safe tend not to develop good memories (which is consistent with cortisol experiments in animals). Students from less stimulating environments have worse language skills.

The question, of course, is, What can government do about any of this? The answer is that there are programs that do work to help young and stressed mothers establish healthier attachments. These programs usually involve having nurses or mature women make a series of home visits to give young mothers the sort of cajoling and practical wisdom that in other times would have been delivered by grandmothers or elders.

The Circle of Security program has measurably improved attachments and enhanced social skills. The Nurse-Family Partnerships program, founded by David Olds, has produced rigorously examined, impressive results. Children who have been in this program had 59 percent fewer arrests at age 15. (Presidential candidates are commanded to read Katherine Boo's Feb. 6, 2006, New Yorker article to get a feel for how these programs work.)

It's important not to get carried away. "Enhancing Early Attachments," a review of the literature edited by Lisa Berlin and others, is filled with phrases like "marginal success" and "modest but significant benefits." But these programs can be expanded.

And one thing is clear: It's crazy to have educational policies that, in effect, chop up children's brains into the rational cortex, which the government ministers to in schools, and the emotional limbic system, which the government ignores. In nature there is no neat division. Emotional engagement is the essence of information processing and learning.

In Britain, where both David Cameron and Gordon Brown have grappled with this reality, policy is catching up with the research. In the United States, we are forever behind. But that won't last. This year, some smart presidential candidate will help us catch up.

Consumer Groups Call For More Oversight Of Energy Regulation (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, March 1, 2007

Consumer advocacy groups are pushing Democrats to step up oversight of a federal energy panel that oversees electricity markets and to take a fresh look at electricity-deregulation policies that they argue have raised consumer prices.

Deregulation critics sponsored a Washington conference Monday on the health of wholesale power markets that included officials in deregulated states where prices have jumped significantly.

On Capitol Hill, these critics have asked the new Democratic chairmen of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources and the House Energy and Commerce committees, Sen. Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico and Rep. John Dingell of Michigan, to hold hearings on how effective the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) is in overseeing wholesale power markets.

Tyson Slocum, who directs Public Citizen's energy program, said deregulation has not led to competition in wholesale markets and that FERC has done a poor job of ensuring consumer rates are "just and reasonable."

Utilities, large commercial energy users and financial giants have formed their own coalition, called Compete, to counter anti-deregulation arguments.

Compete has hired the Nickles Group, founded by former Sen. Don Nickles (R-Okla.), Wexler Walker Public Policy Advocates, and Covington & Burling to lobby Congress and federal agencies on energy policy.

Electricity deregulation is not a hot topic in Congress. But in states that deregulated only to see prices rise and at FERC, which regulates wholesale power markets, the issue is a subject of significant debate; hence the formation of the lobby groups.

FERC itself waded again into the mix with its own conference Tuesday. Panel Chairman Joseph Kelliher acknowledged that competitive markets "face challenges." But he said the policy of a mix of competition and government oversight was made national by the Energy Policy Act of 2005.

"The fact that we are holding this conference shows that we have heard the criticism of stakeholders and market participants, and that we take these concerns seriously," Kelliher said.

Utilities say higher rates are the result of high natural-gas prices, not deregulation. They generally offer technical changes to the structure of the markets themselves rather than a return to the old days where regulators set rates based on the cost of generation plus a set fee.

Advocates once hoped that by bringing the same competitive pressures that reduced telephone rates and airline ticket prices, power prices would fall too. Under deregulation, vertically integrated utilities that produced the power and then transmitted it and sold it to consumers were broken up. Generation was separated from transmission and distribution.

Twelve states have fully deregulated their electricity markets, Slocum said. Those states pay higher electricity prices than the others. One reason these states embraced deregulation, however, was their power prices were higher than other regions to begin with. But rates have increased nearly 9 percent over the past four years in the 12 states, versus a 5 percent growth rate in the other 38 states, according to information Slocum cites from the Energy Information Administration, which collects a variety of energy data.

Joel Malina, a Wexler Walker lobbyist representing Compete, said rates in states that remain regulated have seen some of the sharpest increases in power prices in recent years. That means, he said, that rising price of fuels is to blame, not deregulation.

But he added that "no market is perfect." Deregulated markets are "evolving," he said.

Consumer groups seem split on the issue, based on whether they represent residential electricity users or large companies. The Electricity Consumers Resource Council, which represents large industrial users, says the current deregulation attempts have fallen short of promises.

But the group issued a paper in December rejecting calls to return to the old system because utilities had "little incentive to seek more efficient, lower-priced generation options or pursue innovative product offerings." The group said less regulation of so-called competitive markets was needed, not more.

The powerful senior lobby, AARP, meanwhile, has "serious concerns" about the rising electricity rates in markets that have been deregulated, said Debra Berlyn, a senior legislative representative for the group who attended the Monday conference.

"We've been active on the state level and now we are looking at what we can do to complement [that activity] on the federal level."

House Bill Boosts Scrutiny Of Foreign Deals (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The House approved legislation that would strengthen U.S. scrutiny of overseas-led business deals, underscoring lawmakers' angst over the frictions caused by the international-investment boom.

The measure, approved yesterday on a vote of 423-0, would require the administration to conduct an extended, 45-day investigation of most deals involving foreign governments, give intelligence agencies a formal role in the review process and increase disclosure to Congress, among other things.

The bipartisan legislation was written in consultation with the White House, which has tried to balance the dual goals of protecting national security and ensuring an open investment environment. While raising concern about some details of the bill, the White House moved ahead of the vote to welcome the House efforts to "strengthen" the investment-review process.

The depth of the vote underscores the broader difficulties ahead for the White House, which is striving to put the president's trade and economic agenda back on track. Voted in on a tide of antiglobalization sentiment, many lawmakers are concerned that U.S. workers and companies aren't getting a fair shake in the global marketplace.

The vote is sure to increase pressure on the Senate to take up the issue, and Senate Banking Chairman Chris Dodd of Connecticut said he intends to act "in the coming weeks." Mr. Dodd vowed to embrace a "balanced approach" that carves a greater role for the intelligence community in investment reviews and gives Congress "a far greater oversight role to prevent the recurrence of Dubai Ports World episodes."

DP World -- which is owned by the government of Dubai, a Persian Gulf emirate -- touched off a political furor on Capitol Hill last year after moving to acquire control of several U.S. ports operations as part of a broader deal. The Bush administration approved the ports deal following a standard, 30-day review, but lawmakers alleged administration officials had failed to grasp the post-Sept. 11 danger of giving an Arab firm access to American ports, where lax security is a concern. Amid the uproar, DP World agreed to sell off its U.S. holdings.

House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank of Massachusetts said yesterday's measure would reassure investors that the U.S. remains a secure place to do business by making clear the rules controlling U.S. scrutiny of foreign deals.

At the center of the issue is the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., or CFIUS, a secretive panel that reviews the national-security implications of overseas deals. Twelve government agencies are represented on CFIUS, which is led by the Treasury Department.

The House bill would require greater disclosure to Congress of CFIUS actions and senior-level sign-off within the government on certain deals. It would also codify the administration's authority to reopen, and even unwind, deals after they have been cleared by the U.S. government. Moving on its own, the administration recently began to using such a limit as a way to enforce other conditions that the government has imposed on transactions.

The U.S. business community, by and large, has swung behind the House bill. This week, a broad business coalition, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, circulated a letter on Capitol Hill urging passage, saying the bill would "enhance confidence" in the CFIUS process.

Bill On Foreign Investment Advances (WP/AP)

By Jim Abrams

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

The House agreed yesterday to give the government broader powers to review foreign investments in U.S. power plants, ports and other facilities that could be vulnerable to terrorist attacks.

The legislation, passed 423 to 0, would give legal muscle to a once-obscure federal office that gained attention a year ago when a Dubai company planned to manage six large U.S. ports.

The deal fell through after lawmakers from both parties said the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, or CFIUS, ignored serious national security concerns in signing off on the transaction.

The legislation, which moves to the Senate, would expand the definition of transactions that require CFIUS review to include those involving homeland security and critical infrastructures, and would take steps to ensure that high-level officials would be involved in decisions by the multi-agency group.

"This bill contains very tough provisions to protect national security, including the ability for CFIUS to reopen reviews when companies don't comply with mitigation agreements designed to reduce security risks," said Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-N.Y.), a sponsor.

The legislation would ensure that Congress is notified when investigations are complete. Lawmakers' complaints that they were left out of the process were a major factor in the anger engendered by the proposed Dubai Ports World deal.

It would require a 45-day investigation, after the initial 30-day review, of any deal involving companies controlled by foreign governments.

Last year, with Congress under Republican control, the House and Senate approved legislation to revamp the CFIUS process, but the two chambers were unable to compromise on a common bill.

The Bush administration said in a statement that it supported the House bill but expressed some reservations, including that extending the investigations to 45 days "may discourage foreign investment by generating uncertainty and delay."

Todd Malan, president of the Organization for International Investment, an association representing U.S. subsidiaries of foreign companies, said he was pleased.

"From a business standpoint, it doesn't screw anything up," Malan said. "It maintains CFIUS's role as a screening process, not as a barrier to foreign investment."

Federal Diary: Looking For A Route To Better Government (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, March 1, 2007

It's apparently not too early to start thinking up ideas for how the next administration can improve the government's management practices.

With the presidential campaign field taking shape, think tanks and public-service and business groups are preparing to develop policy proposals and ideas for the winning candidate.

The IBM Center for the Business of Government, for example, plans to launch an "interactive conversation" today to help find ideas for the next White House.

DOJ_NMG_0138624

To start the conversation, the District-based IBM Center hopes to prompt an online discussion on issues raised in a new report, "Reflections on 21st Century Management," written by professors Donald F. Kettl of the University of Pennsylvania and Steven Kelman of Harvard University. The Web address is http://www.businessofgovernment.org/transition2008.

The Government Performance Coalition, a group of organizations interested in management issues, is sponsoring a Transitions in Governance 2008 Web site, in hopes of helping shape the agenda for 2008 and beyond.

The group's steering committee envisions the Web site (http://www. http://transitionsingov http://.org) as a way to get political campaigns, federal managers and the public involved in defining management issues for the next administration. A "transitions blog" is scheduled to go live today.

Jonathan D. Breul, a former Office of Management and Budget executive, will be heading up the Performance Coalition. In a bit of a coincidence, he takes over the position of executive director at the IBM Center today, replacing Mark. A. Abramson, who will continue as a consultant to the center and reopen his own company.

Other organizations, such as the Council for Excellence in Government, also are making plans for the next presidential transition. Patricia McGinnis, that group's president, said the council plans to take its "Prune Book," an analysis of the plum jobs in government that require experienced leadership, and move it to the Internet. "We want to push out and reach a lot of people across the country," she said.

The council plans to sponsor a series of discussions for career managers to prepare them for what to expect during a transition, when a crop of new political appointees arrive in Washington.

Thinking up new ideas for improving government could be challenge, after almost 16 years of "reinventing government" by the Clinton-Gore administration and the Bush-Cheney team's "president's management agenda." Those initiatives were met with some resistance from Congress and were greeted skeptically by many federal employees who perceived them as efforts to downsize and outsource government operations.

In recent months, the government's efforts to improve the performance of programs and the delivery of services has been overshadowed by the controversy over the Iraq war, allegations of contract waste and fraud, and the sluggish response by federal officials to Hurricane Katrina.

Still, the federal government has taken what Kelman calls a "performance turn," driven by a 1993 law, the Government Performance and Results Act, that has prodded agencies to show the public what it is getting for its tax dollars. Efforts to link budgets to program performance measures also have become more common, Kelman says.

The next president, Kelman suggests, will take steps to increase the use of performance management techniques, improve management of federal contracts, and look at public-private partnerships and interagency collaborations as ways of improving service to taxpayers.

But Kelman says more research is needed to show that some of these efforts are more than just a management fad and can make a difference in how agencies and programs perform.

Kettl believes the next president will face pressure to reshape the government so that it can more quickly respond to what he calls "non-routine problems," such as terrorism, natural disasters and health emergencies.

The government's most important problems "refuse to stay within the boundaries of the government agencies established to solve them," Kettl writes.

"New agencies created to tackle the new generation of problems, like the federal Department of Homeland Security, have struggled to find their footing." he argues. "Even more important, they tend to be backward looking, focused on solving the last set of problems rather than scanning the environment for the next set of problems that must be solved."

The Real American Idol

March 1, 2007; Page A12

Amid the mad jumble that makes the news in our time, the White House on Monday held a ceremony for a Medal of Honor recipient. His name is Bruce Crandall. Mr. Crandall is 74 now, and earned his medal as a major, flying a Huey helicopter in 1965 in the Vietnam War.

The Medal of Honor is conferred only for bravery in combat. It is a military medal, and it is still generally regarded as the highest public tribute this nation can bestow. It is also very rare.

Still, the Medal of Honor does not occupy the place in the nation's cultural life that it once did. This has much to do with the ambivalent place of the military in our angry politics.

The Medal of Honor

In the House debate just ended on a "non-binding" resolution to thwart the sending of more troops to Iraq, its most noted element was the Democratic formulation to "support the troops" but oppose the war. We will hear more of this when the members of the Senate debate their own symbolic resolution.

In last November's congressional election, the Democrats picked several military veterans as candidates to mitigate the notion, a burden since Vietnam, that an endemic hostility toward things military runs through the party's veins. Those Democratic veterans won. Notwithstanding the bitter divide over Iraq, the presence of these veterans in Congress should be a good thing, if one thinks that the oft-publicized "divide" between the professional military and American civilians is not in this country's interest. It surely cannot be in the country's interest if over time more Americans come to regard the life of U.S. soldiers at war and in combat as an abstraction -- as say, mainly Oscar nominees or as newspaper photographs of scenes of utter loss at arms.

Two men have received the Medal of Honor for service in Iraq: Army Sgt. First Class Paul R. Smith, who died defending some 100 fellow soldiers, allowing their withdrawal; and Marine Cpl. Jason L. Dunham, who died after he dove atop a live grenade to protect his squad. (Cpl. Dunham's act was the subject of a 2004 Wall Street Journal story by reporter Michael M. Phillips and later a book, "The Gift of Valor.")

Bruce Crandall's Medal of Honor, at an emotional remove of 42 years, offers a chance to ponder just where the military stands now in the nation's life. The particulars of Lt. Col. Crandall's act of heroism, and what others said of it at the awarding of the medal on Monday, offers we civilians a chance to understand not merely the risks of combat but what animates those who embrace those risks.

Mr. Crandall, then a major, commanded a company with the 229th Assault Helicopter Battalion, carrying soldiers to a landing zone, called X-ray, in the la Drang Valley. An assault from the North Vietnamese army erupted, as described at the White House ceremony Monday. Three soldiers on Maj. Crandall's helicopter were killed. He kept it on the ground while four wounded were taken aboard. Back at base, he asked for a volunteer to return with him to X-ray. Capt. Ed Freeman came forward. Through smoke and bullets, they flew in and out 14 times, spent 14 hours in the air and used three helicopters. They evacuated 70 wounded. The battalion survived.

A Medal of Honor requires eyewitness accounts, and an officer there attested, "Maj. Crandall's actions were without question the most valorous I've observed of any helicopter pilot in Vietnam."

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, spoke at the ceremony of what he called "the warrior ethos." Look at his words and consider whether they still stand today, or whether as a matter of the nation's broader ethos of commonly accepted beliefs, they are under challenge. Gen. Schoomaker said: "The words of the warrior ethos that we have today -- I will always place the mission first; I will never accept defeat; I will never quit; and I will never leave a fallen comrade -- were made real that day in the la Drang Valley."

At issue today is the question: Is that ethos worth it, worth the inevitable sacrifice? And not only in Iraq but in whatever may lie beyond Iraq?

The secretary of the Army, Francis Harvey, went on in this vein: "The courage and fortitude of America's soldiers in combat exemplified by these individuals is, without question, the highest level of human behavior. It demonstrates the basic goodness of mankind as well as the inherent kindness and patriotism of American soldiers."

An American soldier in combat demonstrates "the basic goodness of mankind"? And the highest level of human behavior? This was not thought to be true at the moment Maj. Crandall was flying those choppers in Vietnam. Nor is it now.

To embrace the thoughts of Gen. Schoomaker and of Secretary Harvey is to risk being accused of defending notions of American triumphalism and an overly strong martial spirit thought inappropriate to the realities of a multilateral world. This is a debate worth having. But we are not having it. We are hiding from it.

Most school children once knew the names of the nation's heroes in war -- Ethan Allen, John Paul Jones, Stephen Decatur, the Swamp Fox Francis Marion, Ulysses S. Grant, Clara Barton, Billy Mitchell, Alvin York, Lee Ann Hester. Lee Ann who? She's the first woman to win a Silver Star for direct combat with the enemy. Did it in a trench in Iraq. Her story should be in schools, but it won't be.

All nations celebrate personal icons, and ours now tend to be doers of good. That's fine. But if we suppress the martial feats of a Bruce Crandall, we distance ourselves further from our military. And in time, we will change. At some risk.

"MR. SMALL is not going to talk about his own compensation," says the spokeswoman for Smithsonian head Lawrence M. Small. Who can blame him, seeing how he doesn't seem to have to answer to anyone for his spending, no matter how extravagant? The Smithsonian board, which is supposed to oversee the wise use of public dollars, instead defends questionable expenditures by Mr. Small and even changes its rules to excuse his conduct after the fact.

A report by the Smithsonian inspector general questioned nearly $90,000 in unauthorized spending by Mr. Small from 2000 to 2005. Included were charges for private planes, the tab for his wife to go to Cambodia, catered meals and gifts. There was no evidence of fraud or abuse and no denying that many expenditures were related to Smithsonian business. Yet, as The Post's James V. Grimaldi reported, many transactions lacked documentation, violated Smithsonian policies and, in the words of the inspector general, "might be considered lavish or extravagant." The 17-member Board of Regents brushed the findings aside; in instances where the spending ran afoul of policy, the board just changed its rules. It's also disturbing that there were efforts to keep the report secret.

Mr. Small is handsomely compensated (this year's package will be $915,698), so it's both inexplicable and offensive that he found it necessary to push the boundaries of what is allowed. Was it really necessary, for instance, to pay $14,509 to rent a jet for a round trip to San Antonio when commercial flights were available? Most striking was the way Mr. Small interpreted terms of a housing allowance, dispensing with filing monthly documentation and using a "hypothetical" calculation to collect $1.15 million over seven years. Never mind that Mr. Small owns his home free and clear.

As distressing as Mr. Small's actions were, the real problem lies with a board that opted to be more lap dog than watchdog. The Smithsonian receives 70 percent of its budget from taxpayers and also relies on tax-exempt donations. It's the board's job to ensure that those resources are not wasted or misused. Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), who has been attacking the practices of tax-exempt organizations, is asking whether the Smithsonian's governance system, established in 1846, is outdated. Mr. Grassley might have a point, given that his concerns were directed to a Smithsonian chancellor who also happens to be chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court and presumably has other issues occupying his time.

At least the Smithsonian board knows that it has its work cut out for it in restoring public trust. Roger Sant, chairman of the regents' executive committee, put the word out to Smithsonian staff members that the regents take seriously the issues that have been raised and are determining how best to proceed.

Dow Ends Up 52, Nasdaq Up 8 After Plunge (CHIT/AP)

By Tim Paradis

Chicago Tribune, March 1, 2007

NEW YORK -- Wall Street rebounded fitfully Wednesday from the previous session's 416-point plunge in the Dow industrials as investors took comfort from comments by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke but still showed signs of unease about the economy.

Bernanke's remarks to Congress that he still expects moderate economic growth gave some investors confidence to look for bargains. A recovery in some overseas markets following a worldwide selloff Tuesday also lent some support to U.S stocks, but the advance lacked some conviction -- the major indexes fluctuated throughout the day, with the Dow rising as much as 137 points before pulling back and advancing again several times.

The market's broader indicators also managed gains. The Standard & Poor's 500 index climbed 7.78, or 0.56 percent, to 1,406.82, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 8.29, or 0.34 percent, to 2,416.15.

Bernanke allayed some of the fears about a slowdown in the U.S. and Chinese economies that fed Tuesday's drop; remarks earlier in the week from former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan warning that a U.S. recession could take hold later this year contributed to Tuesday's declines.

Investors parsed a series of economic reports out Wednesday, hoping to glean a sense of where stocks were headed. Bernanke's comments and a gross domestic product reading that mostly met expectations helped bring out some buyers. Nevertheless, investors remained cautious and didn't rush headlong into stocks and discount the possibility of a further shakeout.

"It's typical that you get a bounceback the next day," said Joseph V. Battipaglia, chief investment officer at Ryan Beck & Co. "Now we're essentially flat on the year. Can we go up from here or down? That sorting-out process will continue now."

A recovery in China's Shanghai Composite Index, which had fallen nearly 9 percent Tuesday, also helped boost U.S. stocks, although other Asian markets and European exchanges saw declines of more than 1 percent.

Tuesday's decline, which was the largest point drop in the Dow industrials in more than five years, made February an unwelcome month for the 30-stock index. The Dow had its worst monthly percentage drop since April 2005 and the worst monthly point decline since December of 2002.

For the S&P, February was the worst percentage and point decline since May last year. And for Nasdaq, the month marked the worst percentage and point decline since July.

Bonds fell Wednesday as stocks tried to recoup some losses. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose to 4.57 percent from its low for the year of 4.47 percent late Tuesday.

The market took some solace from the Commerce Department report that the U.S. economy grew at an annual rate of 2.2 percent in the fourth quarter. The gross domestic product reading was slightly below expectations, but wasn't as weak as some investors had feared. The figure was more than a percentage point below the initial estimate of 3.5 percent made a month ago.

In other economic news, the National Association of Purchasing Management-Chicago index of business conditions in the Midwest showed a weaker-than-expected reading. The February figure fell to 47.9 from 48.8 in January. The report is often viewed as a bellwether for the Institute for Supply Management's index of manufacturing activity for February, which is due Thursday.

Also, a Commerce Department report found new-home sales fell by 16.6 percent in January from the previous month, the largest drop in 13 years.

"People are still more worried than they were two days ago but at the same time they seemed to take a little bit of comfort about today's comments," said Drew Matus, senior economist at Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. "What we saw was about right," he said, referring to Wednesday's trading.

"It showed that Bernanke has come into his own as a central banker. He passed his first crisis-management exam."

While some observers had warned that stocks had grown overvalued after the strong gains logged in 2006, Tuesday's pullback nonetheless came as a surprise on Wall Street, which had gone 45 months without a decline of more than 2 percent in single session.

In the bumpy trading that occurred Wednesday, particularly as fresh economic data emerged, investors appeared to be still calculating the ramifications of Tuesday's losses, which erased $632 billion in shareholder equity, according to Standard & Poor's.

Amid another heavy volume day Wednesday, the New York Stock Exchange instructed specialists, who match buyers and sellers, to keep their stock posts open longer than normal to catch any trades that might still be filtering through the system. The enormous volume of orders Tuesday led to a bottleneck in the Big Board's trading system.

In corporate news, Merck & Co. regained some ground after the drugmaker issued a first-quarter profit forecast that surpassed estimates of Wall Street analysts and raised its profit target for the year. The company rose 97 cents, or 2.3 percent, to $44.15.

Sprint Nextel Corp. rose 85 cents, or 4.6 percent, to $19.30 after the nation's third largest wireless carrier said fourth-quarter profit rose 33 percent on stronger revenue.

While many sectors saw buyers sniffing for deals, homebuilders saw additional selling, due in large part to the Commerce Department report that new-home sales plunged in January by the largest amount in 13 years.

Toll Brothers Inc. fell 72 cents, or 2.4 percent, to $29.86, while KB Home fell 56 cents to $49.53.

DOJ_NMG_0138628

Advancing issues outpaced decliners by about 2 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange, where consolidated volume came to a heavy 3.93 billion. Volume was lighter than the enormous 4.56 billion seen Tuesday, however.

The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies rose 0.64, or 0.08 percent, to 793.30.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average fell 2.85 percent, while Hong Kong's Heng Seng index ended down 2.46 percent. The benchmark Shanghai Composite Index rose 3.94 percent. Britain's FTSE 100 closed down 1.82 percent, Germany's DAX index finished down 1.53 percent, and France's CAC-40 was down 1.29 percent.

Fed Chief Seeks To Reassure Markets (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

Ben Bernanke moved to calm the markets on Wednesday, one day after reports of bearish comments by his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, helped fuel a global sell-off in equities.

The Federal Reserve chairman told the House Budget committee: "Taking all the new data into account, there is really no material change in our expectations for the US economy since I last reported to Congress a couple of weeks ago in the Humphrey-Hawkins hearings."

At those earlier hearings, Mr Bernanke presented new Fed forecasts showing that policymakers expect the US economy to grow at a rate of 2.5 per cent – 3 per cent this year.

Since then, US durable goods orders and monthly new home sales figures have come in sharply lower than expected and fourth-quarter growth has been revised down.

The Fed chairman's remarks suggest he believes this new information will have little impact on the forward-looking forecasts that form the basis of the Fed's interest rate decisions. Mr Bernanke made no reference to the comments by Mr Greenspan, who told investors in Hong Kong early on Monday morning that it was "possible" the US would end the year in recession.

"There did not seem to be any single trigger of the market correction we saw yesterday," Mr Bernanke said, adding: "I do not think it would be useful for me to try to parse the movement into the components associated with different pieces of news or pieces of information."

It is not the first time that market participants have cited comments by Mr Greenspan to help explain sudden market moves.

However, under Mr Bernanke, the Fed has consistently taken the position that it is not Mr Greenspan's fault if investors pay excessive attention to what he has to say.

In any event, the former Fed chairman's actual remarks were more measured than early market reports suggested, and the timing of their release makes it difficult to attribute a direct causal connection to the sell-off on Tuesday.

Rather than try to explain why the markets fell yesterday, Mr Bernanke focused on the broad economic outlook, painting a reassuring picture. "We expect moderate growth going forward," the Fed chairman said.

Mr Bernanke dismissed the suggestion that the downward revision to fourth-quarter growth estimates challenged the Fed's relatively benign outlook.

He told the House committee that the revision was "actually more consistent with our overall view of the economy than were the original numbers". By this, he probably meant the Fed no longer had to worry quite as much that the economy was in danger of overheating, while it also had to worry less about payback from unduly high inventory accumulation in the last quarter of 2006.

Mr Bernanke also repeated the Fed view that growth was likely to pick up in the second half of this year as the drag from housing and manufacturing fades.

He said: "If the housing sector begins to stabilise and if some of the inventory corrections that are still going on in manufacturing begin to be completed, there is a reasonable possibility that we will see some strengthening of the economy sometime during the middle of the year."

Mr Bernanke played down fears of a spillover from the crisis in the high-risk subprime mortgage market, adding that the mainstream mortgage market "still seems to be healthy and the lending side of that still seems to be healthy".

USA Today, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke reassured shaky investors Wednesday, saying there didn't seem to be a single "trigger" for the previous day's stock market plunge and reaffirming the central bank's earlier forecast for "moderate" economic growth this year.

DOJ_NMG_0138629

Bernanke told the House Budget Committee the Fed and other regulators are closely monitoring financial markets, which "seem to be working well."

The Dow Jones industrial average, after plunging 416.02 points Tuesday, the largest point decline in more than five years, closed up 52 points Wednesday to 12,269.

"There is really no material change in our expectations for the U.S. economy," Bernanke told lawmakers.

"If the housing sector begins to stabilize and if some of the inventory corrections that are still going on in manufacturing begin to be completed … there's a reasonable possibility that we'll see strengthening of the economy sometime during the middle of the year," he said.

The Fed's semiannual forecast, issued in mid-February, predicts that the economy will grow at a muted 2.5% to 3% rate in 2007, with unemployment near the current, low 4.6% rate. The slower growth — the economy grew 3.3% in 2006 — should reduce inflation.

Economic data in recent days, however, have tended to the weak side. The Commerce Department on Wednesday said the economy grew at a 2.2% annual rate in the fourth quarter, down from an earlier 3.5% estimate. New-home sales and housing starts plunged in January, and orders for long-lasting durable goods had the sharpest fall in three years, reflecting factory weakness.

Bernanke told lawmakers the lower estimates for fourth-quarter growth were in line with the Fed outlook.

Bernanke has called the housing market a big question mark in Fed forecasts. The central bank is closely watching escalating defaults in the subprime mortgage sector. Spreading weakness among subprime lenders, who make higher-priced loans to borrowers with poor credit, was a factor in the market fall.

The central banker said the Fed would soon issue tighter guidelines for mortgage loans, adding that while the subprime sector is a worry, "At this point, we don't see it as being a broad financial concern."

Over the longer term, Bernanke warned lawmakers that a sharp rise in Social Security and Medicare spending threatened growth and living standards. Without action, the economy could be "seriously weakened."

McClatchy Newspapers, March 1, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke tried to sooth jittery financial markets on Wednesday, saying the fundamentals of the U.S. economy remain strong and that he expects growth to pick up by midyear rather than sink toward recession.

Testifying before the House Budget Committee the morning after a global stock sell-off, Bernanke downplayed chances of a financial meltdown. He said financial markets “seem to be working well,” and said revised economic growth numbers published Wednesday confirmed consensus expectations among economists.

“My view is, taking all the new data into account, there is really no material change in our expectations for the U.S. economy,” said Bernanke, painting a largely positive economic picture, including an expected rebound in housing.

Bernanke’s testimony gave Wall Street a temporary shot in the arm. The Dow Jones industrial average had gained back nearly 200 points in early morning trading, but by midday slumped anew and was up by only 56 points, or about half of one percent. The trend was similar on the tech-heavy Nasdaq and the S&P 500.

Wall Street was attempting to claw back after Tuesday’s unusual and unexpected drop. The Dow closed down more than 416 points Tuesday, and the Nasdaq and S&P 500 also plunged precipitously.

Bernanke also addressed to two of the major concerns that have contributed to market anxieties _ a rise in defaults on risky sub-prime adjustable-rate mortgages, and a nearly 8 percent drop in the purchase of business equipment by major manufacturers and industries.

“We believe that if the housing sector begins to stabilize, and if some of the inventory corrections that are still going on in manufacturing begin to be completed, that there is a reasonable possibility that we’ll see some strengthening in the economy sometime during the middle of the year,” the chairman said.

That positive view stood in sharp contrast to his predecessor Alan Greenspan, whose Monday comments that a recession could loom late this year or early next year contributed to Tuesday’s global stock-market slide.

There didn’t appear to be “any single trigger” to Tuesday’s global stock sell-off, Bernanke said, pointing to a number of lingering concerns that all contributed to panic selling. Tuesday’s global sell-off began in China, where the Shanghai Composite Index fell nearly 9 percent. Stock exchanges of important emerging markets like Brazil and Mexico were also hammered, as investors everywhere took money off the table following a year of strong gains.

But fears of a global crash eased Wednesday morning. China's benchmark index, the Shanghai, rebounded by nearly 4 percent, gaining back almost half of Tuesday's losses.

The picture wasn't nearly as bright for the rest of Asia, where economies are very dependent on China for their own economic health, and where worries remain about a potential slowdown in China's booming economy.

Asian stock exchanges slumped again Wednesday. Australia, Japan, Hong Kong and South Korea all closed down, with losses in a range of 2-3 percent. Smaller economies like the Philippines and Malaysia closed down nearly 8 percent and 7 percent, respectively. India, an important emerging economy that's helped drive global growth, saw its exchange close down 4 percent.

"We've seen the increasing rates of default, we've seen the financial distress on the part of lenders and this is a concern," he said. "Our assessment though … is that there is not much indication at this point that the sub-prime mortgage issues have spread into the broader mortgage market, which still seems to be healthy and the lending side still seems to be healthy. It's a concern, but at this point we don't see it as a broad financial concern."

The Commerce Department on Wednesday revised economic growth numbers for the fourth quarter of 2006, showing the economy grew by 2.2 percent in that three-month period instead of 3.5 percent, as first reported. Because the revised figure came in around the consensus expectation, it served to calm markets. Bernanke called the revised growth numbers "more consistent of our overall view of the economy than were the original numbers."

The Fed for months has held off on raising interest rates, despite the nagging presence of higher-than-desired inflation, because it believes the economy is slowing enough to eventually bring inflation down without further rate hikes that could further slow the economy. The new GDP number confirmed that trend and eased market concerns that the Fed might hike rates again soon, helping to steady investor nerves. The higher growth numbers first reported for the last quarter of 2006, taken at face value, would have argued for further rate hikes, since strong growth eventually fuels inflation.

Bernanke Not Worried About Market Drop (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27 — Ben S. Bernanke, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, said on Wednesday that he saw little cause for alarm in either the previous day's stock market plunge or new evidence of slowing economic growth.

Mr. Bernanke's soothing comments helped lift share prices and recapture some of the ground they lost on Tuesday. His remarks contrasted with the more pessimistic tone of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, who cautioned on Monday that a recession was a possibility.

"We are looking for moderate growth in the U.S. economy going forward," Mr. Bernanke told a Congressional hearing, adding that "there's a reasonable possibility that we'll see some strengthening of the economy" toward the middle of the year.

Though Mr. Greenspan did not go so far as to predict a recession, the mere fact that he mentioned the word was enough to aggravate a global market downswing that began in Shanghai.

Mr. Bernanke expressed little alarm about the plunge, telling lawmakers that "there didn't seem to be any single trigger" for Tuesday's market rout and that markets "seem to be working well, normally."

Nor did Mr. Bernanke betray any worry about a new report by the Commerce Department, which sharply lowered its estimate of growth during the final quarter of 2006 to 2.2 percent from its earlier estimate of 3.5 percent.

The downward revision, which stemmed in part from new changes in estimates of inventory-building activities by businesses, were roughly in line with predictions by Wall Street analysts.

But Mr. Bernanke went further, saying the downward revision had actually bolstered the Federal Reserve's view that the economy was poised for mildly slower growth as well as a slight decline in inflationary pressures.

"My view is that — taking all the new data into account — that there is really no material change in our expectations about the U.S. economy," he said. "I would add parenthetically that the downward revision of the fourth-quarter G.D.P. numbers we got this morning is actually more consistent with our overall view of the economy than were the original numbers."

The Federal Reserve's forecast calls for the economy to expand by 2.5 to 3 percent in 2007, down from about 3 percent last year, and for the unemployment rate to remain below 5 percent — a level that many economists say is roughly equal to full employment.

Fed officials are hoping to achieve a soft landing for the economy, with the underlying pace of inflation slowing to about 2 percent over the next year from about 2.6 percent over the last 12 months.

DOJ_NMG_0138631

Mr. Bernanke's sanguine comments on Wednesday seemed at odds with those of Mr. Greenspan, who spoke by satellite on Monday to a conference in Hong Kong. Though he stepped down as Fed chairman more than a year ago, Mr. Greenspan's remarks can still move markets.

"When you get this far away from a recession, invariably forces build up for the next recession, and indeed we are beginning to see that sign," he said, according to The Associated Press.

But Mr. Greenspan stopped short of predicting a recession, saying that he could not rule out the possibility even though forecasters were not predicting one. His point seemed to be to caution investors against being too complacent, a theme he stressed in the months before he stepped down last year.

Timothy Geithner, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, echoed Mr. Bernanke's calm about the economy. "The U.S. economy has demonstrated and continues to demonstrate remarkable resilience," Mr. Geithner said in a speech at a conference on risk management.

Many economists agree with Mr. Bernanke that the economy is likely to keep expanding, though probably at a pace of less than 3 percent for at least the first half of this year.

In general, the government's sharp downward revision of growth in the final months of last year came as little surprise. Almost half of the revision reflected data showing that companies increased their inventories less than had been assumed. But that can actually spur growth in subsequent quarters, as manufacturers increase production to restock.

More disturbing was a bigger-than-expected drop in spending on capital goods, which declined 3.2 percent rather than the 1.8 percent originally estimated. Lower capital spending could be an indicator of a slowdown in business investment, at a time when Fed officials are counting on business investment to offset the sharp drop in home building.

In a separate report, the Commerce Department reported that sales of new homes fell 16.6 percent in January — the biggest drop since 1994.

Fed officials have expressed cautious optimism that the housing market is beginning to stabilize after a big decline. But the central bank is steering through a delicate transition, with inventories of unsold houses at high levels and rising anxiety about the volume of subprime mortgages granted to people with comparatively low incomes and weak credit ratings.

Mr. Bernanke acknowledged concern about the subprime market, where several lenders have closed and others have been forced to increase reserves for bad loans.

But the Fed chairman said he saw no sign yet that problems with subprime mortgages were leading to problems in the broader economy.

Nariman Behravesh, chief economist for Global Insight in Lexington, Mass., said that Mr. Bernanke appeared to have had a calming effect on investors.

"The measure of Bernanke's effect was that on a day when the economic news was not particularly good, the market was up," Mr. Behravesh said. "His message was that we seem to be on track, don't overreact and don't panic."

Markets 'Working Well,' Says Fed Chief (WP)

By Nell Henderson And David Cho

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke told Congress yesterday that the markets were "working well" and the outlook for the U.S. economy was upbeat a day after Wall Street suffered its steepest decline in nearly four years.

Bernanke said his view of the economy was unchanged. "We are looking for moderate growth in the economy going forward," he said at a previously scheduled hearing on the budget. His comments helped the Dow Jones industrial average recover 52 of the 416 points it lost on Tuesday.

Two days earlier, Alan Greenspan, the man Bernanke replaced a year ago, had expressed a strikingly different view about the economy. The former Fed chairman said signs were emerging that a recession was possible later this year.

The dueling viewpoints of both men, perhaps the two most influential voices on the markets, reflected the broader uncertainty over where the U.S. economy is heading and left some investors debating which oracle of Wall Street has the greater insight.

Greenspan's remarks were not welcomed by some inside the Fed who viewed them as possibly contributing to the market turmoil.

"It's not right to expect the former Fed chairman to take an oath of silence after he leaves office, but I bet his successors wish he'd stick to writing his memoirs," said Thomas Schlesinger, executive director of the nonprofit Financial Markets Center, which monitors the Fed.

DOJ_NMG_0138632

The U.S. economy expanded at a sluggish annual rate of 2.2 percent in the last three months of 2006, the Commerce Department said, far below its original estimate of 3.5 percent.

The department also said new-home sales fell by 16.6 percent in January from the previous month, the steepest drop in 13 years.

A regional economic report showed a weaker-than-expected reading on business purchases in the Midwest. The data are viewed as a bellwether of manufacturing activity nationwide.

Bernanke, who spent his career in academia before joining the government, has attributed the slowdown primarily to the housing slump and welcomed slower growth as a way to dampen price pressures. The Fed believes inflation is too high and worries it may quicken if the economy grows faster.

Greenspan's perspective draws on his years as a business consultant before joining the Fed in 1987. At a business conference in Hong Kong on Monday, he said he saw signs that the current expansion, which began in 2001, was aging.

"When you get this far away from a recession, invariably forces build up for the next recession, and indeed we are beginning to see that sign," Greenspan said. "For example, in the U.S., profit margins . . . have begun to stabilize, which is an early sign we are in the later stages of a cycle.

"Yes, it is possible we can get a recession in the latter months of 2007," Greenspan said. He added, however, that most analysts were not forecasting a recession.

Greenspan's comments elicited no significant reaction in financial markets when they were reported Monday morning. But his words loomed larger in many traders' minds during Tuesday's stock sell-off and after the latest weak economic data was released yesterday.

Robert Barbera, chief economist of ITG, a financial advisory firm, said it is hard to ignore what Greenspan says.

"Bernanke speaks as a top-elite economist," he said. "But . . . Greenspan is a creature of the markets, and as a fellow creature of the markets, I tend to agree with him."

Alfred E. Goldman, a senior market strategist for A.G. Edwards, said he's learned to trust Bernanke.

"Who is the better forecaster? If you held a vote people would say Greenspan because he was an icon for so long," he said. "But remember he doesn't have access to as much information as Bernanke has now."

Some observers questioned Greenspan's judgment in commenting on a possible recession, knowing well that his views are still closely followed.

"I do think it was somewhat inappropriate," said Kenneth H. Thomas, a finance professor at the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania, who has written extensively on the Fed and Greenspan. "Bernanke is still relatively new. Greenspan had 18 years as Fed chairman and is an icon of sort. . . . He still has a tremendous impact on the markets. It makes life harder for Bernanke."

Beyond concerns about a possible recession in the United States, analysts saw other troubling signs in Tuesday's frenzied sell-off. They said they were less worried about stock prices, which seemed ripe for a correction after a breathless run-up, than that the global economy showed signs of vulnerability.

Tuesday's stock-market fall was triggered by a 9 percent sell-off in China. Some economists were alarmed that China's markets, which are prone to rampant speculation and wild swings, could have such an impact on the world stage.

"It is interesting to note that all of this started in China," said Charles M. Jones, a finance professor at Columbia Business School. "If you went back 10 years . . . China was just not on the global economic map. This time when China sneezed, everybody else took notice."

A slowdown in the West could have a severe impact on China's economy since it relies heavily on exports to the United States, other economists said.

"Over the longer term there is a question of how long the United States can run massive foreign-account deficits that are funded by the willingness of the Chinese to produce a lot and not consume as much as they produce," said Richard F. Syron, chairman and chief executive of Freddie Mac.

Others said they are monitoring whether the U.S. housing slump cools consumer spending. Of particular concern is whether the easy availability of "cheap debt," which has fueled record-topping leveraged buyouts on Wall Street and riskier mortgage lending, is coming to an end.

The new-home sales report also fed fears of more market turbulence. Investors have grown jittery in recent weeks as the rate of delinquencies and defaults on high-risk mortgage loans have climbed, raising the prospect that lenders will tighten credit.

But Bernanke said that the central bank sees "no indication" that the turmoil in the market for riskier loans to home buyers with poor credit histories is spreading into other financial markets or affecting the housing market yet.

He said the Fed is "monitoring that situation closely," and added, "I don't see it as a broad financial concern."

DOJ_NMG_0138633

To some analysts, the home-sales report boosted the odds that the housing downturn would be a bigger drag on the economy this year than the Fed expects, possibly raising unemployment and rippling through other industries.

More optimistic analysts noted that the report followed one on Tuesday that showed sales of previously owned homes, which account for 85 percent of the market, rose 3 percent in January, possibly signaling a stabilizing of the housing market.

Bernanke said that if housing does stabilize and manufacturers such as automakers work off their excess inventories, "there's a reasonable possibility that we'll see some strengthening of the economy sometime during the middle of the year."

Bernanke Coaxes Market Rebound (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

Stocks rallied moderately yesterday, helped by assurances from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke that the economy remains solid and could strengthen later this year despite a warning from his predecessor about the possibility of recession.

Mr. Bernanke, calmly and deliberately confronting his first major market test since taking office a year ago, appeared to pass as Wall Street regained composure from the drubbing Tuesday that sent the Dow Jones Industrial Average plummeting 416 points.

The Dow, in posting a 52-point gain yesterday, also shrugged off fresh evidence of weak economic growth and the biggest plunge in new-home sales in 13 years. Major markets in Europe and Asia did not fare as well and posted further losses yesterday.

"We are looking for moderate growth in the U.S. economy going forward," Mr. Bernanke told the House Budget Committee. "There has been no material change in our expectations for the U.S. economy since I last reported to Congress" in an optimistic assessment two weeks ago.

Mr. Bernanke added that the markets continue to function well. While he is "concerned" about a meltdown in the subprime mortgage market, and the Fed is monitoring the situation "very carefully," he said he doesn't see any impact yet on the broader credit markets or the economy. He said he thinks interest rates overall remain low and credit conditions remain liquid for both consumers and investors.

"It's a concern, but at this point we don't see it as being a broad financial concern or a major factor in assessing the course of the economy."

Assuming the subprime credit crunch stays contained and the housing market stabilizes, Mr. Bernanke said he expects growth to rebound from subpar levels by the end of the year. The Commerce Department reported yesterday that growth clocked in at a subdued 2.2 percent pace in the final quarter of 2006 -- far below the 3.5 percent originally estimated -- and most economists expect it to stay that low or fall further in the first half of this year.

Mr. Bernanke said the report of sluggish growth is "consistent with our overall view of the economy," but "there's a reasonable possibility that we'll see some strengthening of the economy sometime during the middle of the year."

By contrast, former Fed chairman Alan Greenspan had contributed to the sell-off in the markets on Tuesday by telling Hong Kong investors that U.S. profits have peaked in a sign that the business cycle is winding down and could end in recession by year-end.

"When you get this far away from a recession, invariably forces build up for the next recession, and indeed we are beginning to see that sign," Mr. Greenspan said in response to a question. "While, yes, it is possible we can get a recession in the latter months of 2007, most forecasters are not making that judgment."

Mr. Bernanke appeared to exonerate Mr. Greenspan by noting "there didn't seem to be any single trigger" of the market rout, which reverberated worldwide after starting in China on Tuesday.

New York Fed President Timothy Geithner also sought to soothe the markets yesterday, noting the "remarkable resilience" of the U.S. economy and the "exceptional liquidity" that continues to fuel growth.

A second Commerce Department report yesterday that new-home sales plunged by 16.6 percent to a 937,000 annual rate -- the lowest in four years -- did not shake the Fed's official posture of confidence that the economy will skirt recession despite a marked slowdown in growth since the summer.

Some economists are not as optimistic and predict that further evidence of a deep downturn in housing and anemic growth in other sectors such as capital spending will force the Fed to reconsider and cut rates later this year.

Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group, an economic advisory firm in Princeton Junction, N.J., agreed with Mr. Bernanke that the economy is fundamentally sound and worries about recession are overblown.

"The chance of a recession this year is no higher than 20 percent," he said. "What triggered the drop in equity prices had little to do with economic fundamentals and more to do with what happens when investors get complacent about financial risk."

The loose lending practices that led to record defaults on subprime mortgages and the crunch in that market are an example of the misjudgment of risks by investors who provided funding for such loans, he said. Other investors are taking risks by borrowing heavily to invest in stocks -- driving margin debt levels to $285.6 billion in January -- the highest level since the dot-com boom in March 2000.

"It was the classic 'don't worry, be happy' market environment," Mr. Baumohl said. "Clearly, the market was ripe for a correction."

Bernanke Says Markets Working Well, Reiterates Growth Forecasts For Year (WSJ)

By Brian Blackstone And Benton Ives-halperin

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- U.S. Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Wednesday his outlook for "moderate growth" in the U.S. hasn't changed despite Tuesday's steep decline in global stock markets, calming fears about the sustainability of the U.S. expansion.

"There didn't seem to be any single trigger" for the sharp drop in equity prices Tuesday, Mr. Bernanke said in response to questions from the House Budget Committee, where he testified about the long-term budget outlook. He added that the Fed is closely monitoring U.S. financial markets, and they seem to be "working well."

"My view is that ... there is really no material change in our expectations for the economy" since he last testified before Congress in mid-February, Mr. Bernanke added.

"We are looking for moderate growth in the economy going forward," he said, repeating the Fed's assessment in its semiannual monetary report to Congress released earlier this month. Equity markets climbed following Mr. Bernanke's remarks, recouping some of Tuesday's 416-point drop in the Dow Jones Industrial average.

Earlier Wednesday, the government revised down its estimate of fourth quarter gross domestic product growth to 2.2% from 3.5%. Mr. Bernanke said that downward revision "is more consistent with our view of the economy than the original numbers."

Earlier this week, Mr. Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, caused a stir when he told a conference in Hong Kong, "Yes, it is possible we can get a recession in the latter months of 2007." He added, though, that "most forecasters are not making that judgment and indeed are projecting forward into 2008 ... with some slowdown."

Mr. Greenspan's remarks, coupled with a 7.8% slump in durable goods orders and the steep global equity sell-off Tuesday reignited concerns over the U.S. economy and boosted investor odds that Mr. Bernanke and the Fed will cut rates by midyear.

See Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's opening speech2 before the House Budget Committee. (16:02)

Yet in contrast to Mr. Greenspan's remarks about the possibility of recession or slowdown in the latter months of the year, Mr. Bernanke said "there is a reasonable chance we will see some strengthening in the economy by the middle of the year," especially if housing and inventories stabilize.

The Fed has kept the federal funds rate unchanged at 5.25% since last summer, a stretch covering five Federal Open Market Committee meetings. Mr. Bernanke said Wednesday that there don't appear to be any liquidity problems in financial markets and real interest rates remain fairly low globally.

Mr. Bernanke also said the Fed is closely monitoring the subprime mortgage market, where delinquencies have risen, and while trends in that sector are a concern, there doesn't appear to be any spillover to broader financial markets.

"We are concerned about the subprime mortgage sector, there has been some bad underwriting. We have attempted to provide some guidance to lenders about proper procedures for underwriting," he said.

However, "our assessment is that there's not much indication that subprime issues have spread into the broader mortgage market," and there's little evidence that overall housing demand has been affected, Mr. Bernanke added.

Asked whether traditional economic gauges like the Phillips Curve and noninflationary rate of unemployment, or NAIRU -- which suggest a tradeoff between economic growth, joblessness and inflation -- still apply, Mr. Bernanke said "it is true that the critical evidence suggests the link is looser" between unemployment and inflation than in past decades. (See related article5.)

He also said it is difficult to pinpoint what the NAIRU rate is at any given time. The U.S. jobless rate currently sits at 4.6%, which is quite low by historical standards and below many economists' NAIRU estimates. "My own view is that we should take a very eclectic approach" in assessing the economy, Mr. Bernanke said, including whether overall demand appears to be exceeding supply.

In his prepared remarks, Mr. Bernanke said that while the U.S. budget deficit may "stabilize or moderate further" in the next few years, the long-term picture is worrisome due to steeply climbing entitlement obligations. "Unfortunately, we are experiencing what seems likely to be the calm before the storm," Mr. Bernanke said. "In particular, spending on entitlement programs will begin to climb quickly during the next decade." (Read the prepared testimony6)

Mr. Bernanke's comments mirrored those he made last month to the Senate Budget Committee, when he said that unless "early and meaningful" action is taken on entitlement programs like Social Security and Medicare, "the U.S. economy could be seriously weakened, with future generations bearing much of the cost."

From The Fed Chairman, Red Flags And Brown Socks (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke could not have sounded the alarm any clearer if he had carried a bullhorn and a gong. "This expansion of debt would spark a fiscal crisis. . . . The U.S. economy could be seriously weakened. . . . This is sort of like a snowball rolling down the hill. . . . This can really get out of control."

Before Bernanke began his testimony to the House Budget Committee yesterday, the Dow Jones Industrials stood at 12,200. In the half-hour it took him to issue those dire warnings, the index climbed 150 points.

Investors, of course, weren't reacting to Bernanke's wailing and gnashing of teeth about a looming fiscal crisis; the projected collapse of Medicare and Social Security is still a few years away. After Tuesday's worldwide stock sell-off, the markets -- and the lawmakers -- wanted Bernanke's short-term forecasts for the economy, which were mostly sunny.

Chairman John Spratt (D-S.C.) fretted about the "severe disruption in the stock markets." The ranking Republican, Paul Ryan (Wis.), also wanted to hear about the "precipitous drop."

Bernanke, who said nothing about the stock market in his opening testimony, obliged. "There is really no material change in our expectations for the U.S. economy," he assured the lawmakers. "We are looking for moderate growth in the U.S. economy going forward."

The hearing had been billed as a discussion about "Fiscal Challenges and the Economy in the Long Term." But then came Tuesday's stock swoon -- caused in part by Bernanke's famous predecessor at the Fed, Alan Greenspan, who said on Monday that he saw signs of recession coming late this year. That forced Bernanke into the role of market soother.

"Do you believe or agree that there is a liquidity problem in the world today?" Ryan asked him.

"No, I don't think so," Bernanke answered.

"We don't see it as being a broad financial concern."

The wires rushed out bulletins:

"Fed Economic View Unfazed by Stocks Drop"

"Wall St Rebounds as Bernanke Calms Nerves"

The requisite calming accomplished, Bernanke relaxed, stretching out his legs under the witness table.

Showmanship is not something that comes naturally to the white-bearded academic. He testified yesterday with a large band-aid on the tip of his index finger, and his suit jacket was bunched up around his neck like a life vest, causing one sleeve to hike up on his forearm. Though his suit was gray and his shoes were black, his socks were brown (President Bush once ridiculed him for wearing tan hosiery).

Bernanke had come not to prop up markets but to scold lawmakers about the need to do head off the coming fiscal crisis. Lawmakers, however, reacted like addicts, either denying their problem or promising to give up the spending habit another day.

"I beg to disagree," said Rep. Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio). While Bernanke may believe "we've got too many people getting older," Kaptur informed him that "what's happening is that capital investors have figured out how to make egregious profit by outsourcing."

Rep. Lloyd Doggett (D-Tex.), likewise, quarreled with the view that "all we need to be concerned about is that Grandma's Social Security check is too big."

Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) identified the problem: Medicare's electric wheelchairs. "Going back a long way, I think 1965," he said, "I could have bought absolutely the best car on the lot for $4,000. And today we have a system that's spending that much or more for medical devices, motorized wheelchairs or whatever."

Other lawmakers struggled to wrap their arms around the crisis Bernanke was describing. "We're just, kind of, whistling past the graveyard?" asked Rep. Marion Berry (D-Ark).

"Yes, sir," said the chairman.

"And hoping that the tooth fairy comes and bails us out of this deal?"

DOJ_NMG_0138636

"I don't know about the metaphors there, Mr. Congressman," Bernanke replied.

Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Tex.) had a different metaphor to run by the chairman. He asked if "we are debating how to mop up six inches of water in the stateroom of the captain of the Titanic when we should be focused upon the gaping hole in the hull of the ship."

"The heart of the problem are the entitlement programs," Bernanke affirmed.

Rep. Darlene Hooley (D-Ore.) had an idea. "If you were in a class of fifthgraders, how would you explain to them the consequences of our national debt and deficit?" she asked.

"I would say that our economy needs machines and new factories and new buildings and so on in order for us to have a strong and growing economy," he answered patiently. "If the government doesn't cover all its expenses, it has to take out the money that would otherwise be used to build those."

Bernanke reflected. "That probably wouldn't work for a fifth-grader," he said. Nor, apparently, for members of Congress.

Calm Returns To Market, But Worries Persist Over Subprime Loans (NYT)

By Jenny Anderson And Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

Calm returned to Wall Street yesterday.

Encouraged by comments from Ben S. Bernanke, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, and a bounce-back in the Chinese markets where Tuesday's global sell-off began, stocks rose modestly in the United States.

The Dow Jones industrial average, which tumbled as much 545 points on Tuesday, closed yesterday up 52.39 points, or 0.4 percent. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index closed up 0.56 percent, and the Nasdaq, 0.34 percent. Asian and European markets ended the day lower, but the Shanghai market climbed 3.9 percent. Shanghai opened slightly lower today. [C4]

Yet one important concern — that Wall Street's bet on home loans to people with weak, or subprime, credit is souring quickly as defaults rise and home prices weaken — has not gone away.

Wall Street executives and analysts acknowledged that the subprime segment of the mortgage business has faltered because of the performance of loans issued in 2006, but many contend that the problems are well contained and do not yet pose a significant threat to investment banks or the broader global financial system.

Cracks have become more visible lately, however. Insurance premiums on the potential default of Wall Street bonds have risen sharply, indicating possible concern among bond traders about potential exposure.

"It is impossible to get a number" on big investment bank's exposure to subprime loans, said Richard X. Bove, an analyst with Punk Ziegel & Company. "And I don't think they even know."

The cost of insurance against potential bond default on Bear Stearns's debt, for example, increased 40 percent recently, from about 22 basis points in mid-January to more than 31 on Tuesday, according to Lehman Brothers data.

Insurance costs for major firms with exposure to the subprime market, like Lehman Brothers, Morgan Stanley, Goldman Sachs and Merrill Lynch increased similarly. Brad Hintz, an analyst with Sanford Bernstein, said investors are increasingly concerned about Wall Street's exposure to that market.

Investors, while heartened yesterday by Mr. Bernanke's prediction of moderate economic growth, have had a revolving list of concerns: a slowing economy, oil prices and accelerating inflation. But now a major concern is whether the problems of subprime lending will spill over into the broader mortgage market, which at $6.5 trillion at the end of 2006 is the biggest bond market.

During the housing boom, Wall Street developed a series of profitable connections to the subprime market that included providing financing to companies that made loans to homeowners, buying finished mortgages, packaging them into bonds and then trading them. Last year, the subprime business generated $600 billion in loans, about 20 percent of all mortgages written, according to Inside Mortgage Finance. While down slightly from 2005, that is up from $120 billion in 2001.

Wall Street now faces risks on two fronts. First, it stands to earn less from originating, packaging and trading mortgage-backed securities. Second, it will have to absorb more of the losses from loans when borrowers are no longer making payments.

In the past, it could demand that mortgage companies buy back defaulted loans, but such large "put back" requests have driven many lenders out of business, and big investment banks are making many more loans through subsidiaries they own. As a result, the banks retain more of the risk in the form of "residual" interest in the loans they bundle into negotiable securities, a process known as securitization.

"The brokerage firms have done something curious: they are not abandoning subprime mortgage origination; they are taking positions," Mr. Hintz said.

In December, Merrill Lynch completed a $1.3 billion acquisition of First Franklin, which was among the 10 biggest subprime lenders last year, and Morgan Stanley bought Saxon Capital for $706 million.

DOJ_NMG_0138637

Bank executives say they anticipated the problems in subprime and they have been buying lenders because they want to better control lending standards in the industry.

"Saxon was a long-term strategic decision," said Anthony Tufariello, who heads the securitized product group at Morgan Stanley. "And we are happy we made that decision because we bought it as a servicing platform with the expectation that the market would undergo dislocation."

And the deal-making continues. Citigroup said that it would provide working capital and a credit line to ACC Capital Holdings, which owns Ameriquest and Argent Mortgage. Although the terms were not disclosed, it includes an option for Citigroup to acquire Argent, which lends through mortgage brokers.

By some estimates, the potential risks to the big banks are relatively modest. Mr. Hintz, of Sanford Bernstein, calculates that Lehman Brothers had $7.3 billion in residual risks at the end of 2006, $2 billion of it in noninvestment grade mortgages. If the noninvestment grade residuals decline by 20 percent, Lehman's earnings would decline 3.2 percent after taking into account compensation costs and taxes; Bear Stearns's income would fall about 4.1 percent.

Not all analysts are as sanguine.

Guy Moszkowski, an analyst with Merrill Lynch, downgraded Goldman Sachs, Bear Stearns and Lehman based on the erosion of risk appetite among its customers and because he believes the problems of subprime lending are spreading to "Alt-A" mortgages, which fall between subprime and prime and accounted for about 13 percent of loans written last year.

Investment banks entered the subprime market because the loans generated high yields, making them popular among pension funds, insurance companies, hedge funds and foreign investors. On the other side of the food chain, small mortgage companies and brokers stood ready to feed Wall Street with loans. The banks supplied the cash for the loans, and agreed to buy the loans from them.

The business generated multiple lines of income for Wall Street, including underwriting and trading. By 2005, the residential mortgage-backed securities market was generating 15 percent of fixed income revenues, and the subprime sector was bringing in 3 percent to 4 percent of fixed income revenues, Mr. Hintz said.

Lehman, RBS Greenwich Capital Markets, Morgan Stanley and Merrill Lynch were the biggest underwriters of mortgage-backed securities in 2006, with Lehman controlling 10.7 percent of the market and underwriting $51.8 billion worth of mortgage-backed securities, according to Inside Mortgage Finance.

For some analysts, the bigger risk to Wall Street is simply that the spigot has been turned off.

"Does the flow of mortgages to the securitization machine slow?" asked Jeffrey Harte, an analyst with Sandler O'Neill. "That's what I'm most worried about."

Volume is falling. Production of nonagency mortgage securities fell almost 50 percent between January and February, according to preliminary numbers compiled by Inside Mortgage Finance. The data indicate that new subprime and Alt-A loans fell significantly in February.

But Wall Street seems to believe it will come out on top, surviving where smaller players lacked the resources. "The economics of the business are moving in favor of well-capitalized entities who don't have to go outside" for other services, said Gyan Sinha, who heads asset-backed securities research at Bear Stearns.

One gauge of the subprime business is an index that tracks bonds backed by subprime loans, the ABX.HE. The index for loans issued in 2006 has fallen sharply in two months. Its price is used to calculate the cost of insuring the bonds from losses.

On Tuesday, the cost to insure a low-rated, "BBB-" portion of the bonds jumped to nearly $1,983 for $10,000 of bonds, from $1,641 on Monday and $410 at the end of December, according to the Markit and CDS IndexCo. The index, which was little changed yesterday, tracks the performance of 20 mortgage bonds, or pools, and provides a snapshot of complex market.

Each mortgage pool is broken into a number of tranches, which carry different risks and rewards for investors. Portions rated "AAA," for instance, carry the least risk and provide the smallest return; investors in these pools also get paid off first when borrowers repay their loans. The riskiest portions of the debt, or the residuals, are often held by the mortgage companies that issued the loans or the Wall Street firms that underwrote the bond.

The big banks' optimism is based in large part on the structure of these bonds. For one thing, most bonds collect more in interest payments than they are obligated to pay out. They also include a cash reserve, or residual, that can be dipped into if interest payments fall short because of defaulting borrowers.

"You can have a pretty long period of stress before you start to see actual write-downs," said Anthony V. Thompson, who heads research of asset-backed securities at Deutsche Bank Securities.

Much depends on the strength of these bonds' structure, which is determined largely by agencies like Moody's Investors Service, Standard & Poor's and Fitch Ratings.

DOJ_NMG_0138638

Skeptics say that Wall Street's faith in complexity has proved wrong before, most recently in the meltdown of the manufactured housing, or trailer home, market. The business boomed in the early and mid-1990s before collapsing in the late '90s when many buyers of the homes defaulted.

"These credit corrections are not unexpected," Mr. Thomson said. "What's harder to predict is the precise moment when the market decides to reprice the risk."

The Markets: Dow Recovers A Bit, Investors Learn (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, March 1, 2007

Stocks recovered a bit Wednesday from Tuesday's bloodbath, giving investors hope that the two-day selling panic that rattled global markets finally calmed by the time it reached U.S. shores.

After a tumultuous day complete with a 167-point swing, the Dow Jones industrial average closed 52 points higher, erasing an eighth of Tuesday's 416-point loss.

The Standard & Poor's 500 and Nasdaq composite indexes also bounced back slightly, posting 0.6% and 0.3% gains, respectively.

Giving investors' the biggest dose of relief was the fact that the Chinese stock market, which triggered the whole mess with its 9% plunge Tuesday, bounced back strongly with a 4% gain Wednesday.

Even so, investors now have a brutal reminder that corrections are severe and can come with little warning. Markets in Europe and Asia outside of China were still reeling from the selling, posting losses of 1% to 3%.

Domestic markets weren't unscathed. The S&P 500's 2.2% fall in February broke the market's streak of eight-straight months of gains.

Despite the recovery, the worst one-day point loss since Sept. 11 delivered several lasting lessons to investors, including:

·Chinese stocks don't predict economic activity. Investors look to U.S. stocks as a gauge of economic activity. But doing the same with Chinese stocks is almost laughable, says Donald Straszheim of Roth Capital Partners. Individuals who buy stocks practically for sport dominate the Chinese stock market.

Instead, investors should watch movements of commodity prices and money supply in China, says Edmund Harriss, portfolio manager at Guinness Atkinson. So far, none of those measures show the Chinese economy is slowing, he says.

·Emerging markets are risky. Investors had been piling into emerging markets for years, figuring they're the source of the best returns in a bull market, says Russ Koesterich of Barclays Global Investors.

But they forgot that emerging markets are very risky, says Joseph Quinlan of Bank of America. "That was a tip-off something was going to happen," he says.

·Big U.S. stocks have been ignored. It's time to pick up cheap shares of U.S. large-company stocks that international-crazy investors have ignored, says Robert Maltbie of Millennium Asset Management. Chinese stocks have price-earnings ratios of 18, making them expensive given their risk compared with leading U.S. companies with P-Es of 17 or less, Maltbie says. "If you're overallocated on emerging markets, take a little off the table."

Stocks Recover, But Experts Warn Of Volatility Ahead (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - The U.S. and Chinese stock exchanges returned to a semblance of normalcy Wednesday, but concerns about both economies linger following the worst global sell-off of stocks in more than five years.

Wall Street's rebound Wednesday was quickly dubbed the Bernanke Rally, after Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke. His relaxed, almost professorial, testimony before the House Budget Committee calmed jittery markets.

Bernanke told lawmakers that he expects a mid-year return to solid economic growth, despite new data showing that the U.S. economy has entered slow-growth mode. The Commerce Department on Wednesday revised economic growth for the fourth quarter of 2006 to a 2.2 percent annual rate, much slower than the 3.5 percent rate initially estimated last month.

"My view is, taking all the new data into account, there is really no material change in our expectations for the U.S. economy," Bernanke said. He painted a largely positive economic picture, including an expected rebound in housing.

That sparked a morning rally on Wall Street before investors backed off later Wednesday, as the Dow Jones industrial average closed up 52.07 points, or 0.43 percent. The tech-heavy Nasdaq and S&P 500 also finished the day up, but none gained significant ground after the markets' worst single day since trading after the 9/11 terrorist attacks resumed on Sept. 17, 2001.

U.S. investor sentiment was aided by a rebound in China's Shanghai Composite Index. On Wednesday it clawed back nearly half of its 8.8 percent drop of a day earlier.

However, one day doesn't a trend make on Wall Street

"Even when the earthquake is over, you see some aftershocks. So I think we can expect some volatility for a while now," said David A. Wyss, chief economist for the rating agency Standard & Poors. "We're coming off of a period of exceptionally low volatility, so you shouldn't be shocked. It had only one way to go."

Bernanke brought a temporary reprieve, telling lawmakers that financial markets "seem to be working well." He added that the fundamentals of the U.S. economy remain strong and that he expected a pickup in growth by midyear.

The Fed chairman acknowledged but didn't fret over a rise in defaults on risky sub-prime adjustable-rate mortgages and January's nearly 8 percent drop in the purchase of business equipment by major manufacturers and industries.

"We believe that if the housing sector begins to stabilize, and if some of the inventory corrections that are still going on in manufacturing begin to be completed, that there is a reasonable possibility that we'll see some strengthening in the economy sometime during the middle of the year," Bernanke said.

That positive view stood in sharp contrast to that of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, whose Monday comments that a recession could loom late this year or early next contributed to Tuesday's global stock-market slide.

Adding to the uncertainty, the Commerce Department reported Wednesday a 16.6 percent drop in new-home sales for January, compared with December. That was the worst single-month showing in about 13 years. But that sour news was partially offset by a National Association of Realtors report Tuesday showing an unexpectedly strong 3 percent jump in existing home sales for the same month.

"What triggered the drop in equity prices had little to do with economic fundamentals and more to do with what happens when investors get complacent about financial risk," independent analyst Bernard Baumohl wrote in a note to investors.

By early February, he said, analysts had begun noting that the Dow hadn't seen a correction of 2 percent or greater since May 2003, the longest such streak in half a century. That made investors nervous. Many were on hair-trigger alerts to pull money out of stocks at the first sign of bad news in order to take profits.

"We'd been expecting a correction in the market. But when it happens it's obviously a surprise," added Wyss of Standard & Poors.

So what did the stock slide signal about the U.S. economy?

"Frankly, not much," insisted Baumohl. "The economy itself is sound and growing, and we still believe the chance of a recession this year is no higher than 20 percent."

But the economy clearly isn't growing as fast as first thought, and that ushers in market volatility.

Financial markets welcomed the fourth-quarter GDP revision as evidence that the slowing economy would likely reduce inflation so the Fed won't have to raise interest rates again to do so.

Bernanke also sought to ease fears of rising foreclosures on homes sold to riskier borrowers.

"We've seen the increasing rates of default, we've seen the financial distress on the part of lenders and this is a concern," he said. "Our assessment though ... is that there is not much indication at this point that the sub-prime mortgage issues have spread into the broader mortgage market, which still seems to be healthy, and the lending side still seems to be healthy. It's a concern, but at this point we don't see it as a broad financial concern."

While U.S. and Chinese exchanges rebounded Wednesday, emerging markets didn't, particularly in Asia. Exchanges in Australia, Japan, Hong Kong and South Korea all closed down Wednesday in a range of 2 percent to 3 percent. Smaller economies such as the Philippines and Malaysia closed down nearly 8 percent and 7 percent, respectively. And India, an important emerging economy that's helped drive global growth, saw its exchange close down 4 percent.

Investors Tiptoe Back To Markets (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

Investors crept cautiously back into the stock market, but the mild recovery didn't calm the market's jitters or come close to recovering Tuesday's 416-point plunge in the Dow Jones Industrial Average.

Following reassuring remarks by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke in testimony to Congress, investors nibbled cautiously. They sought out larger, safer-seeming stocks such as those that populate the 30-stock Dow industrials.

DOJ_NMG_0138640

The Dow finished the day ahead 52.39 points, or 0.43%, at 12268.63, still more than 500 points down from the record 12786.64 hit last week.

Procter & Gamble and Walt Disney both gained more than 3%, and American Express, Merck and Verizon rose more than 2%.

The industrials are down 1.6% since the year began. They fell 2.8% in February -- the first monthly decline in eight months and the Dow's biggest monthly decline in almost two years.

In Asia, where this week's market rout began with a tumble in Shanghai, Japan's Nikkei Stock Average fell nearly 3% yesterday, and in Hong Kong, the Hang Seng slid 2.5%. The Shanghai Composite Index rebounded 3.9%. In Europe, London's FTSE 100 slipped 1.8%, the Frankfurt Xetra DAX fell 1.5% and the CAC-40 in Paris was down 1.3%.

Analysts and traders in the U.S. spent the day debating whether the modest recovery was the first, cautious step in a rebuilding process, or a temporary, technical recovery that presages more declines.

"We expected a little bit of a recovery. The bulls would have liked to see a little bit more," said stock trader Larry Peruzzi at Boston CompanyAsset Management.

It is a truism on Wall Street that stocks never go straight up or straight down. Regardless of whether the market is headed for another record or for more pain, the short-term outlook is likely to feature more up-and-down swings as traders "test" the market's limits.

Some nervous investors are booking profits by selling winners that they think could suffer in the coming weeks. Others, with more confidence, are buying some of those same stocks on the grounds that the economy, corporate profits and interest rates all are just fine, believing that Tuesday's decline was overdone.

Until it becomes clearer which side is in the driver's seat, the swings could be sharp.

Typically, a bull market doesn't end quite as abruptly as this, said Phil Roth, chief technical market analyst at New York brokerage firm Miller Tabak. Mr. Roth himself is in the bearish camp, viewing recent market moves as a "topping" process that will lead to a longer-running decline. But he doesn't see the decline happening just yet.

Before Tuesday's collapse, he notes, just about every major index had been at or near a long-term high. The Dow industrials, transports and utilities all had recently hit records, as had indexes of small stocks and middle-sized stocks. Stocks don't typically just collapse after showing that kind of broad strength. Instead, they bounce up and down. He expects to see them bounce back up before the bull market ends.

"We may not have seen the final high for some of the averages," Mr. Roth said, although "we may have seen the final high for lots of individual stocks."

Several analysts including Mr. Roth pointed out that a 3.3% decline, such as the Dow industrials recorded Tuesday, isn't as rare an event as it might seem. It hadn't happened to the Dow in nearly four years, but since 1926 it has happened 131 times -- an average of more than once a year, according to research by quantitative analyst Marc Reinganum of OppenheimerFunds.

It is perfectly normal for an index like the Dow occasionally to fall 4% over a five-day period, even during a bull market, as it has just done, added Tim Hayes, chief investment strategist at Ned Davis Research, in a report to clients.

"The bottom line is that it would be premature to conclude that a bear market has started," Mr. Hayes wrote.

Mr. Bernanke's comments to Congress yesterday helped soothe investors' jitters. In previously scheduled testimony to the House Budget Committee, the Fed chief said financial markets "seem to be working well." He reiterated his view that the economy could pick up steam later this year, and said he saw no reason for China or Japan to "dump" U.S. Treasury bonds. Stocks, which had been down before he began speaking, rose as he delivered his testimony.

Given that Mr. Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, had helped roil markets with a remark early this week about the possibility of a recession, Mr. Bernanke's remarks were seen as reassuring.

At the same time, there were clear signs that the economy is weaker than it appeared just two weeks ago. Government economists revised sharply down their estimate of fourth-quarter economic growth, to 2.2% from 3.5%. A report on manufacturing activity in the Chicago region came in weak, as did the latest home-sales figures. None of that was reassuring.

In addition, oil futures kept climbing, up 33 cents to $61.79 a barrel on the day, and up 6.3% for February.

The prices of Treasury bonds and of gold, both of which had risen sharply on Tuesday as investors fled to their relative safety, pulled back as markets calmed.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.56%, or 7.78 points, to 1406.82. It was down 2.2% for February, and is off almost 1% for 2007.

Outside the U.S., stocks declined in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, fell 2.01%, or 5.04 points, to 246.30.

Stocks advanced1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 3.80 billion shares, as 2,099 stocks rose and 1,245 fell.

DOJ_NMG_0138641

Bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 10/32, or $3.13 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.552%. The 30-year bond was down 20/32 to yield 4.669%.

The dollar strengthened3. Late in New York, it traded at 118.41 yen, up from 117.98, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.3234 from $1.3236.

Market's Fall May Augur A Waning Appetite For Risk (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

This week's plunge in stocks and the prices of risky debt raises the possibility that investors, who had been displaying an unusual appetite for risk, are becoming risk-averse. Such a development could have big consequences for the U.S. and world economies.

In recent years, investors have poured money into risky investments from subprime mortgages and emerging-market debt to Chinese stocks. In the process, they have accepted ever-narrower returns, or "risk premiums." That has helped distressed companies avoid bankruptcy, financed a record leveraged-buyout spree, fueled surging profits on Wall Street, enabled poor countries to finance domestic spending and even made insurance easier for consumers to obtain.

INVESTOR SHIFT?

· The Issue: This week's gyrations in financial markets suggest that investors might be losing their appetite for risk.

· What's at Stake: In recent years, investors' willingness to buy risky stocks, bonds and derivatives has made it easy and cheap for people and companies to borrow money, fueling economic growth.

· The Bottom Line: A sharp pullback from risky investments could have significant knock-on effects for the broader economy.

Recent events, primarily Tuesday's plunge in Chinese stocks and a continuing collapse in the demand for subprime mortgages in the U.S., suggest that could be changing. "If you see a widespread change in investor risk appetites, it does make a big difference for the economy," said Stephen Stanley, chief economist for RBS Greenwich Capital. "It becomes more expensive for businesses and households to get money."

So far, the reversal has been tiny and may prove to be a hiccup. Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke told Congress yesterday: "There is really no material change in our expectations for the U.S. economy." The Dow finished the day ahead 52.39 points. (See related article on page C1.)

Yet some economists see a turning point. "This is a wake-up call," said John Lonski, chief economist at Moody's Investors Service. "Unfortunately, if there is an increase in risk aversion, it's taking place exactly when business-investment spending has been much lower than anticipated."

One of the first places this is showing up is in the market for subprime mortgage loans, those made to less-creditworthy borrowers. As defaults on such loans have risen sharply, investment banks and other financial firms have sharply reduced the creation of new collateralized debt obligations backed by subprime loans. Such CDOs have become a popular way to pool baskets of loans, then redistribute slices with varying degrees of risk and return to a spectrum of investors.

"It affects everyone up the chain," said Greg Miller, a portfolio manager at hedge fund Saye Capital, which is active in the subprime market. "It's certainly harder to get a loan today than it was a month or two months ago for certain borrowers." Still, he said the lenders' pullback is likely to affect only a small slice of homeowners.

Corporate debt may feel the pain, too. As the gap between corporate bonds, including those with junk-rated status, and those of safe Treasury bills has fallen to near-record lows, global issuance of junk-rated bonds rose to $354 billion last year from $145 billion in 2002, according to Dealogic.

Money also has poured into exotic forms of corporate debt such as credit default swaps and collateralized debt obligations. Among other things, that money helped fuel a surge in U.S. leveraged-buyout deals to $418 billion in 2006, more than triple the level of 2005. The total this year is $84 billion, according to data provider Thomson Financial.

Louise Purtle, a strategist at research firm CreditSights, said waning investor risk appetites will make it more difficult for buyout firms and companies of all kinds to borrow money.

"All of the LBO deals, particularly the big deals, have been highly dependent on the excessive level of risk appetite," she said, in particular this week's proposed private-equity takeover of Texas utility TXU Corp. Less appetite for risk could mean constraints in how much new equipment such companies can buy and how many new employees they can hire.

Another ripple could be felt on companies carrying large debt loads or in distress. Such companies have found it easier to obtain new financing in recent years. More recently, the percentage of companies that renege on their debts has held at extremely low levels, despite predictions that it will rise eventually. According to Standard & Poor's, the corporate-default rate stood at only 1.4% at the end of January, below the 25-year average of 4.5%. 1

Many companies, though, have managed to avoid trouble largely because investors have been so willing to make fresh loans. "Investors' willingness to take on risk has allowed a lot of companies to stay afloat that would otherwise not have stayed afloat," said RayKennedy, a high-yield-portfolio manager at Pacific Investment Management Co. in Newport Beach, Calif.

Charter Communications Inc., one of the nation's largest cable companies, managed to get billions of dollars in new financing last year despite that it was losing money and was saddled with massive debts. "That has allowed it to buy itself time while it improves its operations," said Mr. Kennedy. "If that were 2002, they never would have been able to get that financing."

In the fall of 2005, money manager ForstmannLeff was plunged into crisis when its controlling shareholder, Refco Inc. Chief Executive Phillip Bennett, was arrested. Investors began to pull money out of the firm. Investment banker Miller Mathis & Co. talked to other money managers about investing in the company, but they weren't interested, and lenders were offering only short-term financing. Instead, Angelo Gordon & Co., a $10 billion alternative-investment manager specializing in distressed debt, decided to make an equity investment, buying control of the company and preserving its 120 jobs.

When a company is in financial straits, "the conventional sources of capital are not as interested in taking the risks," said Sean Mathis, managing director at Miller Mathis. The willingness of alternative investors to make risky investments has helped keep companies out of bankruptcy protection. "This definitely could change with greater risk aversion, and more defaults will lead to greater aversion."

Other beneficiaries of investors' appetite for risk have been emerging-market countries, which raised $319 billion on global bond markets last year, compared with $122 billion in 2002. NWI Management LP, a hedge fund specializing in emerging-market debt, has seen its assets triple since 2002 to about $5 billion. Chief Executive Hari Hariharan said the shrinking risk premiums are "well deserved." Yields on Brazilian three-year local-currency bonds, for instance, have fallen to 12% from 19% in the past few years because the central bank has reduced inflation to 4% from 5%.

Still, Raghuram Rajan, former chief International Monetary Fund economist, said many countries had begun to loosen their budgets thanks to the ease of borrowing from abroad. A rise in investor risk aversion could force a return to austerity. "The question," he said, "is at what pace will it force change?"

Many economists argue the recent decline in risk premiums reflects fundamental changes in the economy. That, they said, should limit the extent of any reversal, limiting the impact on the broad economy. Fluctuations in economic activity have become much less pronounced in the past few decades, one reason corporate defaults have decreased.

There also is the possibility that the decline in risk premiums was self-reinforcing, and so a reversal might be, as well. Before Tuesday, the price volatility of stocks, bonds and even currencies had fallen to unprecedented low levels. The lack of volatility, in turn, drastically reduces sophisticated investors' estimates of how much money they could lose on any given day. As a result, those investors -- largely banks and hedge funds -- often feel comfortable taking on still more risk by using borrowed money.

Markets Recover As Calm Prevails (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse And Kathleen Day

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

NEW YORK, Feb. 28 -- Just like the previous day, the opening of the U.S. markets Wednesday was preceded by disappointing economic news.

The markets did not blink, however, as the federal government reported that the economy was growing at a slower rate, and that sales of new homes plunged more than 16 percent in January, the biggest monthly percentage decline in 13 years.

Investors, analysts said, were instead more focused on Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's congressional testimony and signs of stabilization in global markets, as the benchmark stock indexes in Shanghai and Shenzhen rose about 4 percent after their dramatic 9 percent drop Tuesday.

The Dow Jones industrial average, which fell 3.3 percent Tuesday, regained ground in fits and starts before closing at 12,268.63, up 52.39, or 0.43 percent.

The Nasdaq composite index closed at 2416.15, up 8.29, or 0.34 percent. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index closed at 1406.82, up 7.78, or 0.56 percent.

"So far so good," a trader said, flashing a colleague a smile before dashing off.

Others monitored screens that were no longer flashing bright red as the did the day before, and took a wait-and-see approach as prices fluctuated.

DOJ_NMG_0138643

"It seems to be okay. But things can change any minute," said Doreen Mogavero of the brokerage Mogavero, Lee & Co., who placed orders on a transportation stock for a client who wanted 25,000 shares. "When we open like this, I want to wait to see if they come back a little bit."

Outside, a cluster of traders taking cigarette breaks grumbled about the technological difficulties in making trades quickly. They said that for about a 20-minute span Tuesday, from 3:40 to 4 p.m., the orders they had placed for customers were stuck in a queue.

It was unclear Wednesday whether the delays were related to a technological glitch that caused the Dow to plummet 200 points in a matter of minutes shortly before 3 p.m. Tuesday. The drop was caused when the system that calculates the average recorded a backlog of trades after the process was switched to a backup computer.

Down the street, traders at the American Stock Exchange complained of similar problems, and large brokerage firms also said they had trouble executing trades.

Traders said that generally, when they send buy or sell requests via a handheld device, those orders are reflected almost instantly on trading-floor screens. That was not the case Tuesday.

"We were just sitting on our hands," said a trader who requested anonymity because he was not authorized by his firm to speak to the press. "I kept going back to the specialist, asking, 'Did you get it? Did you get it yet?' But nothing was showing up."

Because they could not see whether their orders had registered, some traders sent the same order twice, which meant they ended up buying or selling twice as many shares than they wanted.

Some of that frustration eased Wednesday after stocks got a noticeable bump before 11 a.m., as TV screens flashed images of Bernanke speaking before Congress. The Dow recovered more than 100 points after Bernanke said the U.S. economy remained stable and he addressed the growth of high-risk mortgage loans known as subprime mortgages, one of the biggest concerns in the market. Troubles in that part of the lending industry, he said, were unlikely to spill over to the larger lending industry.

"There is really no material change in our expectations for the U.S. economy since I last reported to Congress a couple weeks ago," Bernanke said.

Although investors seeking shelter in stable investments bid up the price of Treasury bonds Tuesday, those bonds fell Wednesday as stocks recovered some losses. The yield on the benchmark 10-year treasuries, which falls as prices rise, reversed more than half of Tuesday's declines.

The rally in stocks was led by health care, consumer staples and other defensive stocks that tend to fare better during a market downturn.

"I think that's what's putting a floor underneath the market today," said Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist at Bank of America.

Many analysts said it would take at least several days for the market to settle, and cautioned investors from making hasty decisions.

"There's been some improvement, but I wouldn't expect to have an immediate sense of clarity," said Steven Wieting, an economist with Citigroup.

For now, some money managers said their investment view remained unchanged from the day before the market dropped.

Chad Peterson, spokesman for TIAA-CREF, a financial company that manages more than $400 billion, said that portfolio mangers there were "sticking to existing stock-picking strategies."

M. Steve Yoakum, head of the Public School and Education Employee Retirement System of Missouri, said: "We think it was a technical correction. It won't cause us to change any of our strategies."

Yoakum said he and his staff were in constant contact with the several dozen money managers he parcels out control of the pension fund to, and they agree that "stocks continue to be relatively cheap to bonds" and promise a bigger return long-term.

John Linehan, portfolio manager for the T. Rowe Price Value Fund, said he entered the market late in the day, snapping up $40 million worth of large, blue-chip companies across the board, including some in the health-care, technology and industrial sectors.

"You have a lot of market participants including a few investment professionals who had never lived through something like this," Linehan said. "There were desperate sellers, and we went in and took advantage of that and got some good prices."

Shortly before markets closed Wednesday, Sal Morreale, a trader at Cantor Fitzgerald, said that the technological delays of the previous day seemed to be behind them and that market fears had been quelled, at least temporarily.

"You had a couple of times where you saw some sell pressure," he said. "I thought, 'jeez, now we're really on the tightrope' . . . but it sort of went right back up. It didn't cave. I think today is sort of the day when people take a deep breath."

Day reported from Washington.

NYSE's Trading Overload Draws Attention Of The SEC (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

The New York Stock Exchange's move into the electronic age happened almost overnight. Now the Securities and Exchange Commission is looking into whether it happened too fast and contributed to this week's trading troubles.

Over the past year or so, the Big Board has shifted much of its trading away from its floor and onto an electronic platform, a move that many investors have embraced because it promises faster execution times in a business where time is money. In November, the NYSE announced it would close one of its five trading rooms, citing the potential to cut costs and because electronic trading requires fewer floor traders.

The SEC is examining whether the NYSE's shrinking of the floor affected the NYSE's ability to handle a surge in trading volume such as occurred during Tuesday's market slide, according to a person familiar with the matter. The regulators are concerned that capacity issues may have exacerbated the Big Board's woes this week.

The NYSE doesn't believe floor consolidation played any role in the trading problems this week, and a spokesman said they have not received an inquiry from the SEC related to floor consolidation and this week's trading woes.

The NYSE's system for delivering trades to its so-called hybrid platform -- a combination of electronic and human-based trading -- overloaded and frantic traders couldn't process thousands of orders.

On Tuesday, the market experienced one of the biggest point drops in five years and record volume, with 4.07 billion shares trading in Big Board-listed stocks. Trading problems grew more serious after an error in the calculation in the Dow Jones Industrial Average caused a sudden point drop, which the NYSE says led to a 50% spike in orders.

"It was a mess," says Steve Swanson, head of Automated Trading Desk LLC, a large brokerage firm based in Mount Pleasant, S.C. "There was a lack of information. No one was telling us what was going on. The hybrid is new, and we're seeing record volumes, and it's not holding up well."

The stakes are high for the Big Board's parent, NYSE Group, which became a publicly traded for-profit company last year. The exchange, formerly a not-for-profit membership club, is counting on its new electronic system to boost trading revenue and profit, all while making trading easier for investors. The SEC is talking to a number of firms and exchanges to determine whether other structural problems contributed to the trading issues.

Tuesday's trading problems attracted attention on Capitol Hill yesterday, where two Republicans on the House Financial Services Committee, Rep. Spencer Bachus of Alabama and Rep. Deborah Pryce of Ohio, asked the chief executives of NYSE Group and Dow Jones & Co. -- publisher of The Wall Street Journal and of Dow Jones Industrial Average and other market indexes -- for a "full explanation of what caused the systems failure." (Read the Bachus-Pryce letter1.)

"We are conducting a detailed review of yesterday's events and do not believe the calculation delay nor the subsequent catch up in the calculation in the Dow Jones Industrial Average exacerbated the market decline, as the market was down sharply during the 70-minute period and rebounded strongly soon after the DJIA was brought current," Dow Jones said in a statement. An NYSE spokesman said it was also reviewing the situation. NYSE officials met with Rep. Bachus's staff yesterday and plan to respond to the letter, he added.

So far, investors are cutting the NYSE some slack. NYSE Group fell 6.2%, or $5.56, Tuesday to close at $84.45 in Big Board trading, but rallied yesterday with the broader market to close at $84.90 a share, up 0.5%, or 45 cents.

The NYSE blames the problem on its Designated Order Turnaround, or DOT, system. DOT is an electronic pipeline that routes certain orders to the exchange. NYSE said the system was working better yesterday, with the company's daily market share in NYSE listed trading rising to about 70%, behind increased usage of floor brokers and NYSE's Arca electronic platform. The exchange adjusted the capacity of its pipeline and is working on further improvements.

The NYSE wasn't the only exchange that experienced problems this week. Nasdaq Stock Market and others had problems keeping up with the flood of orders. Problems elsewhere weren't as severe as those at the Big Board.

Sam Lek, chief executive of Lek Securities, spent much of yesterday fielding calls from frustrated investors trying to sort garbled trades that got caught in Tuesday's market crunch. One investor sold 10,000 shares of a stock at a price that was 90 cents below the best bid available when he placed the order Tuesday, effectively shortchanging the investor $9,000.

On Tuesday, things got worse after the Dow suddenly dropped at about 3 p.m., when the delay in calculating the average was fixed -- and the index reflected the big drop that occurred during the previous hour or so.

"Within a nanosecond, people were flying blind," said Andy Brooks, head of equity trading at T. Rowe Price Group in Baltimore. "We were all asking each other, 'What just happened? Does anybody have any ideas of what could have happened?' " With no communication from the New York Stock Exchange, he says, "we scrambled to figure out what was causing this."

DOJ_NMG_0138645

He says it didn't help matters that the Nasdaq also was having some reporting problems. Trades, he said, were appearing out of sequence, making it harder to make decisions. A Nasdaq official said the market saw some slowness, with delays of seconds in reporting some trades in NYSE-listed stocks.

Commerce Department Says U.S. Economy Is Weaker Than Expected (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

Analysts have been stumped by the apparent resilience of the American economy, which seemed to be bounding ahead at a 3.5 percent pace in the final quarter of last year even as the housing market fell and the Federal Reserve raised interest rates.

The paradox has been solved: the economy was not bounding. The Commerce Department reported yesterday that economic growth inched ahead by 2.2 percent in the fourth quarter of last year, only slightly faster than the 2 percent growth recorded in the third quarter and substantially below the economy's long-term trend rate of growth

The downward revision, by 1.3 percentage points, in the preliminary estimate of gross domestic product was almost three times the average adjustment since the early 1980s, which is 0.5 percentage point.

Coupled with a 17 percent decline in new-home sales in January and a 7.8 percent drop last month in orders of durable goods like computers and washing machines, the new data indicated the economy was much weaker than it seemed.

"I think we are going to discover that the economy is softer than the Fed thinks," said Robert Barbera, chief economist at ITG Hoenig.

In Congressional testimony, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, Ben S. Bernanke, offered a sanguine view. He said the revised numbers were "more consistent with our view of the economy" than the prior estimates. He said the Fed expected "moderate growth" going forward, which could pick up by midyear if housing managed to break its fall.

But concerns over the prospects of a slowing economy were heightened by the steep declines in equity markets around the globe on Tuesday, which came after a near 9 percent drop in the Shanghai market. Investors were also given the jitters by comments made to a business conference in Hong Kong on Monday by the former Fed chairman, Alan Greenspan. Mr. Greenspan warned that the American economy could be in recession by the end of the year.

Not many economists agree that a recession is in sight. Still, the slowing economy, economists say, should eventually take its toll on jobs. "It virtually guarantees labor market deterioration in the form of a higher unemployment rate," said Jan Hatzius, chief United States economist at Goldman Sachs.

While the statement of the Fed's interest-rate-setting committee in January expressed more concern about inflation than about growth, warning "inflation risks remain," economists say evidence of slower growth is likely to refocus the Fed's attention. "They are going to discover in the next 90 days that they are leaning the wrong way," Mr. Barbera added.

Not all of the economic news was bad. Inflation appeared tamer in the revised G.D.P. report than earlier estimates indicated. The price index for consumer goods excluding food and energy, the inflation gauge most favored by the Fed, rose at an annual rate of only 1.9 percent in the last three months of 2006, less than the 2.1 percent originally reported.

Moreover, about half of the revision to gross domestic product was because of lower inventory accumulation than the government had previously estimated. This means that companies have lower stocks of unsold goods in their warehouses, which would force them to increase production quicker to respond to consumer demand.

Also, the consumer confidence index of the Conference Board reached a five-year high in January.

But there are more signs of economic weakness. Trade, which had been thought to add 1.64 percentage points to growth in the quarter, added only 1.5 percentage points, according to the revised data.

The growth in consumer spending in the fourth quarter of last year was brought down a notch in the revised report, to 4.2 percent from 4.4 percent. And much of this growth was merely because of a fall in prices. In nominal dollars, consumer spending slowed markedly.

Housing, it seems, still has a way to fall. The Commerce Department reported that builders faced a growing glut of unsold homes in January as the pace of new-home sales slowed 16.6 percent — the most in 13 years.

The seasonally adjusted annual sales rate fell to 937,000 last month from 1.1 million in December. Compared with a year earlier, January's rate was down 20.1 percent. Since the housing market hit its peak in the summer of 2005, new-home sales have fallen by nearly a third.

But perhaps the more troubling adjustment in the G.D.P. report was to investment by businesses. Capital investment growth had been one of the sunnier components of economic activity in the second half of last year, picking up some slack from the collapse in residential construction — which declined 19 percent in the final quarter of last year.

Yet according to the revised figures, nonresidential investment in things like factories and computers declined by 2.4 percent in the fourth quarter, much more than the original estimate of a 0.4 percent decline.

"Corporations have become a little more risk averse," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight in Lexington, Mass. The economic outlook could deteriorate further if Tuesday's financial turbulence intensifies. Yesterday, American equity markets recovered some of their Tuesday loss. But many markets in Asia and Europe fell for a second consecutive day. And there are weak points in the American financial system — mortgage-backed bonds, for instance.

Yet, barring a financial disaster, many economists say they believe that a recession will be averted. This is contingent on proper action by the Fed. "There is substantial downward pressure on growth," Mr. Hatzius said. "But with little to worry about inflation pressures, there is no reason that monetary policy couldn't provide enough support to stabilize things."

Fourth-quarter GDP Revised Down To 2.2% Annual Rate (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — The economy grew at a much slower pace in the fourth quarter than originally thought while inflation eased, the government said Wednesday, in a report that showed the economy was somewhat soft heading into 2007.

Gross Domestic Product, the broadest measure of U.S. economic activity, rose 2.2% at a seasonally adjusted annual rate in the October-December period. That was up slightly from 2% in the third quarter, but down from the initial estimate of a 3.5% gain, the Commerce Department said.

AUDIO: Bernanke sees "moderate growth."

The revision stemmed from new data that showed slower spending on the part of businesses, higher imports and slightly weaker consumer spending.

"Business hesitancy will likely keep growth slow in the first quarter as well," Wachovia financial economist Gina Martin said in a note to clients. But business spending will likely pick up later in the year as firms build inventories, she said.

With the latest revision, GDP rose 3.3% in 2006, up from 3.2% in 2005 but lower than the 3.9% in 2004.

"This would then mark the fourth quarter in a row of below-potential growth, and at this point it is only a matter of time before this begins to show through in the labor market," he told clients Wednesday morning.

There was some good news in the government's report. The Federal Reserve's favorite inflation gauge, based on actual spending excluding volatile food and energy costs, was 1.9% in the fourth quarter. That was down from 2.2% in the third quarter and lower than the initial estimate of 2.1%.

Fed officials, including chairman Ben Bernanke, have said they would like to see inflation below 2%.

"Inflation is receding," Moody's Economy.com economist Augustine Faucher says. "The moderation in energy prices and below-potential growth in the first half of this year should keep inflationary pressures in check."

Although the government said Americans spent a bit less than initially thought, consumers continued to pull the economy in the fourth quarter. Consumer spending, which accounts for 70% of U.S. economic activity, rose 4.2% at the end of 2006, up from a 2.8% gain in the third quarter and the biggest increase since the first quarter.

Housing investment fell.

With spending strong, the U.S. personal saving rate remained in negative territory at the end of 2006. The personal saving rate was -1.2% in the fourth quarter, a bit better than the -1.4% seen in the second and third quarters, according to the Commerce Department.

The department's figure, however, does not include a number of popular saving vehicles, such as 401(k)s and stocks.

Economy Slowed, Not Stalled (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, March 1, 2007

NEW YORK

The US economy is entering spring with less wind at its back than it has had for the past four years.

Although the slowdown is still not a big concern of most economists, they warn that an economy that is moving more like a tortoise than a hare is at greater risk of being overrun by some outside event – perhaps one that causes a recession or a period of very slow growth.

But a sustainable slow-growth economy does have a bright side: Inflationary pressure is likely to ease, keeping the Federal Reserve from raising interest rates for borrowers.

One sign of economic slowdown came Wednesday when the government revised downward – from 3.5 percent to 2.2 percent – its estimate for the fourth-quarter gross domestic product (GDP). The new number marks the largest revision in quarterly GDP in at least 15 years. That news followed a tumultuous Tuesday, when the Dow Jones Industrial Average plunged 416.02 points, one of its most volatile moves in years. As of midday Wednesday, the market seemed to have stabilized.

Most economic forecasters say the market's acrobatic moves aren't the kind of exogenous event that would trigger a downturn in the economy. Wednesday, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke, appearing before Congress, said there is "no material change" in the outlook from the last time he testified two weeks ago. The downward revision in the GDP, he added, was consistent with the central bank's outlook for "moderate growth." If the economy can work through its current problems, especially in the housing market, it could strengthen later this year, said Mr. Bernanke.

Wednesday, however, the housing sector received another shot of bad news. Sales of new homes fell 16.6 percent in January over the same time last year, the steepest percentage drop in more than a decade, the US Commerce Department reported. The number of unsold new homes continued to rise, and the median price fell 2.1 percent as developers dropped prices to attract buyers.

Durable goods droop

Housing is not the only sector that's bogged down. Orders of durable goods fell 7.8 percent in January after rising 3.6 percent in December, the Commerce Department reported Tuesday. Durable goods are big-ticket items such as airplanes and construction equipment.

"It's a mystery, in a way. The fundamentals should be positive for capital expenditures. It should be booming," says Dan Meckstroth, chief economist for Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI in Arlington. Va. "Corporate profits are at an all-time high. Companies have so much cash they are buying back their shares because they say they can't find a better use of their money in their own business, and factories are running at a relatively high rate."

The negative economic reports come on the heels of some recession warnings. Former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan, speaking Monday in Hong Kong, noted that corporate profit margins were starting to shrink – a possible sign of the end of a business cycle. As the business cycle ends, he cautioned, the US economy could be moving closer to a recession, perhaps by year's end.

A recession by year's end or early in 2008 is a scenario that makes sense to Hugh Moore of Guerite Advisors in Greenville, S.C. He has been bearish on the economy and the stock market for some time, saying the determining factor will be the "popping asset bubble" in the real estate market. "It will take away a lot of the impetus for consumer spending," says Mr. Moore.

Only a 'soft spot' in business cycle?

Other Wall Street advisers, however, are more sanguine. Jeff Kleintop, chief investment strategist at PNC Wealth Management in Philadelphia, notes that Mr. Greenspan had also predicted a downturn in 1995. "We had another five years of economic expansion," says Mr. Kleintop.

Kleintop, who has been bullish on the markets and the economy, sees several years of life left to the current business cycle. "We are at the midpoint of the expansion," he asserts. "We are just having a soft spot."

Despite the downturn in housing and durable goods, some other sectors – such as information technology, telecommunications, and nonresidential construction – continue to perform well, says Richard DeKaser, chief economist at National City Corp. in Cleveland.

"Whenever you get this kind of moderate growth, you end up with a mixed bag, with some sectors performing well and others poorly," he says.

One thing on which many economists agree is that Tuesday's stock-market slide came at a time of investor complacency. That complacency was shaken when the Chinese stock markets plunged 9 percent amid rumors that Chinese authorities were planning to crack down on speculation in their markets. Some commentators termed it "the Shanghai surprise." Wednesday, the Chinese markets recouped about half their losses.

However, the selling in China spread quickly on Tuesday to the European markets and then to the United States. The Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 3.47 percent. In an indication of how stable the markets have been recently, it was the first time since May 2003 that the index had fallen by more than 2 percent in one day.

"We can expect in the next week or two [that] the markets will be jittery or unstable, as investors come to terms with what happened," says Bob Brusca of Fact and Opinion Economics in New York. But, he adds, "the Shanghai market is not a bellwether for the rest of the world."

Market volatility can be a good thing, says Axel Merk of Merk Investments in Palo Alto, Calif. "People are just too confident," he says. "With greater volatility they will have to pare down their bets."

Outlook For Growth Hinges On Inventories, Investment (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0138648

By Christopher Conkey And Timothy Aeppel

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

The U.S. economy was considerably weaker than previously thought in the fourth quarter of 2006, and its growth may remain moderate until the manufacturing sector solves its inventory problems and businesses step up their capital spending.

Gross domestic product, or the value of goods and services produced, expanded at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of 2.2% in the fourth quarter, the Commerce Department said, well short of its initial estimate of 3.5%. It was the third consecutive quarter the economy has expanded at less than its optimal noninflationary rate of around 3%. The performance capped the slowest three-quarter stretch of economic growth in nearly four years.

Behind the unusually large downward revision to fourth-quarter growth was an overhang of unsold goods, which caused many manufacturers to slash their production, trimming inventory faster than the government had expected. The inventory problem has been particularly acute for the home-building and auto industries. Reduced home and auto construction shaved a combined 2.4 percentage points from GDP growth in the fourth quarter, the Commerce Department said.

But the GDP report also showed why the economy has been resilient despite the manufacturing crunch. Consumer spending and government outlays surged during the quarter, and rising exports also contributed to growth. Meanwhile, inflationary pressures receded somewhat late last year.

Testifying on Capitol Hill yesterday, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said the "downward revision to the fourth-quarter GDP number was more consistent with our overall view of the economy than" the prior estimate. Mr. Bernanke said recent events, such as Tuesday's stock-market selloff and weaker readings on durable-goods orders and home building in January, haven't altered his view that the economy is poised for a modest expansion this year. "We are looking for moderate growth in the U.S. economy going forward," he said.

In the near term, the outlook for economic growth hinges partly on the ailing manufacturing sector, which is struggling under the impact of inventory reductions, the slumping housing market and the strength of equipment buying by businesses, which has been sluggish lately. Most economists still expect the manufacturing sector to show growth for the year, but there are concerns that the slump at the nation's factories could be deeper and more prolonged than expected, and that it might even be a warning sign of recession.

"Manufacturing stopped growing in September and has been on a moderate downtrend since then," said Daniel Meckstroth, an economist at the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI, a public policy and research group in Arlington, Va.

David Hensley, an economist at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., says manufacturing production will register a small increase in the current quarter, but not by much. The bigger questions, he says, are why businesses seem so hesitant to invest in capital equipment -- and will that hesitancy extend to cutbacks in hiring? If it does, the factory sector could exert a stronger-than-expected drag on the economy.

Parker Hannifin Corp., which makes motion and control equipment used in everything from aircraft to amusement-park rides, illustrates why capital spending growth is decelerating at many companies. The Cleveland company's performance is often viewed as an indicator of the broader industrial economy.

In the past, Parker Hannifin typically spent 4.5% to 5.5% of sales on new plants and machinery. Like many companies, however, it has slashed spending through efficiency moves, such as buying smaller, more flexible machines and eliminating inventories, which has freed up factory space. The company now spends about 2% to 2.5% of sales on capital expenditures and doesn't anticipate returning to the higher levels of the past, says Chief Executive Donald Washkewicz.

Business Caution Slows US Growth (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

The US economy expanded at a much slower rate than expected last quarter as business caution grew and fresh weakness emerged in the housing market.

The economy grew at a rate of 2.2 per cent compared with an initial estimate of 3.5 per cent. Government figures released yesterday showed prices cooled as core inflation slowed from an estimate of 2.1 per cent to 1.9 per cent.

Ben Bernanke, Federal Reserve chairman, said the lower growth figures were in line with expectations as he reiterated a benign outlook.

The central bank is forecasting moderate economic expansion and stabilising prices this year. The risk to that forecast from a slowdown in the housing sector was underlined yesterday by a 17 per cent drop in sales of new homes last month.

Drew Matus, an economist at Lehman Brothers, said: "The figures suggest the eco-nomy is playing out largely as the Fed expected, with a little bit of worrisome weakness in the housing market."

The fall in home sales was the biggest in 13 years and left the backlog of new homes standing empty at an elevated level of 537,000.

Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital, said: "Builders will probably have to continue to work off bloated stocks of finished homes for most of 2007."

The median price of a new home fell 2.1 per cent in January to $239,800 (£122,130) from $244,900 a year earlier.

Shares in construction companies fell but US stocks largely regained their poise after panic selling earlier in the week.

Sharp Falls In Sales Of New US Homes (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

Americans bought far fewer new homes last month, according to government data released on Wednesday that showed sales fell at the fastest rate in 13 years.

Sales of newly built homes fell 17 per cent as the backlog of houses standing empty remained stubbornly high, figures from the Commerce Department showed.

The drop was greater than even the most pessimistic Wall Street economists predicted and sent shares in housebuilders tumbling. Home Depot shares also slipped as the DIY store said it expected anaemic sales and lower profits this year.

The slowdown prolongs uncertainty over the duration and depth of the construction sector slump and underlines the risk to economic growth from the weak housing market.

House prices also eased as the median cost of a new home fell 2.1 per cent from a year ago to $239,800. The pace of sales fell to 937,000 from a rate of 1.1m the previous month, while inventories of unsold homes stood at 537,000. The biggest drop was in the west, where sales fell 37 per cent to an annual rate of 166,000.

Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital, said: “Builders will probably have to continue to work off bloated stocks of finished homes for most of 2007.”

The Federal Reserve views the overhang of unsold homes as cause for concern but remains cautiously optimistic the sector is stabilising and will not derail the economy. The central bank on Wednesday continued to forecast moderate economic expansion this year after fresh figures showed the economy grew at a much slower rate than previously thought last quarter.

Drew Matus, an economist at Lehman Brothers, said: “The figures suggest the eco-nomy is playing out largely as the Fed expected, with a little bit of worrisome weakness in the housing market.”

The economy grew at a rate of 2.2 per cent in the fourth quarter against an estimate of 3.5 per cent. Government figures released on Wednesday also showed prices cooled as core inflation slowed to 1.9 per cent from an estimate of 2.1 per cent.

Peter Kretzmer, an analyst at Bank of America, said Wednesday’s data pointed to growth “well below” trend this quarter.

Drag From Housing Could Persist (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And Mary Ellen Lloyd

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- New-home sales plummeted in January, an indication that turbulence in the housing market will continue weighing on the nation's economic growth and housing-related businesses in the months ahead.

Sales of new homes plunged 16.6% to an annual pace of 937,000 units, the Commerce Department said. That rate was 20% below a year earlier, and the median sales price of $239,800 was down 2.1%.

Monthly readings are volatile and prone to weather-related distortions, but the January decline adds to the uncertainty as to whether demand for housing is stabilizing. Home builders have been lowering prices or beefing up incentives in an effort to jump-start sales, but cancellation rates remain high. That has forced many builders to slash production, which has limited economic growth and damped earnings for building-material and home-furnishing suppliers. Home Depot Inc. warned yesterday1 that 2007 earnings will drop a sharper-than-expected 4% to 9% as it spends $2.2 billion on renovating its retail operations and grapples with a challenging business environment. The outlook is more cautious than that of smaller rival Lowe's Cos., which last week projected same-store sales would be flat to up 2% in 2007.

Lowe's forecast was based on the view that sales of new and existing homes will flatten as 2007 wears on. "I hope they're right about the market," Home Depot Chief Executive Frank Blake said. "I tend to the more cautious side on that."

Longer term, the Atlanta home-improvement chain said its per-share earnings should increase 10% or more annually as the investments in its core business boost productivity. That view assumes the housing and residential construction markets improve late in the second half of 2007 or early 2008.

"While the current home-improvement market remains challenging, the long-term fundamentals of our company are strong, and we believe we can improve our performance and grow at, or faster than, the market beyond 2007," Mr. Blake said.

Economists say the threat of further deterioration in the housing market is the biggest risk to economic growth this year. A recent rise in default rates for subprime mortgages has raised the prospect of a broader credit crunch, and the biggest fear is consumers will curtail their spending if the housing slump becomes prolonged. (See related article on auto sales.2)

On the other hand, a housing market at or near its bottom would pave the way for a resumption of home building this year. In January, though, the slower sales pace raised the inventory. The inventory of unsold new homes on the market rose to the equivalent of a 6.8-month supply, up from a 5.7-month supply in December.

The Prosperity Boom (WSJ)

By Lawrence Kudlow

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

The U.S. stock markets were looking for a correction for some time now and on Tuesday they found it: a 3.5% sell-off across the board. The plunge follows a 20% run-up that began last summer, and some analysts believe it was overdue. Indeed, 3% corrections are normal and healthy. Legendary financier J.P. Morgan knew this a hundred years ago when he told a congressional panel that prices fluctuate. But the trigger for Tuesday's drop undoubtedly came from China.

The Chinese have sent a Shanghai flu across the globe. There is talk in China's government circles of slowing its boom and the "speculative" stock rise that has taken place over the past 18 months. Higher reserve requirements for banks, tighter interest rates, stricter implementation of a capital-gains land tax, and perhaps some form of capital controls are all in the rumor mill. This sounds like root-canal advice from the U.S. Treasury and the IMF, which somehow are dissatisfied with 10% growth and 2% inflation in China. France, Germany, Japan or Latin America should have it so bad.

At home in the U.S., there are still housing-slump worries and concerns about an inventory correction in autos and factories. Former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan this week even predicted a recession, naming the budget deficit as the cause. Huh? The deficit is evaporating as record tax revenues are being generated by a solid economy, itself a function of the low marginal tax rates put in place by President Bush.

A quick tour of the data: Consumer incomes keep rising amidst low unemployment and record job creation. Ditto for business profits -- the mother's milk of the economy and rising stocks. Exports are strong. An inventory correction, which helped knock fourth-quarter GDP down to 2.2% from 3.5%, will pass. As yet there is no evidence that a sub-prime mortgage lending problem is spreading. There is no economy-wide credit crunch. And bond rates are a low 4.5%, adding more value to stocks. The prosperity boom is alive and well.

In fact, using a modest 8% growth estimate for 2007 earnings, and capitalizing that profits forecast with a 4.5% bond yield, shares appear to be anywhere from 15% to 25% undervalued today. Put another way, the 6.7% forward earnings yield of the S&P 500 compares very favorably to a 4.5% Treasury bond or a 5.7% A-rated corporate bond.

The high-tech, productivity-driven U.S. economy is more durable and flexible than its liberal-left critics will ever admit. It is a private-sector free-enterprise economy, not a government-planned one. Innovation is strong and entrepreneurial spirits are high. The four prosperity killers, a paradigm coined by Arthur Laffer many years ago, all look dormant: inflation, taxes and regulatory burdens are low, while free trade keeps expanding.

One of the most underrated aspects of this bull-market economy is the sharp drop in marginal tax rates on capital formation. After the levies on capital gains and dividends were reduced to a scant 15% in 2003, the supply of easy capital surged, holding down real interest rates and expanding internally generated liquidity. This, plus record profits, has been the major source of the new-liquidity generation that has fueled stock markets at home and abroad.

This is good noninflationary liquidity. It is not bad liquidity, such as occurred in the 1970s when the Federal Reserve and other central banks gunned the printing presses and created the excess money expansion that drove inflation and interest rates sky-high.

Although gold prices are a concern today, the bigger bond market is sending a noninflationary signal. Future inflation spreads are predicting price-level increases of only 2%. The Fed is targeting inflation even more than unemployment. The core consumer deflator increased only 1.9% at an annual rate in last year's fourth quarter, while year-on-year inflation is a low 2.2%. We must keep an eye on gold -- which has a long history as an inflation barometer -- but right now the bond message seems closer to the truth. Additionally, consumer survey expectations of future inflation have come down markedly.

As for stocks, we're back to the stalwart supply-side adage: tax something less, get more of it. The low tax cost of capital has helped create a boom in private-equity buyouts and share buybacks, which pay out to investors in cash, thus adding to abundant liquidity that recycles into higher prices for a shrinking supply of stocks.

All that said, there are threats to growth. For starters there is the union attack on business, where "card checks" would substitute for secret ballots. Jack Welch, the former CEO of General Electric, thinks the unions are aiming at Silicon Valley -- America's most innovative high-tech area -- in a misbegotten attempt to turn the clock back to the 1960s and 1970s when competitiveness and entrepreneurship were at a low ebb. Tax threats associated with fixing the alternative minimum tax also are problematic. But the president has pledged to use his veto pen to prevent higher tax rates and will, according to the vice president, veto any card-check legislation (a.k.a. the misnamed Employee Free Choice Act).

Overall, Washington politics have taken a decidedly anti-growth turn ever since the new Democratic Congress went into session. Carbon caps and protectionist trade threats are the new battle cries. But the leftward moves of the Democrats on both the war and the economy may doom them in 2008. Neither statism nor galloping McGovernism is a prescription for taking the White House, especially with investor-class stockowners casting two out of every three votes in recent elections.

This is why I continue to believe that the prosperity boom is not over, either in the U.S. or around the globe. The spread of free-market capitalism, and its record wealth creation for both the rich and the unrich, is unstoppable. Liberal seers have been predicting the downfall of U.S. stocks and the economy several times a year since the Bush boom began back in 2003. Yet at comparable points in the business cycle, wages and wealth have outperformed during the current expansion.

My advice to investors is to remain optimistic and stay in stocks for the long term, since economic freedom is the tried and true path to growth and prosperity. Isaiah Berlin wrote many years ago that hedgehogs always win the long-term race against foxes. Message to the investor class: Hold that thought.

EDITORIAL: After The Sell-Off (NYT)

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

In a way, the stock market's rebound yesterday was as troubling as Tuesday's rout.

Ben Bernanke, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, managed to calm the market, saying that one could reasonably hope for a stronger economy by midyear if housing stabilized soon, and if manufacturing strengthened. But those are big ifs.

The torrent of bad news on housing is only worsening, with a report yesterday that new home sales for January had their steepest slide in 13 years. And as David Leonhardt pointed out in yesterday's Times, manufacturing has already slipped into a recession, with activity contracting in two of the last three months. How is it then that investors took Mr. Bernanke's words as a "buy" signal?

The short answer is that investors have a proclivity to hear what they want to hear. On Tuesday, warning bells were simply too loud to ignore, including the steep sell-off in stocks in Shanghai, downbeat reports on the United States economy and an attempt in Afghanistan on the life of Vice President Dick Cheney. Yesterday, investors needed only the slightest prod to revert to "hear no evil" form.

The more complete answer is also more troubling. In recent years, as housing and stock markets surged, even highly speculative investors have been encouraged to an unusual degree by their bankers and regulators, who are supposed to restrain investors' more maniacal bents, but instead have done little to quell or question excessive risk-taking.

Just last week, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson Jr. and top financial regulators said the government need not — and should not — provide greater oversight for the $1.4 trillion hedge fund industry, or, by extension, the trillions of dollars more in complex derivative transactions spawned by the industry. That stance is mostly free-market ideology run amok. But it is also based on the unproven assumption that unregulated investing, which dispersed risk and reduced volatility as markets surged, will continue to do so when markets tank.

The upshot is a one-sided bet for investors. They have explicit assurances from regulators and policy makers that almost anything goes when the markets are hot, and implicit assurances — based on past experience — that the Fed would lower interest rates to contain a financial crisis should one erupt. Unfortunately, there is no guarantee that easing up on rates would have the same powerful effect in a future crisis as it had in the past.

The next crisis appears to be building around weakness in the United States, not in Russia or Asia or South America. That means money could flow out of the country if markets were rattled. That would weaken the dollar and require speedy and complex remedial action by the world's central banks — not just a rate cut by the Fed. Tuesday's stock market decline could turn out to have been a garden-variety correction. But major market participants would be wise to rethink their assumptions.

A Shanghai Education (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0138652

One benefit of Tuesday's rout in equities is that it is causing everyone to learn more about the Chinese financial system. To wit, despite all the talk of "contagion" emanating from China, that country's domestic stock markets don't have all that much to do with the rest of the world financial system. Welcome to the reality of a closed capital account.

Consider Tuesday's 8.8% Shanghai slide, which is said by many to have triggered the global stomp out of equities. Perhaps the fall spooked some investors in New York who are easily spooked, or were worried about other things too.

But the truth is that the causes of the Shanghai plunge were mainly local. Mainland investors woke up Saturday to headlines warning that Beijing would soon set up a task force to investigate illegal stock brokerage practices and bank loans to punters. Then on Monday morning, the Shanghai exchange crossed the psychologically important 3000 marker for the first time. So China's punters took profits, and when the market fell far enough, they bought back the cheap stocks. On Wednesday, the Shanghai bourse bounced back 3.9% even as other Asian markets kept falling.

A little perspective helps. Prior to last year, China's investors mostly stayed away from shares, preferring to stash their money in banks. Poor corporate governance, untransparent financial statements and rampant speculation made the market more of a roulette wheel than a proper exchange. And with no pension savings to speak of, why risk your hard-earned savings?

However, in 2005 Beijing started selling down its state-owned shareholdings. Part of that game included giving goodies such as cash and free shares to diluted investors. Around the same time, Beijing put the screws on property speculation, concerned about rapidly upward spiraling prices. This made a powerful case for playing the stock market, all the more so because mainland investors aren't allowed to invest abroad.

The lesson here is that the performance of the Shanghai index bears little correlation to China's underlying economic growth. HSBC even finds a negative correlation. China's economic engine has motored along officially at around 9% growth each year over the past few years, and unofficially at rates several percentage points higher than that. Yet Shanghai's A share market -- shares of Chinese companies only available to mainland investors -- sank 15% in 2004 and 8% in 2005. Only last year did it start to soar. So it doesn't make sense for world markets to fall merely because Shanghai has a bad day.

The far larger threat of "contagion" from China is from U.S. protectionism or lobbying for Beijing to revalue its currency. Either one of those could send the real Chinese economy -- not just the Shanghai stock casino -- into slower growth or deflation or both. And that surely would echo around the world, given the growing integration of the real Chinese economy with America's. What isn't integrated yet is the Chinese financial system.

China's markets won't act this way forever if Beijing manages to clean up the way mainland companies do business. Efforts to impose standardized accounting rules and crack down on corruption help. But the best way to develop China's stock markets is to impose market discipline -- and especially to let average Chinese put their $4 trillion of savings where they may. Then a Chinese stock selloff really would mean something to the world.

Can Landrieu Find Her Voters? (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, March 1, 2007

Hurricane Katrina may have decimated New Orleans, the political base of Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), but she and her advisers think they have a winning strategy for her 2008 re-election bid — even if the Big Easy never fully regains its population.

Republicans look at Landrieu's narrow victories, the state's displaced, mostly Democratic voters, and the relatively high popularity of President Bush compared with his standing in the rest of the country, and they see a chance to flip yet another Southern Democratic Senate seat in a presidential election year.

Metropolitan New Orleans had roughly 1.4 million residents before Katrina hit in late August 2005. More than 900,000 people have returned to the area but the city of New Orleans, which once boasted close to 500,000 inhabitants, remains only about half of its pre-Katrina size.

Landrieu recently released a poll she commissioned in January showing that she had a 64 percent job approval rating statewide. The survey also asked the more than 1,000 Louisiana residents polled if they thought Landrieu deserved re-election and pitted her against several Republicans who are considering challenging her. But a Landrieu spokesman declined to release those results.

Still, some Democratic operatives believe that Landrieu is in good shape as she begins her bid for a third term.

"Mary's actually doing the right thing now," said one knowledgeable Democratic strategist who did not want to be named. "She's voting center-right, pushing for hurricane relief funds" and reaching out to other parts of the state beyond New Orleans.

Landrieu's efforts to prove her commitment to the rest of the state are evident in her news releases.

Last week she announced that Louisiana will get $22.5 million in grants from the Housing and Urban Development Department. The release highlighted several projects, including one for a women's center in northwest Louisiana.

DOJ_NMG_0138653

Undoubtedly Landrieu's biggest coup to date — her involvement in opening a huge swath of the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas production — should earn her plaudits across the state.

"Just bringing money to the state will have a ripple effect," the Democratic strategist said. "The state will benefit overall; there will be more employment."

The deal signed by Bush last year splits 37.5 percent of the new revenues among Texas, Mississippi, Alabama and Louisiana.

Ray Strother, a longtime Democratic consultant and Louisiana native whose firm has worked for Landrieu before, said the daughter of former New Orleans Mayor Moon Landrieu made in-roads with voters outside of the Big Easy even before hurricanes Katrina and Rita hit the state.

"Since she's been in the Senate almost 12 years, her base is growing," Strother said. In Shreveport in northwestern Louisiana, for example, "she's won their affection," he said.

Still, even loyal Democrats such as Strother concede that any legitimate Republican, including Rep. Richard Baker, who is contemplating running, will give her a tough race.

"She's a Southern Democrat — of course it's going to be close," Strother said.

Landrieu won a second term in 2002 with just 52 percent of the vote against a relatively unknown Republican opponent — and that was in a nonpresidential year. Outside of Orleans Parish, Suzanne Haik Terrell (R) earned 53 percent of the vote to Landrieu's 47 percent.

But the statistics are not as dire for Landrieu as they may seem, Landrieu spokesman Adam Sharp said.

New Orleans was emptied after Katrina and residents were bused to Houston, Atlanta and beyond. But a sizable number — some estimates say it was as much as 85,000 people — simply relocated within the state.

Former New Orleans residents already are flexing their political muscle in their new communities, Sharp said. For instance, Shreveport elected its first black mayor, a Democrat, last year.

And registered voters still living outside the state's borders will be allowed to vote absentee in this year's gubernatorial election as well as next year's federal elections. Some 43,000 Louisianans already informed state election officials that they are registered to vote in the Pelican State even though they are living elsewhere.

The New Orleans mayoral race last year, which featured Landrieu's brother, Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu (D), saw the candidates buying air time in Houston and Atlanta and holding "town hall" meetings beyond Louisiana's borders.

Sharp predicted that trend will continue.

"I think you're going to see a lot of that again in the gubernatorial race," he said. "We're watching that race closely to see what the new dynamic is going to be for statewide campaigns."

Only 20,000 displaced New Orleans residents voted absentee in the mayoral race, though no one knows how many returned to vote in person.

Sharp said Landrieu's campaign, once it's up and running, will devise a system for locating and targeting those eligible out-of-state voters. TV commercials airing in neighboring states, direct mail sent to households without Louisiana ZIP codes, e-mail newsletters and fundraising pleas sent far and wide likely will be an integral part of the 2008 Senate race.

"It's unprecedented," Sharp said.

Questions About The Draft May Cloud Giuliani's 2008 Hopes (WEX)

By Bill Sammon

Washington (DC) Examiner, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON - If this presidential campaign is anything like the last, John McCain's Vietnam service will inevitably be contrasted with GOP rival Rudy Giuliani's avoidance of a war that he opposed.

"Any suggestion that he was dodging the draft is totally, factually inaccurate," said a senior Giuliani campaign adviser who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the topic. "He opposed the war on tactical and strategic grounds."

But as far back as 1993, when he successfully ran for mayor of New York, Giuliani has been dogged by accusations that he pulled strings to avoid the draft. By contrast, McCain has long been feted as a bona fide war hero for his harrowing stint in a Vietnamese prison.

Anyone who dismisses the significance of Vietnam as a potential issue in the 2008 campaign is forgetting how surprisingly potent it proved in 2004, when there was enormous interest in the military records of both President Bush and Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts. Four years later, with the nation still at war, Americans likely are to again scrutinize the military records of those who seek the job of commander in chief.

Giuliani, who once said of the Vietnam war, "I disagreed with it," obtained an occupational deferment in 1969, when he was a law clerk. Although critics say such deferments were rare, the Giuliani campaign disagrees.

"He wanted an occupational deferment, which was very common at the time, because he wanted to be a lawyer," the Giuliani adviser said.

When Giuliani's deferment expired in 1970, he drew draft number 308, which was never called. His campaign suggests this proves he was not a draft dodger.

"This is an important point: After his deferment, his name was entered into the lottery — at least once — and he had a high number," the adviser said.

Still, Giuliani has always been politically sensitive to the issue. During his 1993 mayoral campaign, he commissioned a "vulnerability study" that listed "draft dodger" as one of the epithets that might be hurled against him.

In blunt language, the consultants who prepared the study articulated how adversaries might frame the issue.

"Giuliani received special treatment from a friendly federal judge to avoid military service during the Vietnam war, when thousands of less fortunate people were dying," they wrote. "Then, as a member of the Justice Department, he hypocritically prosecuted draft dodgers."

Mark Salter, McCain's chief of staff, said he had "no idea" whether Giuliani's deferment would become a presidential campaign issue.

He added: "I don't think McCain would want it to be an issue. I know that sort of suggests a false modesty, but I really don't."

The "false modesty" remark was an allusion to the Arizona senator's extensive military background. The son and grandson of admirals, McCain graduated from the Naval Academy and served 22 years in the Navy, including five and a half as a prisoner of war in Hanoi.

Thus, if Vietnam becomes an issue in the 2008 campaign, McCain might find himself in the role that Kerry had hoped to play in 2004 — unassailable war hero. That status eluded Kerry when his combat record was challenged by Swift Boat Veterans for the Truth, who also denounced the Democrat for accusing fellow Vietnam veterans of war crimes.

Giuliani, on the other hand — who had a 2-to-1 advantage over McCain in an ABC poll of Republicans this week — could find his record subjected to the sort of intense scrutiny that Bush experienced in 2004. Some of that scrutiny came from Kerry himself, who questioned whether Bush had fulfilled his stateside duties in the National Guard.

CBS News raised similar questions in a "60 Minutes" broadcast that backfired because the network used documents that could not be authenticated. The ensuing scandal, known as "Memogate," ended up inoculating Bush against further attacks on his military record.

Swift Boats co-founder John O'Neill said the only reason Vietnam became a major issue in 2004 was that Kerry kept bringing it up.

"I do think Kerry was a special case," O'Neill said. "Whatever Rudy Giuliani or the rest of these people did or didn't do in terms of the Vietnam War, I don't think that's a legitimate issue in the presidential campaign of 2008."

During an interview with The Examiner last fall, when he was mounting a second bid for the White House, Kerry said of the Swift Boat Veterans: "I'm prepared to kick their ass from one end of America to the other." But the senator from Massachusetts later dropped out of the race.

Kerry spokeswoman Amy Brundage said this week that "2008 should be a choice between candidates' visions on ending the war in Iraq." She added: "That conversation must not be stolen by partisan front groups [that use] lying, despicable attack ads to smear the records of those who have served in uniform."

"A younger Mitt Romney became eligible for the draft in 1970, but his number was not called in the military draft," Romney spokesman Kevin Madden said. "During that time, he did spend several years as a missionary for his church in France."

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama was only 14 when the Vietnam War ended. New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, as a woman, was not subject to the draft that would complicate her future husband's White House bid.

John Edwards, who is also running for president, didn't get many questions about his military record when he was Kerry's running mate in 2004, thanks to all the focus being on Kerry and Bush.

"I did not serve in the military," Edwards said in an April 2004 interview with Katie Couric, who then asked if he had a high lottery number.

"I did, and I came after the time that they were actually drafting from the lottery," he said. "And because [of] the time I came along and graduated from high school and then went to college, I was not drafted."

Giuliani-Appointed Judges Tend To Lean To The Left (POL)

By Ben Smith

The Politico, March 1, 2007

When Rudy Giuliani faces Republicans concerned about his support of gay rights and legal abortion, he reassures them that he is a conservative on the decisions that matter most.

"I would want judges who are strict constructionists because I am," he told South Carolina Republicans last month. "Those are the kinds of justices I would appoint -- Scalia, Alito and Roberts."

But most of Giuliani's judicial appointments during his eight years as mayor of New York were hardly in the model of Chief Justice John Roberts or Samuel Alito -- much less aggressive conservatives in the mold of Antonin Scalia.

A Politico review of the 75 judges Giuliani appointed to three of New York state's lower courts found that Democrats outnumbered Republicans by more than 8 to 1. One of his appointments was an officer of the International Association of Lesbian and Gay Judges. Another ruled that the state law banning liquor sales on Sundays was unconstitutional because it was insufficiently secular.

A third, an abortion-rights supporter, later made it to the federal bench in part because New York Sen. Charles E. Schumer, a liberal Democrat, said he liked her ideology.

Cumulatively, Giuilani's record was enough to win applause from people like Kelli Conlin, the head of NARAL Pro-Choice New York, the state's leading abortion-rights group. "They were decent, moderate people," she said.

"I don't think he was looking for someone who was particularly conservative," added Barry Kamins, a Democrat who chaired the panel of the Bar Association of the City of New York, which reviewed Giuliani's appointments. "He picked a variety from both sides of the spectrum. They were qualified, even-tempered, academically strong."

That is the kind of praise that will amount to damnation (not necessarily faint) among some of the people Giuliani will be trying to impress in Washington on Friday, when he addresses the Conservative Political Action Conference. The group is filled with social conservatives, for whom the effort to recast the ideological orientation of the federal judiciary has been a generation-long project. Giuliani already faced a high threshold of skepticism from many of these activists because of his comparatively liberal record on such hot-button issues as abortion rights, tolerance of gays and gun control.

Giuliani's judicial appointments continue to win good reviews in New York legal circles for being what conservatives sometimes say they want: competent lawyers selected with no regard to "litmus tests" on hot-button social issues. Many of these people were in the mode of Giuliani himself: tough-on-crime former prosecutors with reformist streaks and muted ideologies.

"He took it very seriously -- he spent a lot of time with these candidates," recalled Paul Curran, a Republican and former U.S. attorney who chaired Giuliani's Commission on Judicial Nominations. "He was looking for judges who were willing to enforce the laws."

The mayor of New York appoints judges to three of the state's lowest courts, the Criminal Court and Family Court, which deal with lower-grade crimes than the state's Supreme Court, the main trial court and the Civil Court, which deals in relatively small financial disputes.

When Giuliani took office in 1994, he inherited a system of judicial appointments created by one of his predecessors, Ed Koch, and designed to insulate the courts from political influence. Under the system, the mayor appoints members of an independent panel. Aspiring judges apply to the panel, which recommends three candidates for each vacancy. The mayor chooses among the three.

Giuliani, a former U.S. attorney, and top aides who remain close to him, Dennison Young and Michael Hess, reviewed the applications.

Giuliani cast himself in New York not as a conservative (he had actually run on the Liberal Party line) but as a reformer. Though at least 50 of his 75 appointees were registered Democrats (only six were registered Republicans), Giuliani also won praise for, some say, appointing fewer judges with ties to local Democratic politics than his predecessors.

"It was not people coming out of the clubhouses, which is what I'd seen earlier," said Charles Moerdler, a member of the Commission on Judicial Nominations who had served other mayors in the same capacity. "I did not support Rudy (the first time he ran) because he was too conservative for me, so I was very alert to that, but I didn't see any litmus tests on his part," he said.

Giuliani's judges serve across New York's courts, where they're more likely to encounter misdemeanant celebrities -- Boy George and Naomi Campbell have appeared recently in front of his appointees -- than they are to tangle with the Establishment Clause. Some, like a Family Court judge who ruled that an unmarried couple couldn't adopt, would please national conservatives. But many of their occasional forays into jurisprudence would likely make Scalia wince.

Charles Posner, a Brooklyn judge appointed by Giuliani, made the kind of decision that keeps conservatives up nights when he was asked to levy a fine against a shopkeeper, Abdulsam Yafee, who had illegally sold beer at 3:30 a.m. on a Sunday.

In an unusual, lengthy 2004 ruling, Posner found that "there is no secular reason why beer cannot be sold on Sunday morning as opposed to any other morning."

Noting that Sunday is only the Christian Sabbath, Posner continued, "Other than this entanglement with religion, there is no rational basis for mandating Sunday as a day of rest as opposed to any other day."

Giuliani was out of office at the time of the decision and, in any case, had no say over his appointees' rulings. His spokeswoman, Maria Comella, declined to comment on the difference between the judges he appointed and those he promises to appoint.

Another Giuliani appointee reached a socially conservative verdict by a means that might not please strict constructionists. Judge Michael Sonberg denied a motion by two Bronx strip-club owners to dismiss prostitution charges against them that were based on dancers' offering "lap dances" to an undercover officer.

Sonberg ruled that the changing "cultural and sexual practices" of the previous two decades permitted him to alter the definition of prostitution.

"Statutory construction cannot remain static while entrepreneurial creativity brings forth heretofore unimagined sexual 'diversions,' " he wrote in a ruling that would have pleased social conservatives while, perhaps, alarming strict constructionists and strippers alike.

More troubling to some of the social conservatives Giuliani is courting, however, would have been Sonberg's other affiliation: When he was appointed in 1995, he was already an officer of the International Association of Lesbian and Gay Judges, a professional group. After his appointment, he became the group's president.

Laboring in the state's lower courts, few of Giuliani's other appointees show signs of ideological leanings. Two, however, were appointed to federal district courts -- one of them, Richard Berman, by President Bill Clinton. The other, Dora Irizarry, was a Bush nominee considered so liberal that Schumer pushed her nomination through.

Irizarry, appointed by Giuliani to the Bronx Criminal Court in 1996, had disclosed that she considers herself "pro-choice" during her 2002 campaign for New York state attorney general. Her appointment to the federal bench was almost derailed when the American Bar Association ruled her "not qualified" on the grounds that as a state judge, she had been "gratuitously rude and abrasive" and "flew off the handle in a rage."

But to Schumer, who led the fight against Bush's appellate judges, Irizarry was a Republican he could live with.

"Temperament is not at the top of my list," Schumer explained at the time, when asked why he supported the former Giuliani appointee. "Ideology is key."

McCain To Formally Announce Bid In April (AP)

By Marcus Franklin And Liz Sidoti

AP, March 1, 2007

Republican Sen. John McCain will officially enter the presidential race — his second run after a bitter loss to George W. Bush in 2000 — with a formal announcement in early April after a trip to Iraq.

The Arizona senator discussed the timing of the long-expected announcement with reporters at an awards reception Wednesday evening a few hours after taping an appearance on CBS' "Late Show With David Letterman."

McCain told Letterman: "The last time we were on this program, I'm sure you remember everything very clearly that we say, but you asked me if I would come back on this show if I was going to announce. ... I am announcing that I will be a candidate for president of the United States."

McCain said he would make a formal announcement in early April. He later told reporters that he would visit Iraq first and that his campaign would be about "whether I have the vision, experience and knowledge to lead the nation."

Former New York Gov. George Pataki introduced McCain to reporters before the Irish-American 10th Annual Awards reception Wednesday night. Asked about polls showing him trailing former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, McCain said: "We keep doing the best we can. We're very happy with the way things are going."

There had been no doubt that McCain would eventually become a full-fledged White House candidate, and he had been expected to make his candidacy official in the spring.

The 2006 midterm campaign had just ended when McCain took the first formal step toward a presidential run in November. He formed an exploratory committee and gave a speech casting himself as a "common-sense conservative" in the vein of Ronald Reagan who could lead the party back to dominance after a dreadful election season by returning to the GOP's core principles.

However, he faces strong challenges from Giuliani, who has widened his lead over McCain in popularity polls in recent weeks, and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who is little-known nationally but is drawing notice for his deft fundraising.

DOJ_NMG_0138657

The other two have spent the past two months mostly campaigning while McCain largely has been tied to Capitol Hill in his role as the highest-ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, which is focused largely on the unpopular Iraq war.

McCain, a former Navy pilot who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam, has emerged as the Senate's go-to guy on Iraq. He has become President Bush's most outspoken supporter of sending 21,500 additional U.S. troops to Iraq, a position that could endear him to GOP primary voters but anger much of the rest of the electorate.

A four-term senator, McCain unsuccessfully ran for president in 2000 against Bush and has been laying the groundwork for a second run for more than a year.

Since losing that race, McCain has alternately challenged and embraced the president, building an independent reputation as one who isn't afraid to speak his mind. At the same time, he's sought to mend fences with conservatives he alienated in his first presidential run.

Should he win this nomination and then the presidency, McCain, 70, would be the oldest president ever sworn into office for a first term. Only Reagan, who was 73 at the start of his second term, was older.

Asked by Letterman if he would consider being a vice presidential candidate, McCain repeated an answer he gave in 2004 when he was mentioned as a possible running mate: "You know, I spent all those years in a North Vietnamese prison camp, kept in the dark, fed scraps — why the heck would I want to do that all over again?"

In 2003 actor Arnold Schwarzenegger used NBC's "Tonight Show With Jay Leno" as the forum to announce he would run for governor in California's recall election.

McCain To Formally Announce Bid In April (CHIT)

NEW YORK -- Republican Sen. John McCain will officially enter the presidential race -- his second run after a bitter loss to George W. Bush in 2000 -- with a formal announcement in early April after a trip to Iraq.

The Arizona senator discussed the timing of the long-expected announcement with reporters at an awards reception Wednesday evening a few hours after taping an appearance on CBS' "Late Show With David Letterman."

McCain said he would make a formal announcement in early April. He later told reporters that he would visit Iraq first and that his campaign would be about "whether I have the vision, experience and knowledge to lead the nation."

In discussing the war in Iraq with Letterman, McCain repeated his assertion that U.S. troops must remain in Iraq rather than withdrawing early even though the war has been mismanaged.

"Americans are very frustrated, and they have every right to be," McCain said. "We've wasted a lot of our most precious treasure, which is American lives."

In February, Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama described the lives of troops in Iraq as having been "wasted" but then apologized a day later for making what he called "a slip of the tongue" that he said was not meant to diminish their sacrifice.

Former New York Gov. George Pataki introduced McCain to reporters before the Irish-American 10th Annual Awards reception Wednesday night. Asked about polls showing him trailing former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, McCain said: "We keep doing the best we can. We're very happy with the way things are going."

In Newly Usual Way, McCain Says He'll Run (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — Senator John McCain of Arizona took the platform of a late-night talk show Wednesday and said he would formally announce his campaign for the presidency in early April. His remarks erased entirely whatever doubt could have existed about his ambitions for the Republican nomination.

"The last time we were on this program — I'm sure you remember everything very clearly that we say — but you asked me if I would come back on this show if I was going to announce," Mr. McCain told David Letterman. "I am announcing that I will be a candidate for president of the United States."

Mr. McCain is known as something of a free spirit, and his aides suggested that his remarks to Mr. Letterman were, if formal-sounding, extemporaneous rather than a result of careful planning by his campaign. Nonetheless, aides said, his appearance clearly fit into the campaign's effort to stir as much excitement and interest as possible in his plans — a point Mr. McCain himself made as he and Mr. Letterman bantered on.

"By the way, I'll be making a formal announcement in April," Mr. McCain said. By way of explanation, he added: "This is the announcement preceding the formal announcement. You know you drag this out as long as you can. You don't just have one rendition. You've got to do it over and over."

Acting a bit downcast, Mr. Letterman responded, "How do you think that makes me feel?"

The exchange was the latest example of how the customs of presidential campaigns are changing. Not all that long ago, an announcement was a defining moment in the evolution of candidates, in which they truly opened their campaigns. For 2008, on the other hand, candidates have been not only announcing but also preannouncing on Web sites and various television shows and in random interviews.

In truth, Mr. McCain has been running for the White House for nearly two years and, ever since forming a presidential exploratory committee in November, has repeatedly told interviewers that there are no circumstances he can foresee in which he would not run.

He has assembled a full campaign staff, and his organization has been churning out nearly daily pronouncements of the latest political figure to endorse him. In Iowa two weeks ago, he talked at three events about what he would do as president. And he is going to the West Coast this weekend to raise money.

Mr. McCain's aides said Wednesday that they would not disclose any details about the announcement tour until later, no doubt in anticipation of drawing yet another round of publicity. "Details on the formal announcement will be forthcoming," said Brian Jones, campaign spokesman.

McCain Says He'll Seek Presidency, Plans To Make It Official In April (WP)

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

Sen. John McCain of Arizona declared last night that he will join the 2008 race for the White House and will formally announce his candidacy in April.

McCain used an appearance on CBS's "Late Show With David Letterman" to say what has been clear for many months, erasing whatever doubts may have existed that he intends to battle for the Republican nomination, which eluded him in 2000.

"I am announcing that I will be a candidate for president of the United States," the former Navy pilot and Vietnam War prisoner told Letterman.

McCain's decision to use the program to declare his intentions followed a pattern increasingly common in this presidential contest, as candidates have used multi-step announcement schedules to garner maximum attention for their bids.

In this case, however, McCain, 70, may have additional motives for using the late-night comedian's show, as he tries to rekindle some of the spontaneity and unpredictability from his first campaign. He cast himself as an insurgent politician in 2000, but this time, weighed down by a supportive position on the Iraq war that is out of step with the public even as he methodically woos the GOP establishment, he has struggled to project the buoyant personality of his first effort.

McCain lost a bitter contest for the Republican nomination to George W. Bush in 2000. But he emerged as the early leader in the race for the 2008 GOP nod, in part because of his support for the president's leadership on the Iraq war but also because he has spent months courting Bush loyalists and the Republican establishment that had spurned him.

In recent months, however, his star has been eclipsed somewhat by that of former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who now leads McCain in many national and some state polls testing the Republican field. A Washington Post-ABC News poll released Tuesday showed Giuliani leading McCain 44 percent to 21 percent. A month ago, Giuliani's advantage was much narrower, at 34 percent to 27 percent for McCain.

McCain advisers said the decision to declare that he will join the Republican race was not a direct result of concern that Giuliani has gained ground in the past two months but rather part of a long-planned strategy to make his intentions known around this time.

McCain is one of the leading congressional advocates for Bush's troop increase in Iraq, a position that has tied his presidential aspirations to progress in the conflict there. McCain has been highly critical of the administration's management of the war, describing what has taken place over the past few years as a "train wreck" and calling Donald H. Rumsfeld "one of the worst secretaries of defense in history."

In addition to McCain and Giuliani, former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney is seen as a potentially strong candidate for the GOP nomination. The McCain and Romney camps have been circling each other for months, attempting to corral activists and major fundraisers both nationally and in states with early contests next year.

Other Republicans already in the race or contemplating running include former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, former Wisconsin governor Tommy G. Thompson, former Virginia governor James Gilmore and Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado.

Former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) may also join the race, although he appears likely to wait until at least late summer before deciding.

McCain was one of the first Republicans to establish a presidential exploratory committee, filing papers with the Federal Election Commission weeks after the GOP drubbing in the midterm elections last November. At that time, McCain also filed a statement of candidacy, in essence a declaration of his intentions to run.

He recently made his first trip to Iowa as a prospective candidate and made clear that he would run hard for the Republican nomination.

The 2000 race was hard-fought and highly negative. Bush entered as the dominant front-runner, while McCain, who had often parted company with the GOP, was seen as a dark horse.

McCain chose to skip the Iowa caucuses that year and concentrate on New Hampshire, where independents play a more significant role in the process. His maverick style and "Straight Talk Express" theme caught fire and he soundly defeated Bush in the nation's first primary.

That set up what turned into a nasty clash in South Carolina, where McCain was the subject of scurrilous attacks. His advisers blamed the Bush camp for the attacks, but Bush advisers said they were not responsible. Bush won the primary and McCain and his team emerged angry and bitter.

McCain would later find himself in conflict with religious conservatives after he delivered a speech sharply critical of the influence of Rev. Jerry Falwell and the Rev. Pat Robertson, among others, describing them as "agents of intolerance."

Those kinds of remarks have soured some conservatives on McCain as a potential party standard-bearer. Some doubt his commitment to social issues, despite a long record opposing abortion rights, and others believe he has not been a strong advocate for supply-side tax cuts, which have been at the heart of GOP economic philosophy since the administration of President Ronald Reagan.

Some Republicans who opposed McCain in the past have warmed to the prospect of his candidacy, in part because they see him as a potentially strong candidate. But those moves to court conservatives have cost some support among independent voters, and the issue of the war has further complicated McCain's ability to project himself as a nominee who could attract Democrats and left-leaning independents.

Ridge To Serve On McCain's '08 Bid Board (AP)

AP, March 1, 2007

Former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge will serve as national co-chair of Republican John McCain's presidential exploratory committee, the campaign said Wednesday.

Ridge, a former two-term Pennsylvania governor, served as first head of the nation's newly created Department of Homeland Security from 2003 to 2005. He praised McCain's leadership in a statement announcing his support for the Arizona senator's bid for the White House:

"What sets John apart is his ability to form coalitions around a common, principled cause. Our country is at a crossroads and John McCain is the leader who fundamentally knows what it takes to move us forward and keep us safe," Ridge said.

McCain, who said Wednesday that he will formally enter the race for the 2008 GOP nomination in April, said that Ridge's "expertise as an innovative governor and national leader ... is invaluable and I'm grateful for his support."

McCain, once seen as the Republican front-runner, has been leading the GOP presidential field in endorsements, but increasingly lags behind former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani in polls of Republican voters.

WASHINGTON (AP) — New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer broke bread with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton on Wednesday, but unlike other Democrats at the breakfast table, he's not ready to give her a morsel of an endorsement.

On a trip to the nation's capital, Spitzer met with the state delegation — including Clinton, his party's early front-runner in the 2008 presidential race — but when asked later about who he's supporting for president, he kept a professional distance.

"At this point it's premature to be even thinking about questions like that," Spitzer said in an interview with the Associated Press.

"I'm focused on the state and the budget," he said, adding that in his meetings with Clinton, "presidential politics didn't come up, because we have jobs to do."

The state's congressional delegation, including Sen. Charles Schumer, overwhelmingly lined up behind Clinton, even before she declared her candidacy.

And on the same day the Democratic governor said it was too early to think about it, his lieutenant governor, David Paterson, told Albany radio station WROW that his candidate was "Hillary Clinton. No question."

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney wants to sign up supporters who can raise as much as $250,000 for his presidential campaign at a Los Angeles fundraiser in March.

The event, at the home of developer Rick Caruso on March 27, is being co-hosted by California venture capitalist Brad Freeman, a major fundraiser for President Bush, and money manager Robert A. Day.

An invitation for the "Los Angeles Kick Off" notes that the maximum individual donation for an election is $2,300, but supporters can be named co-chair and "national founder" by agreeing to raise $250,000 for the event.

A "national statesman" agrees to raise $100,000, and a "national patriot" raises $50,000.

Big Calif. Names On McCain's Campaign Finance Team (LAT)

By Dan Morain

The Los Angeles Times, March 1, 2007

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) unveiled a presidential campaign finance committee Wednesday dominated by Californians and New Yorkers, including some of the biggest donors to Gov. Arnold Schwarze-negger and President Bush.

McCain's 13 national finance committee co-chairmen include five Californians: Orange County billionaire Donald Bren; investor George Argyros; Univision Chairman A. Jerrold Perenchio; Cisco Systems Chief Executive John Chambers; and San Francisco venture capitalist J. Gary Shansby.

Altogether, McCain named 70 Californians, 68 of them men, to his finance team. They will be expected to raise $100,000 or more for the campaign.

"I'd be very disappointed if I didn't raise over $2 million," said Shansby, former chairman of Shaklee Corp., who helps runs an investment fund.

The California list includes executives in the entertainment, investment, banking, telecommunications, real estate, gambling and alcohol industries, and current and retired politicians.

Though McCain hasn't officially announced his candidacy, he said in a taping of the "Late Show With David Letterman" on Wednesday that he was running and would "announce" it in April.

The release of his finance committee is aimed at showing other candidates the depth of his support and convincing donors that he is the front-runner.

Perenchio is one of at least eight Californians on McCain's list identified as a Bush "pioneer," meaning he raised in excess of $100,000 for the president's campaigns.

Perenchio is Schwarzenegger's largest single donor, at $4.8 million. McCain also tapped Schwarzenegger's lead fundraiser, Marty Wilson, as part of his California finance committee.

Argyros, Bush's first ambassador to Spain, has spent more than $960,000 on federal campaigns since 1997, including $200,000 to Bush's 2005 inaugural.

Chambers has given more than $1 million to federal campaigns since 1997, and his company has accounted for $1.6 million during the last four years.

Bren and his wife, Brigitte, have given $267,000 to federal campaigns since 2003. Bren's Irvine Co. has accounted for $250,000 to Schwarzenegger.

Shansby has been a relatively small federal donor in the last decade, giving $35,000, Federal Election Commission records show. But as managing director and chairman of TSG Consumer Partners, a San Francisco-based fund that invests in consumer products, he has the potential to raise significant sums.

McCain Rejects CPAC Invite (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

Sen. John McCain is the only major Republican presidential candidate who will not address the nation's premier gathering of conservatives this year.

Sponsors of the Conservative Political Action Conference, which begins today in Washington and brings together thousands of conservative leaders and grass-roots activists, say the Arizona Republican has "dissed" organizers by attempting to schedule a private reception for attendees after rejecting invitations to speak at the event.

"It was a classical McCain move, dissing us by going behind our backs," said William J. Lauderback, executive vice president of the American Conservative Union.

Convening through Saturday at a sold-out Omni Shoreham Hotel, the 34th annual CPAC will feature personal appearances and nationally televised speeches by every Republican presidential hopeful except Mr. McCain, said David A. Keene, chairman of the ACU, which, along with Young America's Foundation and Human Events, is a principal sponsor of CPAC.

Conservative activists have speculated that Mr. McCain did not want to be seen on television "pandering" to Republican "right-wingers" but wanted to court those same activists at a reception in the same hotel.

"He turned down repeated CPAC offers to speak but then tried to get around us by having his office call the hotel to rent a room for a reception for CPAC attendees -- without first seeking approval of CPAC organizers," said Mr. Lauderback.

By contrast, he said, other Republican presidential aspirants have called ACU to seek permission to hold receptions at the hotel during CPAC. Each of those candidates -- including Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney -- "called us a long time ago to arrange for a hospitality reception he will give for CPAC attendees," Mr. Lauderback said.

"We would have still allowed McCain to do something at CPAC, but by the time his folks approached the hotel, everything was in concrete and there was no facility available for what he wanted," Mr. Keene said.

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, a possible contender who is considered his party's one-man think tank, and Vice President Dick Cheney, still a crowd favorite for the conservative faithful, will also address the conference.

DOJ_NMG_0138662

When an attempt was made to ask why Mr. McCain declined to address CPAC, top campaign advisers John Weaver and Terry Nelson were said to be "unreachable."

But a spokesman for Mr. McCain -- who is running an average of 13 percentage points behind former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani in the latest national polls -- said the candidate's conservative credentials are well-known.

"The senator has run, been elected and served as a conservative and looks forward to talking about his conservative record throughout the course of this campaign," said Brian Jones, communications director for the McCain campaign.

CPAC has been considered a key event for conservative candidates since the Reagan era.

"Reagan attended every CPAC from the first one in 1974 -- when he gave his famous 'City Upon a Hill' speech -- until his last year in office in 1988," said Craig Shirley, a longtime Republican activist and Reagan historian. "The exceptions were 1976 and 1980, when he was campaigning in New Hampshire for the GOP nomination."

Mr. Shirley recalled that at "the very first CPAC, Reagan brought as his guest a young, severely wounded Navy pilot who had been a POW in Hanoi: John McCain III."

Organizers say they expect more than 5,000 people -- including busloads of college students from across the country -- at what is being billed as the largest CPAC ever. This year's conference features 36 panel discussions (twice the number as last year) in two ballrooms over three days, and more than 40 private receptions held by candidates and advocacy groups.

CPAC attendees "are the people who knock on doors for candidates they support and make up the core of the ground troops on whom any candidate has to rely," Mr. Keene said. "By simply dismissing them, as Senator McCain has done, he is telling them more about himself than perhaps he wants them to know."

Mr. McCain's conservative supporters, from Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty to veteran conservative consultants such as Becky Donatelli, have told friends that they tried hard to get the senator to accept the invitation to speak at CPAC.

"It makes no sense," Mr. Lauderback said. "McCain alienates the left by calling for the repeal of the Roe v. Wade decision ... but he then alienates the right by dissing their organizations -- refusing to speak at the recent National Review conference, the House Republican Study Committee retreat and now CPAC."

Mr. Shirley said skipping CPAC is a mistake for any Republican candidate.

"Any GOP politician who doesn't understand this and the importance of this conference doesn't understand conservatism," he said.

Some candidates who originally hesitated about attending CPAC, including Mr. Giuliani, changed their minds. He is scheduled to be introduced by commentator George F. Will for a noon speech on Friday.

Nevertheless, Mr. Keene said he thought Mr. McCain would have been warmly welcomed at CPAC.

"Most conservatives disagree with his positions on a number of issues like campaign-finance reform, gun-show loopholes, taxes and global warming," said Mr. Keene. "But many like his stand on earmarks and his support of President Bush on Iraq and almost all respect the sacrifices he made for his country during the Vietnam era."

For GOP, A Void On The Right (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

New York-based political consultant Kieran Mahoney's survey of probable Republican participants in the 2008 Iowa presidential caucuses showed this support for the "big three" candidates: John McCain, 20.5 percent; Rudy Giuliani, 16.3 percent; Mitt Romney, 3.5 percent. Astonishingly, they all trailed James Gilmore, the former governor of Virginia, who had 31 percent.

How could that be? Because it was not a legitimate survey but a "push poll," normally a clandestine effort to rig the results by telling respondents negative things about some of the candidates. But Mahoney makes no secret that the voters he sampled were told of liberal deviations by McCain, Giuliani and Romney, as well as true-blue conservatism by Gilmore, who is Mahoney's client.

Mahoney is trying to prove a point widely accepted in Republican ranks. None of the three front-line candidates is a natural fit for the nation's right-of-center party. Without question, there is a void. The question is whether Gilmore or anyone else can fill it.

The most commonly mentioned potential void-filler is not Gilmore but Newt Gingrich. A straw poll by the right-wing organization Citizens United of its political contributors showed Gingrich leading with 31 percent (followed by Giuliani at 25 percent, Romney at 10 percent and McCain at 8 percent). But based on his actions as speaker of the House, Gingrich's conservative record is far from flawless.

Mahoney did not include Gingrich in his poll of Iowa Republicans likely to vote in next year's caucuses. His survey first showed McCain leading with 33 percent, followed by Giuliani at 31.5 percent and Romney at 8.8 percent (and the unknown Gilmore at 1.3 percent). Seventy percent of those polled described themselves as conservative, and 68 percent said they were pro-life; they also gave President Bush an astounding 76 percent favorable rating.

The poll-takers then "pushed" -- providing information about the front-runners that could alienate conservatives. McCain was said to have opposed tax cuts, favored "amnesty" for illegal immigrants and opposed a ban on same-sex marriage. Romney: "refused to ban" abortion in Massachusetts, committed to "full equality" for gays and lesbians, put health care in the hands of bureaucrats. Giuliani: supported Democratic Gov. Mario Cuomo's reelection in New York, is pro-gay rights and pro-choice, supports gun control.

That information dropped Giuliani by nine percentage points, to 22.3 percent, and Romney by five points, to 3.8 percent. McCain rose two points, to 35.3 percent. Gilmore remained at 1.3 percent.

Then the pushers described Gilmore as a tax-cutting, jobs-creating governor of Virginia, the head of a congressionally appointed commission on terrorism, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee and a National Rifle Association member who opposes gun control. With that buildup, Gilmore finished first, well ahead of the field.

That suggests at least the theoretical success of a campaign to knock down the conservative credentials of the big three and build up Gilmore's. "I have the best track record of any of the candidates," Gilmore told me, adding that McCain and Giuliani are "not conservative" while Romney was a "liberal governor of Massachusetts."

With Gilmore a latecomer to the presidential fundraising game, it is doubtful he could find sufficient money to tear down his opponents and build up himself nationally, or even in Iowa. But he will have plenty of help.

At the Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC), which is attracting right-wingers from across the nation to Washington this weekend, Citizens United will distribute a 23-page attack on McCain. "He's no Ronald Reagan," it begins, and concludes: "John McCain is not a conservative." (McCain is the only announced Republican presidential hopeful not scheduled to speak at CPAC.) Simultaneously, McCain operatives are putting out material that depicts Giuliani riding into City Hall on the shoulders of the New York Liberal Party as a throwback to the old Tammany Hall Democratic machine.

It is hardly too late for such negative campaigning to bring down Republican front-runners because of inadequate conservative credentials. At this point in the 2000 election cycle, Bush was far in front with about 45 percent in the polls, with Elizabeth Dole second at 29 percent. McCain was at a mere 3 percent, behind Dan Quayle and Steve Forbes, before making the run that nearly won the nomination. The GOP race for 2008 may still be open, considering the conservative void.

Obama Wants To Change Security Funding (WP/AP)

By Nedra Pickler

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama wants to change the government's formula for giving states money for homeland security, with the early voting states getting a little extra.

Obama wants states that have a bigger risk from the terrorist threat to get more of federal homeland security dollars _ also a recommendation from the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks. That's an unpopular idea among lawmakers from smaller states who would lose funding on the switch.

Currently, each state gets at least a .75 percent share of the roughly $900 million in the state homeland security grant program. The Senate bill would lower that to .45 percent, and Obama, the Illinois senator, is offering an amendment that would cut it to .25 percent. His office said it expects the Senate to consider the measure next week.

A memo by Obama's staff says the senator wants to "ensure the funding is allocated based on the threats states face, not politics."

But states with big political influence need not worry that they will get short shrift from the candidate's amendment.

The biggest benefactors would be Obama's Illinois and other heavily populated states, including White House rival Hillary Rodham Clinton's New York, which would each get more than $1 million in extra funding under Obama's plan versus another Senate proposal. Clinton and other members of the New York congressional delegation have been trying to change the formula for years.

"Every state gets two votes in the Senate so we're facing the challenge of convincing people they should give up what they think is their rightful claim on some of this money to do what the 9/11 commission and everybody who has studied it has said, which is have the money follow the risk," Clinton said Wednesday.

But even though they have much smaller populations, the leadoff Democratic primary states of Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina would not be harmed under Obama's plan. Iowa would get an additional $119,824; Nevada would get $86,222 more; and South Carolina would receive $175,027 extra.

Obama spokesman Ben LaBolt points out that Obama doesn't determine which states have higher risk and therefore would get more money. Those calculations are made by the Department of Homeland Security, which won't reveal its methods or say just what makes Iowa more vulnerable than, say, New Hampshire.

New Hampshire would have had a drop in funding if Obama's proposal was simply based on risk. But Obama has a provision to ensure that states with an international border would stay at the .45 percent minimum, and New Hampshire's 58-mile dividing line with Canada qualifies it to keep the same amount that it would get in the current Senate bill.

In all, 34 states would get more money under Obama's amendment. That comes largely at the expense of eight smaller population states and the District of Columbia, which would lose more than $1.8 million each under the formula.

Black Voters Help Obama Gain Ground On Clinton (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON

Sen. Barack Obama's dramatic rise in support among African-Americans signals a shift in the race for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination that is larger than just the black vote. Overall, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is still on top, but her lead is shrinking. And polls show Senator Obama of Illinois has more room for growth than she does, because of her high negatives.

In short, if Senator Clinton of New York thought the primaries would result in her coronation as the Democratic nominee, she should think again.

"We have a real horserace," says John Zogby, an independent pollster whose latest data show that Obama leads Clinton among black Democratic voters 36 percent to 27 percent.

A Washington Post/ABC News poll released Tuesday showed a similar trend: Obama leads Clinton among black Democratic voters 44 to 30. In both December and January, the Post/ABC poll had Clinton beating Obama among African-Americans 60 to 20. Overall, the latest Post/ABC poll shows Clinton beating Obama 36 to 24, down from a 41-17 split in January. The Post attributes the gains of Obama, who is black, to his rise in support among African-Americans.

Of course, it's early; the first caucuses and primaries are almost 11 months away. But Obama has the momentum and buzz, and is drawing phenomenal crowds. Last Friday, 20,000 people came to see him speak in Austin, Texas. Between 15,000 and 17,000 people showed up in frigid temperatures for his announcement speech Feb. 10 in Springfield, Ill.

Analysts say Obama's bounce in the polls is due in part to his formal announcement, which has led growing numbers of voters to tune in to who he is and what he is saying. But, says Mr. Zogby, Clinton is losing some of her luster for other reasons: First is her refusal to apologize for her vote in 2002 that gave President Bush a green light to launch the Iraq war. Democratic activists – those most likely to show up in primaries and caucuses – are more in sync with Obama, who has opposed the war from the beginning.

Second, Clinton faces questions about electability in the general election. Obama also faces such questions, but there is firmer opposition to her candidacy in the electorate than there is against Obama.

"Her third problem is that she has the misfortune of running against Jack and Bobby in one year," says Zogby, referring to President Kennedy and his brother Bobby, in a loose comparison to Obama and the third top contender in the Democratic race, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina. "They are not to be taken lightly at all. As we see, Barack in particular right now is cutting into a very solid Clinton constituency."

Indeed, the Clinton camp had been counting on holding onto the rock-solid support among African-Americans for Clinton's husband, former President Bill Clinton. Initially, some blacks had expressed reservations about supporting Obama, citing concerns about his own electability in a country with persistent racial issues.

But in dramatic fashion, some black Democrats are now changing their allegiance. In the primaries, the black vote is crucial: Nationwide, one-fourth of primary voters are black, and in some of the early primary states, that number rises much higher. The very first nominating states – Iowa and New Hampshire – have few minority voters, but in South Carolina, the second state to hold a primary, the Democratic electorate is 47 percent black. Many other states are considering holding their primaries early, and the African-American vote could be key in those as well.

"New York, Illinois, and New Jersey are all talking about moving up, and they all have significant black populations," says David Bositis, an expert on the black vote at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies in Washington.

Then there's the Edwards factor. Former Senator Edwards drew strong support in South Carolina when he ran for president four years ago, and could cause problems for Clinton and Obama in 2008. In this cycle, Edwards has carved out strong support in particular among union members and the working class.

DOJ_NMG_0138665

In a way, Edwards could save Clinton from a head-to-head matchup against Obama. In a three-way nomination race, Clinton may well successfully divide and conquer the other two. But if it's head to head against Obama, Clinton may find that her advantage in political experience and organization is not enough. Already, Obama is tapping into the big Democratic money centers – Hollywood and New York – that Clinton may have assumed that she would rule. Obama is also beating Clinton with the youth vote – a constituency notorious for low turnout, but the Iraq war may keep turnout higher than usual this time.

The next faceoff between Clinton and Obama will come this Sunday, when both appear in Selma, Ala., for the annual bridge-crossing, a major civil-rights commemoration. For a while, the debate around Obama centered on whether he was "black enough," given his biracial heritage. Now, the Clinton camp faces its own "black question" – can the senator hold onto the support of the voters who showed unfailing devotion to her husband?

An Inconvenient Pool (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

There is an irresistible quality to the story about Al Gore's energy-hungry Tennessee home, replete with a heated poolhouse that burns more natural gas -- $500 a month worth -- than most of us can afford to use while heating houses that shelter people, as opposed to swimming lanes. Did you know that Mr. Gore's house uses more electricity in a month than the average household does in a year?

The climate-change activist and former vice president insists, through a spokesperson, that this is not as simple as it sounds. The Oscar winner has a clear conscience because he makes sure he pays a premium for electricity from "renewable" sources and claims that he purchases "carbon offsets" to make up for his rampant energy use.

To "do the carbon offset," as his spokesperson put it, is to fund projects elsewhere that may reduce the total carbon dioxide emitted into the atmosphere. So, one might burn up hundreds of dollars worth of natural gas to keep one's poolhouse toasty, but then do penance for this carbon sin by paying someone else to put up solar panels. Drew Johnson of the Tennessee Center for Policy Research, the think tank that broke the story, called these offsets a way of "buying his way out of his guilt."

We don't begrudge Mr. Gore his Tennessee spread or his pool, but his energetic energy use does underscore the complicated nature of modern economic life and the real costs of "doing something" about global warming. The pleasures of affluence take energy, whether they be relaxing in a hot tub after a long day of predicting the end of the Greenland ice sheet, or flying in a private jet to talk political strategy with Leo DiCaprio. You never know where you're going to leave your next carbon footprint.

Mr. Gore is rich and fortunate enough to be able to afford the "carbon offset" for his energy indulgences. The middle-class parents who need a gas-guzzling SUV to haul the kids to soccer practice might not be so lucky. They might even settle for an unheated pool.

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

AUSTIN, Tex., Feb. 28 — Gov. Rick Perry removed the chairman of the Texas Youth Commission on Wednesday over charges that the agency covered up the sexual abuse of incarcerated juveniles.

Mr. Perry also called for the ouster of the acting executive director, the appointment of an independent inspector general and a shake-up throughout the commission, which runs 13 schools housing 3,000 felons under age 21.

“Leadership starts at the top,” a spokesman for Mr. Perry, Ted Royer, said. “And the governor believes the very top leadership has failed.”

Late Wednesday, the State Senate voted unanimously to demand that the governor appoint a conservator to take over the commission temporarily.

On Tuesday, the Senate Criminal Justice Committee disclosed details of long-secret investigations by the commission and the Texas Rangers showing that two supervisors at the West Texas State School in remote Pyote routinely roused boys from their beds for sexual encounters that were reported but went unpunished by the school superintendent, who now has a top leadership position at the commission. The supervisors were allowed to resign without facing criminal charges, but are now under investigation.

The dismissed chairman, Pete C. Alfaro, is a former mayor of Baytown who was first named to the commission in 1995 by Gov. George W. Bush and was appointed chairman by Mr. Perry in 2004. Mr. Alfaro did not respond to messages seeking comment. His latest five-year term expires in August.

Hours after the governor's spokesman said that Mr. Alfaro had been told by phone that he was being replaced by his vice chairman, Donald R. Bethel, a spokesman for the Texas Youth Commission, Tim Savoy, said the agency had received no notice of the action. The board has a meeting scheduled for Tuesday.

Mr. Perry, a Republican, also called on the board to replace the acting executive director, Neil Nichols, who is the general counsel and a 33-year veteran of the agency. Mr. Nichols took over last Friday upon the sudden retirement of the executive director, Dwight Harris, who started as a caseworker in 1981.

The governor said Ed Owens, deputy executive director of the Texas Department of Criminal Justice, had agreed to serve as the commission's acting executive director.

Though the governor makes appointments to the seven-member board, he has the power by himself only to remove the chairman, legal experts said. He can fire members upon a finding of gross fiscal mismanagement by a legislative audit committee made up of the lieutenant governor, who is the president of the Senate; the House speaker; and two other members from each chamber.

Senator John Whitmire, a Houston Democrat and chairman of the Criminal Justice Committee, said Wednesday that he had "no confidence in the board" but that Mr. Perry was not yet ready to seek its ouster.

The Myth Of The Middle (WP)

By Alan Abramowitz And Bill Bishop

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

The story of 2006 was that regular Americans were sick of partisan divisions in Washington. The vast and consensus-hungry middle asserted itself in November, the narrative went, finally ordering the parties and their childish politicians to stop fighting and to work together.

After the vote, bipartisanship was all the buzz, and moderation the wave of the future. But something happened on the way to the evening campfire and s'mores. House Republicans started complaining about Democrats riding roughshod into the majority, refusing to consider their amendments to legislation. President Bush announced that he wasn't going to let the opposition of congressional Democrats stop him from sending 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq. Meanwhile, Democratic leaders trashed most of Bush's domestic policy proposals as soon as they were announced in his State of the Union address.

One explanation for all this is that politicians are acting against the will of their compromise-loving constituents. Another is that Republicans and Democrats are simply being good representatives. We think the evidence supports the second interpretation.

The Cooperative Congressional Election Study (CCES) surveyed more than 24,000 Americans who voted in 2006. The Internet-based survey compiled by researchers at 30 universities produced a sample that almost perfectly matched the national House election results: 54 percent of the respondents reported voting for a Democrat, while 46 percent said they voted for a Republican. The demographic characteristics of the voters surveyed also closely matched those in the 2006 national exit poll. If anything, the CCES respondents claimed they were more "independent" than those in the exit poll.

The CCES survey asked about 14 national issues: the war in Iraq (the invasion and the troops), abortion (and partial birth abortion), stem cell research, global warming, health insurance, immigration, the minimum wage, liberalism and conservatism, same-sex marriage, privatizing Social Security, affirmative action, and capital gains taxes. Not surprisingly, some of the largest differences between Democrats and Republicans were over the Iraq war. Fully 85 percent of those who voted for Democratic House candidates felt that it had been a mistake to invade Iraq, compared with only 18 percent of voters who cast ballots for Republicans.

But the divisions between the parties weren't limited to Iraq. They extended to every issue in the survey. For example, 69 percent of Democratic voters chose the most strongly pro-choice position on the issue of abortion, compared with 20 percent of Republican voters; only 16 percent of Democratic voters supported a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage, while 80 percent of Republican voters did; and 91 percent of Democratic voters favored governmental action to reduce global warming, compared with 27 percent of Republican voters.

When we combined voters' answers to the 14 issue questions to form a liberal-conservative scale (answers were divided into five equivalent categories based on overall liberalism vs. conservatism), 86 percent of Democratic voters were on the liberal side of the scale while 80 percent of Republican voters were on the conservative side. Only 10 percent of all voters were in the center. The visual representation of the nation's voters isn't a nicely shaped bell, with most voters in the moderate middle. It's a sharp V.

The evidence from this survey isn't surprising; nor are the findings new. For the past three decades, the major parties and the electorate have grown more divided -- in what they think, where they live and how they vote. It may be comforting to believe our problems could be solved if only those vile politicians in Washington would learn to get along. The source of the country's division, however, is nestled much closer to home.

Alan Abramowitz is a political science professor at Emory University. Bill Bishop is a journalist in Austin who is writing a book on political segregation.

Schwarzenegger's 'Post-Partisanship' Is Model For D.C. (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, March 1, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — It used to be said that every American social, political and fashion trend started in California. Let's hope that's true again with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's concept of "post-partisanship."

The idea doesn't have to sweep the nation like Hula-Hoops or counter-culturalism. It just has to take hold in Washington, D.C.

As Schwarzenegger declared in his second inaugural address on Jan. 5, "we have the opportunity to move past partisanship, past bi-partisanship to post-partisanship.

"[It] is Republicans and Democrats actively giving birth to new ideas together. I believe it would promote a new centrism and a new trust in our political system," he said.

Having stopped calling Democratic legislators "girlie men" and having dramatically turned around his political fortunes after an epic ballot-initiative defeat in 2005, Schwarzenegger was triumphantly re-elected in 2006 with nearly 60 percent of the vote.

In this bright-blue state, he carried 93 percent of the Republican vote, 22 percent of the Democratic and 59 percent of the independent vote against liberal former state Treasurer Phil Angelides.

Now, Schwarzenegger is in the process of trying to put post-partisanship to work to achieve environmental cleanup, road and prison construction — and, most creatively, a mandatory health insurance plan to cover all Californians, including illegal immigrants.

The effort and the concept behind it — shared responsibility on the part of individuals, employers, health providers and government — is one that could achieve a consensus here.

But beyond that, whether it's called post-partisanship or just old-fashioned bipartisanship, what Schwarzenegger is selling philosophically is what every poll indicates the public wants — an end to partisan combat and attention to problem solving.

In fact, there is evidence that some people in Washington have caught the mood. Last week, 10 Senators — five of each party, including some pretty conservative Republicans — called on President Bush to begin working on health care reform that would "ensure that all Americans have affordable, quality private health coverage."

The organizer of the letter was Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), author of another mandatory insurance plan that is actually more radical than Schwarzenegger's.

Wyden proposes to detach health coverage from private employment and make individuals responsible for buying their own insurance, with tax breaks from the government and subsidies for low-income persons.

Bush administration officials say they are encouraged by some aspects of the plan — especially tax reform similarities to Bush's own proposal — and they were impressed by the 10 Senators' letter, especially participation by conservative Republicans Jim DeMint (S.C.), Bob Bennett (Utah), Trent Lott (Miss.), Mike Crapo (Idaho) and John Thune (S.D.).

However, Wyden told me in an interview that the administration is balking at the idea of universal coverage. He cited a Bush speech last week in Tennessee, in which the president said "We need to make sure that ... quality care is given to as many Americans as possible."

"That will not be acceptable to Senate Democrats," Wyden said. "You've got to be for covering everybody because if you don't cover everybody, you will constantly have cost-shifting," whereby providers charge those who have insurance to cover the costs of treating those who don't.

Wyden's demand that Bush publicly support universal coverage is akin to some of his colleagues' requirement that he agree to consider raising taxes as a prelude to negotiations about America's long-term fiscal woes. Everybody's got a precondition for talks, so there are no talks.

On Monday, Schwarzenegger appeared at the National Press Club to scold Washington politicians for failing to follow his example.

He confessed that "in 2003, I contributed to the polarization. I tried to push through some initiatives the wrong way — us-versus-them. I'm not a person to get all introspective about my failures, but I do know when something doesn't work. Dividing people does not work."

DOJ_NMG_0138668

"Division," he said, "is what Washington has come to represent." After an initial flurry of bipartisan talk after the 2006 elections, he said, "It doesn't look as though anything has changed here in Washington."

"All this energy spent on bitterness, all this effort spent on maneuvering — imagine if that same energy were put into working together to build a consensus. The wings of each party say, 'but we have our principles!' Why is being principled reserved for extremists?

"The left and right don't have a monopoly on conscience. We should not let them get away with that. You can be centrist and be principled. ... What is more principled than giving up some part of your position to advance the greater good of the people?"

It's sad that the Constitution prevents the Austrian-born Schwarzenegger from running for president. But we'd all be better off if politicians in Washington would follow his lead. And, as the California election returns last year indicate, so would they.

HUD Study Of Homeless Quantifies The Problem (WP)

By Bill Brubaker

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

An estimated 754,000 people -- most of them minorities -- are homeless on any given night in the United States, according to a government survey presented to Congress yesterday.

The Department of Housing and Urban Development based its estimate on the number of people who lived in shelters and on the streets on a single night in January 2005.

The report made it clear there are more homeless people in the nation than beds in shelters and transitional housing.

In early 2005, there were 438,300 beds in such sites, the report said. However, HUD said there are an additional 209,000 beds in permanent houses for formerly homeless people.

HUD Secretary Alphonso Jackson trumpeted the study -- the first of its kind by the agency -- as a "huge leap forward in our understanding of not only how many people are homeless but also what their needs are."

Jackson called this report"a powerful tool to help all of us at the federal, state and local level design more effective responses to homelessness and better help those who are living in shelters and on our streets."

Michael Stoops, acting director of the National Coalition for the Homeless, criticized the government for "spending more time on counting homeless people than finding housing for them."

"But we hope these figures will make Americans aware we are not doing as much as we can for homeless people," Stoops said in an interview.

The HUD survey of 80 areas also reported that 704,000 people used emergency shelters or transitional housing between February and April 2005.

About 65 percent of these people were men, and 19 percent were military veterans. Fifty-nine percent of those surveyed were racial minorities; 45 percent were black. A third of the people who sought shelter during that three-month period had families with children, and a quarter had a disabilities.

Bush's Ex-Campaign Manager To Give Firms Political Advice (WSJ)

By John Harwood And Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's 2004 campaign manager has a new client, and it isn't one of the 2008 White House hopefuls courting the Republican Right.

Ken Mehlman, most recently chairman of the Republican National Committee, is setting out to advise U.S. businesses on coping with political winds shifting against his party. And the challenges he sees looming are hardly touchstones of the Bush political agenda.

"We are moving toward universal access to health care," Mr. Mehlman says. To respond to climate change, he adds, there will be "increased scrutiny of the emission of carbon." And powerful corporations -- as Wal-Mart Stores Inc. has discovered in recent years -- face the threat of Web-based public relations warfare from opponents who need relatively few resources to have an impact.

Moving to the Washington law firm of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld LLP, Mr. Mehlman becomes the latest political figure to enter a niche in the capital's influence business. Instead of traditional lobbying centered on relationships with officeholders, many former officials pursue careers counseling business about political trends and helping them meet challenges with quasipolitical campaigns that blend strategic advice, public relations and mobilization of targeted constituencies.

DOJ_NMG_0138669

A Harvard-trained lawyer who practiced at Akin Gump previously, Mr. Mehlman plans to provide "political intelligence" to hedge funds trying to gauge developments in their investment strategies. In private equity, he cites as a model the decision by buyout firms to pledge cancellation of some pending coal-fired power plants to win environmentalists' support for their purchase of TXU Corp. in Texas.

"What you want are people who are creative at building coalitions...in a bipartisan way at the nexus of business and politics," he says.

In 2004, Mr. Mehlman earned plaudits for mobilizing fellow Republicans with sophisticated "microtargeting." But even some allies lament Bush-era failures to deliver on the president's 2000 pledge to be "a uniter, not a divider."

One of the city's largest law-and-lobbying firms, Akin Gump boasts such prominent Democrats as Robert Strauss, the firm's co-founder and later chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and Vernon Jordan, a close adviser to President Clinton. After Republicans won control of Congress in 1994, Akin Gump diversified by adding prominent Republicans.

Mr. Mehlman has a longstanding relationship with his Harvard Law classmate Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill.). Having left the Republicans' employ, he embraces a change in what many see as Washington's Bush-era culture of ferocity.

"How do we get back to the time when you argued during the day and had a beer after work?" Mr. Mehlman says. "That's something I look forward to -- particularly if someone else is paying."

Iran To Join Iraq Talks In Highest Contact With U.S. In 2 Years (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 28 — The top Iranian national security official, Ali Larijani, indicated Wednesday that Iranian officials would take part in a regional security conference on Iraq, setting the stage for the highest-level contact between American and Iranian officials in more than two years.

A day after the Bush administration said it had agreed to such talks, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq announced Wednesday that the first stage of the conference would be held March 10 in Baghdad, the capital. The agenda will be how to rescue Iraq from a civil war that claimed about two dozen more lives on Wednesday, and that is likely to require the American military to maintain a greatly enlarged force in Baghdad until at least fall, a top United States commander said.

In the deadliest attack on Wednesday, a car bomb exploded in a marketplace in the Bayaa district of Baghdad, killing 10 people and wounding 27 others, officials from the Interior Ministry and Yarmouk Hospital said. In central Baghdad, two Iraqi policemen died when a suicide bomber struck the entrance to the Bab al-Sheik police station.

Also on Wednesday the American military command said a soldier was killed by small-arms fire in an unspecified western district of Baghdad on Tuesday while on patrol with the Iraqi national police.

North of the capital in Diyala Province, where Sunni Arab insurgents and foreign fighters have been waging a deadly struggle for control against Shiite militias and death squads, two brothers of a prominent Sunni Arab member of the Iraqi national Parliament, Dr. Salim Abdullah, were shot to death on Wednesday, security officials there said.

Also on Wednesday, mortar attacks killed at least six people and wounded 14 in Shurta, a neighborhood in western Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said. Other mortar barrages have killed at least four people in the past two days near Iskandariya, a town south of Baghdad, the local police said.

In Salahuddin Province north of Baghdad, two Iraqi policemen were killed in a drive-by shooting near Baiji. Farther north, in Mosul, a police colonel and his driver were shot dead in their car.

Two weeks have passed since American forces began large-scale operations as part of the Baghdad security plan. Iraqi officials have called the plan a success, but American commanders are much more measured. Some American officers have said they believe many death squad and militia leaders fled the capital to avoid stepped up American patrols and will return once the Baghdad security plan is completed.

The plan, which calls for 17,000 additional troops in Baghdad, will continue until at least this fall, the second-ranking commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, told CNN on Wednesday.

“I don’t want to put an exact time on it, but a minimum of six to nine months,” General Odierno said. He also said that Sunni militants were responsible for about 70 percent of the attacks on American troops.

The willingness of American officials to attend the March 10 security conference with Syrian and Iranian officials has been widely seen as reflecting a decision by the Bush administration to yield to critics who have argued that it should no longer avoid high-level contacts with Tehran.

Mr. Larijani, in a statement translated into English on the official Iranian news agency Web site, said that the Iranian foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, had received a formal invitation from his Iraqi counterpart, Hoshyar Zebari.

DOJ_NMG_0138670

"We will participate in the conference of Iraqi neighboring states in Baghdad in March, if it will be of help to Baghdad," Mr. Larijani said. "We will carry out everything necessary to advance Iraqi interests. Iraqi leaders have a great potential for administering the country's affairs."

Iraqi officials have also said that Syria has agreed to attend.

Iran Agrees To Take Part In Iraq Security Conference (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

Iran's top security official, Ali Larijani, indicated yesterday that Tehran would take part in a Baghdad conference this month on Iraq's future, but the White House insisted that the meeting would not be an occasion for bilateral talks between the US and Iran.

Iraq's prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, has invited all Iraq's neighbours as well as Egypt, the five permanent members of the UN Security Council, the Arab League and the Organisation of the Islamic Conference. Iraqi television reported last night that the conference would take place on March 10.

"We hope the meeting will bring political backing for the national unity government in providing security and stability that will help national reconciliation in Iraq," his office said.

Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, said on Tuesday the conference, to be attended by ambassadors and senior officials, was to be followed by a meeting at foreign minister level in April, outside Iraq.

The State Department spokesman Sean McCormack raised the possibility that Ms Rice would meet directly with Manouchehr Mottaki, her Iranian counterpart, but not to discuss the nuclear issue. However just hours later Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, ruled out any bilateral talks between the US and Iran and the US and Syria.

While the State Department was signalling a possible shift in policy, the White House was eager to insist that US policy had not changed and that the conditions for talks with Iran had not changed - the suspension of its nuclear fuel development programme.

This week the US is drafting a second UN Security Council resolution that would tighten sanctions on Iran over its nuclear programme.

Iran has rejected accusations by the US that it is arming and equipping Shia militia in Iraq and providing explosives used against US forces. In an interview in January, Ms Rice did not rule out the option of meetings over Iraq in an international context but fretted that Iran would raise the nuclear issue and Syria that of Lebanon.

"Of course the only reason to talk to us would be to extract a price. And that's not diplomacy, that's extortion," she told Der Spiegel in Berlin.

Iran and the US last held a high-level bilateral meeting in Geneva in May 2003. Egypt tried to move the process forward at a conference on Iraq in November 2004 by seating Colin Powell, the secretary of state, next to Iran's Kamal Kharrazi. But neither had the green light from their capitals and little more than polite small talk came out of it.

Mr Larijani said Tehran's participation in the Baghdad conference would be designed to help the Iraqi government.

"We will carry out everything necessary to advance Iraqi interests. Iraqi leaders have a great potential for administering the country's affairs," he told reporters.

Asked if Tehran ran any risks in meeting the Americans, Mr Larijani replied: "One should not commit suicide because one is afraid of death."

Diplomats in Washington said widely held concerns that the US and Iran were stumbling towards conflict, whether over Iraq or the nuclear dispute, had driven the Bush administration to try to calm the situation.

Cliff Kupchan, analyst with the Eurasia Group consultancy, said it was possible the meetings would lead to broader discussions, including the nuclear issue.

Iraq Neighbors Agree To Security Summit (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-Zahra And Edith M. Lederer

AP, March 1, 2007

Iraq's neighbors including Iran and Syria have agreed to join U.S. and British representatives to discuss the Iraqi security crisis at a regional conference March 10 in Baghdad, the government said Wednesday.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said he will be issuing formal invitations shortly to the neighboring countries and the five permanent U.N. Security Council members — the U.S., Britain, France, Russia and China — to send deputy foreign ministers or senior officials to the conference.

DOJ_NMG_0138671

Zebari, in a telephone interview with The Associated Press from Sweden, said the Iranians agreed to participate in a meeting with the other neighbors but "they have some questions" about a separate session that would be held the same day with the five permanent council members.

His words seemed to indicate that Iran was at least partly unhappy with the arrangements for the conference, and weighing the extent of its own participation.

Iran has had little public comment on the conference so far. But in the past, Iranian leaders have been vocal in accusing the United States of trying to use the U.N. as a way to "gang up" on it, and the presence of the key Security Council countries at the Iraq conference might give Iran pause.

For their part, Sunni Arab countries like Egypt still hold grave concerns about the direction taken by Iraq's Shiite-led government, raising concerns the conference will make little headway on key issues like security.

Iraq's relations with its Arab neighbors have been rocky because of fears that the Shiite-led government is falling under Iran's influence. Originally, the Iraqi government had been reluctant to endorse the regional conference, fearing pressure from Sunni-dominated regimes, but it dropped those objections last year so long as the gathering was held on Iraqi soil.

Two Arab diplomats in Cairo said Wednesday that the U.S. recently increased pressure on some Arab governments to press them to attend the conference, after they initially had turned down invitations from the Iraqi government. They spoke on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity.

The March conference got a big boost Tuesday when Washington said it would attend, leading to the possibility it could discuss Iraq's security with adversaries Syria and Iran.

The Bush administration had waited to embrace the idea until Iraq made progress on a deal governing national distribution of oil revenue. The difficulty in getting such a deal is symbolic of Iraq's regional, factional and political divisions, and the deal was seen by the United States as a key marker of the government's will to work across divides.

"They thought the timing was right for them to hold the conference, and so we encouraged them to move forward with it," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Wednesday.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon is sending the U.N. envoy in Iraq, Ashraf Qazi, to attend the conference as an observer, U.N. spokeswoman Michele Montas said.

"The secretary-general hopes that the participants in the preparatory meeting will focus on urgently needed steps to reduce violence in Iraq and help stabilize the situation in the region," Montas said.

Iraqi Deputy Foreign Minister Labid Abawi said the United States, Britain, China, Saudi Arabia and Iran said they will attend.

"The conference will be important. It will prove that Iraq is politically capable of holding such a conference. It will send a message to the world," said Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's adviser, Sami al-Askari.

Syria and Egypt confirmed separately they would attend, but there was no immediate comment from Jordan or Saudi Arabia. Bahrain, Turkey and Kuwait were also invited, along with the Arab League and the Organization of the Islamic Conference.

Arab countries had been reluctant to accept an invitation previously, because of Iraqi security issues as well as their hesitancy to be seen as supporting the Baghdad government by attending the gathering there, Arab diplomats said.

Iraq and its neighbors have held nine meetings, Zebari said. At the last meeting, in Tehran in July 2006, Zebari said "I demanded that the next meeting should be in Iraq. ... I told them we are capable, we are confident, we can ensure your security."

Asked about Iran's participation in the conference, a spokesman for Iran's U.N. Mission sidestepped the question:

"We believe if the United States really wants to reach a solution there is hope that they can achieve that," the spokesman said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

Ali Larijani, the head of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, said it was important to involve Iraq's neighbors.

"We believe Iraq's security is related to all its neighboring countries, and they have to help settle the situation," Larijani said.

But Mustafa Alani, an expert in Iraqi affairs at the Gulf Research Center in Dubai, said while the conference will officially focus on Iraq's security, neighboring Sunni Arab countries and the U.S. will use it to convey their disquiet at Iranian influence.

Each side has accused another of being responsible for the spiraling violence in Iraq. The U.S. claims Iran is sending weapons and money to Shiite extremists in Iraq. Iraqi officials, meanwhile, have complained that Syria harbors former Saddam Hussein loyalists and allows weapons and foreign fighters to slip into the country, while Sunni countries believe the fault lies with Iraq's Shiite-led government.

America's New Path On Iraq: Talk To Iran (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, March 1, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138672

BOSTON

The United States has agreed to do what it once insisted it wouldn't do: Talk directly to Iran about Iraq, without preconditions.

After an initial meeting in two weeks, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plans to sit down in April with the foreign ministers of some 20 countries, including two that the US considers key troublemakers in the region: Iran and Syria.

Though the meeting will be confined to the goal of stabilizing Iraq – not the dispute over Iran's nuclear program – the Bush administration's decision to participate indicates that the days of working from an "our-way-or-the-highway" stance may be over.

Still, the sprawling nature of the regional talks means that understanding what key players want will be crucial to meaningful progress. The key players and their likely goals:

United States

In recent months, US officials have tried to convince the world that Iran is providing explosives and training to militias in Iraq that are attacking US forces. The US also alleges that Syria is failing to prevent Sunni Arab jihadis from crossing its border into Iraq. But most analysts are skeptical that either country plays a crucial role in Iraq's ongoing civil war.

The two countries have also roundly denied the charges, which could set the stage for explosive exchanges across the negotiating table.

Holding the conference reflects an effort to build the Iraqi government's legitimacy in the region. "This initiative is about normalizing the new Iraqi government's relations with the rest of the world," says Patrick Clawson, deputy director of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. "It's part of a process of the government taking on more authority, and part of that is developing better relations with its neighbors."

To be sure, Ms. Rice's announcement does not necessarily mean the administration has wholeheartedly jumped on the "talking with the enemy" bandwagon.

"The administration is still skeptical, but they were not going to be the skunk at the garden party and say we are not going at all," says Jon Alterman, a Middle East expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

Noting that Iraq's neighbors all have an interest in Iraq's stability, Geoffrey Kemp of the Nixon Center in Washington says that the open-to-all talks make sense. The US may be interested in addressing what it sees as Iranian interference, he says, but the Iranians are worried about Iraq-originating Kurdish interference in its territory, while Turkey also is concerned about Kurdish elements.

Mr. Clawson says that such a broad conference is unlikely to be the venue for negotiating specific issues like the flow of Iranian pilgrims or smuggling across the Iranian border. It's more likely that the process will serve to encourage more international assistance for Iraq.

Iran

Iraqi officials say the Iranians have confirmed they will participate, but Ali Larijani, the head of Iran's national security council, said Wednesday that the country would attend if it was "expedient." Analysts say that Iran won't miss the chance to sit down with the US. It remains angry at US allegations that it's running a secret nuclear-weapons program, but America's apparent belief that Iran can help fix the problems of its neighbor opens up the slight possibility of a quid pro quo – less pressure on nukes in exchange for more help on Iraq.

Iran has been making overtures for more bilateral diplomacy for years, but has been consistently rebuffed by the US, which has demanded that Iran meet preconditions like suspending its uranium enrichment program first. The Iranians will see this as a golden opportunity to get the ball rolling to a more normal relationship, analysts say.

"The Iranians have been signaling they want to do this forever," says Bill Beeman, a professor at the University of Minnesota whose recent book, "The Great Satan vs. the Mad Mullahs," explores the two country's tempestuous relationship. "The thing that the Iranians will value above all about this is that they're sitting down in a situation with the US in which the parties are equals," he says. "They get to sit together on an equal playing field without having to kowtow to the US. In the past, "the US has insisted the Iranians somehow have to do penance before the US will talk to them," Beeman says.

Iran will also be seeking to make it clear that its shared interests with Iraq over both oil and the flow of Shiite pilgrims across the border make close relations crucial and inevitable, and that efforts to isolate the two countries could backfire.

Britain

Britain's interests and perspectives on Iraq are roughly aligned with America's, but it has been much more open to diplomacy with Iraq's neighbors in recent years.

Britain has argued that as neighbors, Iran and Syria can be part of the solution rather than part of the problem. When the Iraq Study Group – a US government panel that issued a report urging a change in the Bush administration's course earlier this year – recommended that the two countries be drawn into dialog, Britain welcomed its report. At the time, the Bush administration rejected that advice.

DOJ_NMG_0138673

Still, Downing Street is skeptical about how constructive the talks with Tehran and Damascus will prove. "Meeting is good but results have to flow from meetings," says a British foreign office spokesman.

Syria

Like Iran, Syria will see the meeting as a chance to get a "foot in the door" with the US which has cold-shouldered Damascus for the past two years. Despite Washington's icy relations with Damascus, the Syria regime of President Bashar al-Assad has repeatedly said it wants to resume full dialog with the US and that it's willing to revive peace talks with Israel.

Analysts say Syria will seek to use the meeting to advance its interests outside of Iraq. "Probably the immediate priority is Lebanon, followed by the Palestinian and Israeli issue," says Andrew Tabler, a Damascus-based fellow with the Institute of Current World Affairs.

A United Nations probe into the killing of former Lebanese premier Rafik Hariri has implicated Syria. Damascus denies any involvement. The US has backed demands that those involved with the killing be prosecuted, even if they're found to be Syrian officials. Syria is worried that a proposed international tribunal to try Hariri's killers will be used as a political tool by the US to weaken the regime. It's seeking to persuade the Americans to ease the pressure.

Syria also wants to resume peace talks with Israel, and says it is willing to agree to a full peace with the Jewish state in exchange for the Golan Heights, captured by Israel in 1967. But Israel has been split over the Syrian overtures. The Syrians are hoping to improve their image as potentially serious partners for peace and thereby ease America's pressure.

In exchange, Syria could help in Iraq, Mr. Tabler says, by encouraging the Sunni tribes of eastern Syria to try to convince their cross-border tribesmen to stop supporting the insurgency, and by tightening security along its porous 400-mile frontier with Iraq.

Russia

The Russians are intensely worried about how Middle East destabilization might affect Russia's neighbors in the Caucasus and Central Asia, as well as attitudes among their own population of 20 million Muslims.

Russia wants to reestablish its credentials as a big-power player in the region, analysts say, and more engagement on Iraq creates an opportunity to do that. President Vladimir Putin has been seeking to hold Russia up as an alternative, more accommodating pole to what is now often seen as a brash and bullying America. It also has major business interests in Iran and Syria.

"Russia has repeatedly said it wants to see the Iraq problem solved with the involvement of Iraq's neighbors and the entire world community, through engagement and dialog and not through the use of force," says Yevgeny Bazhanov, vice rector of the government's Diplomatic Academy, which trains Russian diplomats. "Without Russian involvement you couldn't have this dialog ... because Russia can play the role of mediator at that table."

Iraq

Iraq, of course, wants peace and stability, as well as to be treated as an equal by its neighbors, particularly by Sunni Arab states like Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and Egypt that are uncomfortable with the Shiite political ascendancy inside the country. The Iraqi government also worries that these neighbors, the US, and Iran are turning the country into a proxy battleground for their own disputes and are eager to see all sides sit down together and tensions defused.

Tehran May Take Part In Iraq Talks (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

Iran said yesterday it is likely to attend a regional conference this month -- with the United States and Syria -- to address the violence in neighboring Iraq, while the Bush administration insisted its decision to participate did not signal a softening of its hard line against the two foes.

Ali Larijani, Iran's top national security official, said Tehran was still reviewing the invitation for the March 10 gathering of lower-level ministers in Baghdad. The government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has planned a follow-up meeting of foreign ministers, possibly in April.

"We support solving the problems of Iraq by all means and we will attend the conference if it is expedient," Mr. Larijani, head of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, told reporters.

Syria has already agreed to attend the conference.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari, in an interview with the Associated Press from Sweden, said Iran had agreed to meet with other regional powers, but "they have some questions" about a separate meeting to be held the same day in Baghdad that would include the United States and the four other permanent members of the U.N. Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0138674

Diplomats expected in Baghdad on March 10 also include U.N. Iraq envoy Ashraf Qazi and representatives from Egypt, the Arab League and the Organization of the Islamic Conference. An Iraqi official said yesterday no one had yet turned down the invitation.

U.S. officials yesterday were at pains to reject the idea that the decision to sit down with Syria and Iran reflected an about-face in U.S. policy. The administration has been sharply critical of both countries, charging them with backing insurgent forces and militias in Iraq that have attacked U.S. troops.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said it was Mr. al-Maliki's government that organized the gathering and issued the invitations. Mr. Snow said issues like Iran's suspect nuclear programs would not on the table in Baghdad.

"If you're suddenly expecting chummy new relations, you've created a scenario that is not justified by the facts on the ground or by precedent," Mr. Snow said.

But critics in Congress and in the Middle East noted that President Bush in December had dismissed a suggestion by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group for just such a regional conference on Iraq.

The Daily Star, an influential Lebanese daily, said in its lead editorial yesterday that the most significant thing about the conference may be that Iraq took the lead in organizing it.

"The Iraqi-led conference may the first sign that the Iraqis are rising up from under a mountain of American mistakes and setting their own security agenda," the paper said.

There were signs that Mr. al-Maliki's government was coordinating with Syria and Iran in planning the meeting.

Washington Rules Out Dir-ect Talks With Iran (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

The Bush administration on Wednesday dismissed suggestions that it might engage dir-ectly with Iran or Syria at an international conference on Iraq to be held in Baghdad next week.

European allies and dom-estic critics have broadly welcomed the announcement by Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, that the US would take part in the conference alongside Iran and Syria. She also noted that such a diplomatic initiative had been recommended by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group last year.

Ms Rice's statement at a Senate hearing on Tuesday prompted reports in the US media of a dramatic shift in policy. It was fuelled in part by the State Department, which pointedly declined to rule out the possibility of bilateral talks between Ms Rice and Iranian officials at a follow-up conference on Iraq to be held in April.

But on Wednesday the White House stepped in to "clarify" the situation and explicitly ruled out such a move.

"There will not be bilateral talks between the United States and Iran or the United States and Syria, within the context of these meetings," said Tony Snow, the White House spokesman. The US precondition re-mained unchanged, he said, that Iran first suspend its uranium enrichment programme as called for by the United Nations Security Council.

"We want to make sure those waters don't get muddied," he said.

Some analysts interpreted the mixed signals as evidence that the Bush administration was more interested in using the appearance of diplomacy to appease domestic critics and get its supplemental Iraq war budget through Congress, rather than adopt one of the key findings of the Iraq Study Group, which was to engage Iran and Syria directly. However, other analysts believed that Ms Rice was in fact trying to shift the US position in the direction of engagement with Iran, as has happened in recent weeks with North Korea, culminating with the nuc-lear freeze agreement reached in Beijing last month.

"It creates confusion, and when the Iranians are confused they are paralysed," commented Ray Takeyh, an analyst with the Council on Foreign Relations think-tank who believes Ms Rice is anxious to engage Iran in talks.

In Tehran, Iran's top security official, Ali Larijani, indicated that Iran would take part in the Baghdad conference.

Nouri al-Maliki, Iraq's prime minister, has invited all Iraq's neighbours as well as Egypt, the five permanent members of the Security Council, the Arab League and the Organisation of the Islamic Conference. Officials said it would take place on March 10. The US is expec-ted to send a senior official below the rank of minister.

"We hope the meeting will bring political backing for the national unity government in providing security and stability that will help national reconciliation in Iraq," Mr Maliki's office said.

The Maliki government is anxious that Iraq is not turned into a proxy battleground for a US-Iranian conflict. Mr Larijani said Teh-ran's participation in the Bag-hdad conference would be designed to help the Iraqi government.

DOJ_NMG_0138675

Iran has rejected accusations by the US that it is arming and equipping Shia militia in Iraq and providing explosives used against US forces. Asked if Tehran ran any risks in meeting the Americans, Mr Larijani replied: “One should not commit suicide because one is afraid of death.”

Analysis: Iraq Talks May Open New Doors (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, March 1, 2007

The Bush administration says it's not going soft on Iran, but Washington's new agreement to talk to the clerical regime about violence in Iraq could crack the door for other discussions with the last holdout among President Bush's old axis of evil.

Iraq said Wednesday that its neighbors, including U.S. adversaries Iran and Syria, will attend a March 10 session on the country's security crisis. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made the surprise announcement Tuesday that a U.S. diplomat will also be there and that she herself will go to a later session.

It wasn't exactly an olive branch, but Rice's mild overture looked dramatic after escalating U.S. allegations that Iran is contributing to the spreading chaos in Iraq and a calculated show of U.S. military might in the Persian Gulf.

Bush administration spokesmen were quick to note that the talks are at Iraq's invitation, not Washington's. And the sessions are supposed to be about Iraq, not Iran.

"The Iraqis are putting together a meeting, and it's going to be a businesslike meeting," White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters. "If you're expecting, suddenly, new chummy relations, you've created a scenario that is not justified by the facts on the ground or the precedents."

"Going wobbly, shift, turnabout, change," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack mocked, using several terms pulled from the morning newspapers. "Look, the administration has continued to act on a certain set of principles that it has outlined," and will keep doing so, he said.

Yet there were hints that the administration is testing Iranian, and domestic American, willingness to go further. In the diplomatic world, tough talk can sometimes be a cover for more conciliatory gestures.

"While I'm not going to point you in the direction of any particular engagement with any particular delegation ..., I'm also not going to exclude any particular diplomatic interaction," McCormack said when asked about prospects for U.S.-Iranian contact at the meetings.

The subject of sophisticated homemade bombs might come up, McCormack said. The Bush administration claims that at least one element of the Iranian regime is supplying Iraqi insurgents with especially lethal bombs that kill U.S. troops.

As for Iran's disputed nuclear program, the subject of U.S.-backed efforts to apply punishing international sanctions on Tehran, the United States won't bring it up, McCormack said.

If the Iranians want to talk about it?

"I'm sure that people would listen politely," McCormack offered, before adding that the United States is not backing off its insistence that Iran drop its uranium enrichment program as a price for escaping sanctions.

Ahmad Bakhshayesh, a Tehran Allameh University teacher in politics, said the nuclear issue probably sinks any chance of a short-term improvement in U.S.-Iranian relations from the upcoming Iraq conferences.

"However, it may lead to a broader path for negotiations between the two countries," said Bakhshayesh.

Although the United States directly accuses Iran of supporting militants in Iraq, "Iran attends the conference to indicate to the U.S., Iraq and the region that Tehran supports stability in Iraq," he said.

The United Nations Security Council has begun to consider a second, tougher round of sanctions on Iran, including a ban on travel abroad by officials involved in the nuclear program.

Rice made a bigger overture to Iran on that point last year.

If Iran shelved activities the West feared could lead to a bomb, Rice said the United States would join Europe in face-to-face talks with Tehran. That amounted to a U.S. proposal for rapprochement after more than 25 years of estrangement, but at a price Iran's hard-line leaders were unwilling to pay.

The gambit was popular in Europe but unpopular in some quarters of Bush's own government. The administration has since toughened its rhetoric on Iran, flexed its muscles at the U.N. and sent two carrier battle groups to the Persian Gulf.

The White House had dismissed the recommendation from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group in December that it reach out to Syria and Iran to try to stabilize Iraq, saying both nations would try to use the opportunity as leverage in unrelated confrontations with the West.

Syria would want a free pass on allegations it is behind the assassination of a Lebanese politician, Washington said, while Iran would make cooperation in Iraq part of discussions about the nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0138676

So, is the administration now becoming more flexible? After a separate diplomatic overture to North Korea, does the latest shift on Iran portend a retreat from the Bush administration's famously hard line against unsavory regimes?

The State Department's McCormack rolled his eyes.

"This just didn't happen overnight. This happened as a result of careful policy and diplomatic ground work that has been laid over the course of the years of this administration," but only now bearing fruit, he said.

A Diplomatic Avenue (WP)

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

THE BUSH administration's decision to participate in a regional conference on Iraq that could include Iran and Syria is a welcome way to strengthen U.S. diplomacy at a crucial moment in the Middle East. Iraq teeters between civil war and steps toward a political settlement; so do Lebanon and the Palestinian Authority. Regional talks aren't likely to settle any of these crises, but they are a necessary part of any solutions. By participating and opening the way for conversations with the Syrian and Iranian governments, the administration will extract itself from a diplomatic corner and gain some fresh opportunities.

It's quite possible that neither Syria nor Iran will prove cooperative on Iraq -- Tehran has yet to say whether it will attend the conference -- but there are some positive signs. Iran's hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has come under attack at home for his confrontational style. In recent weeks, Ali Larijani, Iran's national security adviser, who reports to supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, has been quietly negotiating with senior Saudi officials on Lebanon and Iraq. Though there have been no breakthroughs, the talks helped to stop street fighting in Lebanon; Iran seems to be interested in heading off a regional conflict between Sunni and Shiite movements. Syria, desperate to end its own isolation, has been advertising its willingness to help calm Iraq and to open peace talks with Israel.

Mr. Larijani and other Iranian officials have also been hinting that Iran is interested in striking a deal to end its confrontation with the U.N. Security Council over its nuclear program. It's at least possible that Tehran is looking for a way, without appearing to be capitulating, to accept the U.N. demand that it end uranium enrichment. That's why administration officials were wise not to rule out side talks between U.S. and Iranian officials at the upcoming Baghdad meetings, while sticking to the administration's position that formal negotiations with Iran will depend on an enrichment suspension.

Success with Iran will require a careful mix of diplomacy, economic sanctions and the threat of force. Since the beginning of the year the United States has strengthened its military position in the Persian Gulf and arrested Iranian agents in Iraq. Now it has matched those necessary measures with a new diplomatic avenue. What's needed next is a continued show of determination by the U.N. Security Council, whose latest deadline for an Iranian freeze on enrichment expired last week. Britain and the United States have begun seeking a new resolution strengthening the mostly symbolic sanctions that the Security Council approved in December. Russia and European governments that have been urging more dialogue with Iran have just witnessed a rare show of flexibility by the Bush administration, but the dialogue will lead nowhere unless it is accompanied by continued and escalating pressure from a united Security Council.

Don't Negotiate With Pariahs (USAT)

By Victor Davis Hanson

USA Today, March 1, 2007

America should attend regional talks that may include Syria and Iran, in support of stabilizing the democracy in Iraq.

But the United States should not negotiate directly with these terrorist states until they cooperate with ongoing United Nations investigations and cease trying to destroy neighboring democracies.

Syria has engaged in serial assassination in Lebanon to overturn that constitutional government. It blocks U.N. inquiries into the murders of prominent Lebanese. And Syrian money and agents foment unrest in democratic Iraq, even as they seek to aid Hamas in attacking democratic Israel.

Iranian theocracy violates international nonproliferation accords. Its president has promised to wipe Israel off the map. In chilling fashion, Iran has hosted an international conference to deny the Holocaust, as if proof were needed that its threats derive from an existential hatred of the Jewish state.

Like Syria, Iran wants to end the democratic experiment in Iraq. Iranian money, weapons and expertise are used by terrorists in kill Americans in Iraq, and through Hamas to disrupt Palestinian peace efforts. Hezbollah, a group also backed by Iran and Syria, seeks to destabilize Lebanese democracy and restart a border war with Israel.

Such aggression is not symptomatic, as is often asserted, of confident regimes on the rise. Iranian oil production is declining. Billions in food and fuel subsidies are proving unsustainable, and scarce funds are siphoned off to foreign terrorists and nuclear proliferation. Beset by unsound economies and rising domestic unpopularity, the Iranian theocracy and Syrian dictatorship have become pariahs at odds with European diplomats, other Arab states and the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0138677

Only the continued American policy of ostracizing Iran and Syria, galvanizing the international community to enforce U.N. compliance, supporting Iranian and Syrian reformers, and keeping a high-profile military presence in the area offers any hope that either nation will cease their subversion.

We need to keep the pressure up — without bombing, without bombast and without talking directly with these rogue and increasingly desperate states that have caused themselves and the world so much trouble.

Russia Warns U.S. Against Striking Iran (AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

AP, March 1, 2007

Russia's foreign minister warned Washington not to use force against Iran and criticized what he described as the United States' unilateral approach to other global crises in an interview published Wednesday.

Russia was worried about Vice President Dick Cheney's recent comment that "all options are on the table" to stop Tehran from becoming a nuclear power, Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said.

"We are concerned about the possibility of a military scenario," Lavrov was quoted as saying, in the government daily Rossiyskaya Gazeta. "We are observing a U.S. military buildup in the Persian Gulf. Such a buildup of forces always threatens to trigger a military conflict, even by accident."

Iran has ignored a U.N. deadline to halt the enrichment of uranium, which the U.S. says is part of a secret effort to build nuclear weapons. Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel but highly enriched uranium can be used in an atomic bomb.

Russia has repeatedly spoken out against the use of military force against Iran, and has warned that harsh punishment would be counterproductive.

In December, Russia supported a U.N. Security Council resolution that imposed limited sanctions against Iran over its refusal to halt enrichment, but only after the council dropped an initial proposal to impose curbs on a nuclear power plant Russia is building in Iran.

Senior diplomats from the five permanent Security Council members and Germany met Monday in London to discuss ways to pressure Iran to suspend enrichment. Officials in London and Washington said new measures would likely include incremental restrictions on trade and arms.

Lavrov asserted that the talks on the Iranian issue were deadlocked, saying both the United States and Iran were unwilling to compromise.

"It would be unforgivable to miss a chance to use every opportunity to start such talks because of a false notion of prestige, because of the unyielding stance taken by both parties," he was quoted as saying.

Echoing recent comments made by President Vladimir Putin, Lavrov also assailed Washington for what he called a unilateralist approach to global issues.

"When they offer us a unilateral strategy and urge us to express solidarity in combating one or another evil ... that's not the behavior of a partner," he was quoted as saying.

Lavrov added that Putin's harsh criticism of U.S. policy earlier this month voiced an opinion many other nations shared, but were afraid to express publicly.

Putin told a security conference in Munich Feb. 10 that the United States "has overstepped its national borders in every way" and accused it of triggering a global arms race.

Lavrov praised Putin's blunt talk: "Someone had to say it ... to show the need for candid talk about how to deal with global affairs."

Russia can speak independently, he said, because of its resurgence following the troubled years after the 1991 Soviet collapse.

"There are those who cannot say 'no' to the United States," he said, according to the newspaper. "But we can allow ourselves to tell the truth, and not just reject unilateral calls for support but offer concrete constructive alternatives."

In a bid to increase its role in Middle East peace efforts, Russia this week hosted Khaled Mashaal, leader of the militant Palestinian group Hamas. Lavrov said Tuesday the Hamas chief pledged to end missile attacks and violence against Israel, although Mashaal reaffirmed his group's refusal to recognize Israel.

Lavrov also called for lifting the financial aid blockade of the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority.

The United States, the Europeans and Israel consider Hamas a terrorist group. Hamas' renunciation of violence and recognition of Israel are key demands of the Quartet of Middle East peace brokers — Russia, the United States, the European Union and the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0138678

In the newspaper interview, Lavrov said Russia will continue to support the Quartet's demand that Hamas recognize Israel. But he warned the West's refusal to deal with the militant group could undermine a fragile accord among the Palestinians.

"It's wrong and shortsighted not to see the real progress that already has been made," he said.

Iran Sanctions May Target Bank (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, March 1, 2007

The world's big powers are debating whether to increase pressure on Tehran's nuclear programme by targeting Bank Sepah, a leading Iranian bank, with United Nations sanctions.

Such a move, against Iran's oldest bank, would follow a campaign by the US to persuade European nations to follow its example and take steps against Sepah that would exclude it from international markets.

In January, Washington barred US banks from doing business with Sepah because of what the Bush administration said was the institution's connections with Iran's missile programme. The decision effectively stopped Sepah from carrying out dollar transactions.

But moves in other jurisdictions would have a greater effect. Bank Sepah's wholly owned subsidiary Bank Sepah International claims it has "relationships in over 45 countries worldwide" as well as offices in London, Paris, Frankfurt and Rome.

To date, European Union countries have resisted taking action against Sepah, despite a campaign waged by Robert Kimmitt, deputy US treasury secretary, and Stuart Levey, Treasury under secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

States such as Germany and Sweden say that imposing measures against the bank would be legally difficult unless Sepah is specifically named by a UN Security Council resolution. Bank Sepah itself denounces what it says are Washington's "fabricated statements and unfounded allegations," adding that it "will spare no effort to seek righteous remedies in the near future".

Yesterday, however, European diplomats said they were discussing whether to include measures against Bank Sepah in a new resolution. The issue will be addressed by top diplomats from the permanent five members of the Security Council and Germany, who are due to discuss possible Iran sanctions in a telephone call today.

The diplomats said no decision had yet been made about Sepah. But, in line with the policy of exercising incremental pressure on Tehran, which missed a deadline to curb its nuclear programme last week, the US and the EU want to strengthen measures set out by a previous resolution agreed last December.

That resolution targeted seven organisations the UN said were involved in Iran's nuclear programme, three involved in its missile programme, and 12 people connected with either or both programmes.

As well as adding new names to the lists, the EU and US want a new resolution to impose a travel ban on the people identified in the previous measure – previously only subject to softer travel restrictions.

In addition, the six countries are discussing whether to impose limited restrictions on arms dealings with Iran – a measure Russia is very likely to resist – and whether to include language that would deter countries from subsidising trade with Iran.

U.S. Concedes Uncertainty On North Korean Uranium Effort (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And William J. Broad

New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — Last October, the North Koreans tested their first nuclear device, the fruition of decades of work to make a weapon out of plutonium.

For nearly five years, though, the Bush administration, based on intelligence estimates, has accused North Korea of also pursuing a secret, parallel path to a bomb, using enriched uranium. That accusation, first leveled in the fall of 2002, resulted in the rupture of an already tense relationship: The United States cut off oil supplies, and the North Koreans responded by throwing out international inspectors, building up their plutonium arsenal and, ultimately, producing that first plutonium bomb.

But now, American intelligence officials are publicly softening their position, admitting to doubts about how much progress the uranium enrichment program has actually made. The result has been new questions about the Bush administration's decision to confront North Korea in 2002.

"The question now is whether we would be in the position of having to get the North Koreans to give up a sizable arsenal if this had been handled differently," a senior administration official said this week.

The disclosure underscores broader questions about the ability of intelligence agencies to discern the precise status of foreign weapons programs. The original assessment about North Korea came during the same period that the administration was building its case about Iraq's unconventional weapons programs, which turned out to be based on flawed intelligence. And the new North Korea assessment comes amid debate over intelligence about Iran's weapons.

The public revelation of the intelligence agencies' doubts, which have been brewing for some time, came almost by happenstance. In a little-noticed exchange on Tuesday at a hearing at the Senate Armed Services Committee, Joseph DeTrani, a longtime intelligence official, told Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island that "we still have confidence that the program is in existence — at the mid-confidence level." Under the intelligence agencies' own definitions, that level "means the information is interpreted in various ways, we have alternative views" or it is not fully corroborated.

"The administration appears to have made a very costly decision that has resulted in a fourfold increase in the nuclear weapons of North Korea," Senator Reed said in an interview on Wednesday. "If that was based in part on mixing up North Korea's ambitions with their accomplishments, it's important."

Two administration officials, who declined to be identified, suggested that if the administration harbored the same doubts in 2002 that it harbored now, the negotiating strategy for dealing with North Korea might have been different — and the tit-for-tat actions that led to October's nuclear test could, conceivably, have been avoided.

The strongest evidence for the original assessment was Pakistan's sale to North Korea of upwards of 20 centrifuges, machines that spin fast to convert uranium gas into highly enriched uranium, a main fuel for atom bombs. Officials feared that the North Koreans would use those centrifuges as models to build a vast enrichment complex. But in interviews this week, experts inside and outside the government said that since then, little or no evidence of Korean procurements had emerged to back up those fears.

The continuing doubts prompted the Office of the Director of National Intelligence on Wednesday to declassify a portion of the most recent, one-page update circulated to top national security officials about the status of North Korea's uranium program. The assessment, read by two senior intelligence officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity in a joint interview, said the intelligence community still had "high confidence that North Korea has pursued a uranium enrichment capability, which we assess is for a weapon."

It added, they said, that all the government's intelligence agencies "judge — most with moderate confidence — that this effort continues. The degree of progress towards producing enriched uranium remains unknown, however."

In other words, while the agencies were certain of the initial purchases, confidence in the program's overall existence appears to have dropped over the years — apparently from high to moderate.

It is unclear why the new assessment is being disclosed now. But some officials suggested that the timing could be linked to North Korea's recent agreement to reopen its doors to international arms inspectors. As a result, these officials have said, the intelligence agencies are facing the possibility that their assessments will once again be compared to what is actually found on the ground. "This may be preventative," one American diplomat said.

American intelligence agencies had long known of North Korea's nuclear program employing plutonium, which can make compact weapons but requires large, easily detected reactors. By contrast, uranium warheads tend to be larger, but the technology for enriching uranium is much smaller and easier to hide.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, declined to discuss the decisions to confront North Korea in 2002 or the quality of the intelligence behind that decision, though both have noted previously that North Korea purchased equipment from Pakistan that could only have been intended for use in producing weapons fuel. One former official said that it was Ms. Rice, in a meeting at the C.I.A. in 2004, who encouraged intelligence officials to soften their assessments of how quickly the North Koreans could produce weapons-usable uranium.

"She asked, how did we know about the timing, and they didn't have answers," said the former official. "Did they have Russians and Chinese helping them? No one was sure. It was really a guesstimate about timing."

Different players in the 2002 debate have different memories. John R. Bolton, the former American ambassador to the United Nations, who headed the State Department's proliferation office at the time of the 2002 declaration, said in an interview on Wednesday evening that "there was no dissent at the time, because in the face of the evidence the disputes evaporated." Mr. Bolton, one of the most hawkish voices in the administration and a vocal critic of its recent deal with North Korea, recalled that even the State Department's own intelligence arm, which was the most skeptical of the Iraq evidence, "agreed with the consensus opinion."

But David A. Kay, a nuclear expert and former official who in 2003 and 2004 led the American hunt for unconventional arms in Iraq, said he had found the administration's claims about the North Korean uranium program unpersuasive. "They were driving it way further than the evidence indicated it should go," he said in an interview. The leap of logic, Dr. Kay added, turned evidence of equipment purchases into "a significant production capability."

But the doubts were on full display on Wednesday, when Christopher R. Hill, the chief American negotiator with North Korea, testified on Capitol Hill. "If we determine that there is a program, it's got to go," Mr. Hill said, words that were far more tentative than American policy makers have used about the program in the past. Expressing his resolve to get to the bottom of the mystery, he added: "We cannot have a situation where we — you know, they pretend to disarm and we pretend to believe them. We need to run this into the ground." He said that while there was no doubt that North Korea had bought centrifuges from Abdul Qadeer Khan, the rogue Pakistani engineer, there was doubt about "how far they've gotten."

John E. McLaughlin, a former director of central intelligence and the deputy C.I.A. director in 2002, defended the initial North Korean findings as accurate. "At the time we reported this, we had confidence that they were acquiring materials that could give them the capability to do this down the road," he said in an interview. But no one, he added, "said they had anything up and running. We also made clear that we did not have a confident understanding of how far along they were."

That confidence has dropped further because inspectors have been banned from North Korea for four years, nearly as long as they were out of Iraq before their readmittance just before the 2003 invasion. In Iraq's case, intelligence analysts extrapolated from the last information they had to assess what kind of weapons Iraq might be producing.

Outside experts, including David Albright, president of the Institute for Science and International Security, a private group in Washington that tracks nuclear arms, have suggested in recent days that something similar happened in North Korea's case. "The evidence doesn't support the extrapolation" to the judgment that North Korea was making crucial strides in its uranium program, Mr. Albright said in an interview. "The extrapolation went too far."

He said administration analysts were right in thinking that Dr. Khan had sold North Korea about 20 centrifuges. Gen. Pervez Musharraf, the Pakistani president, confirmed that in a memoir published last year. But, Mr. Albright said, intelligence agencies overstated whether North Korea had used those few machines as models to construct row upon row of carbon copies.

His report zeroed in on thousands of aluminum tubes that the North Koreans bought and tried to buy in the early 2000s. The C.I.A. and the Bush administration, the report said, pointed to these tubes as the "smoking gun" for construction of a large-scale North Korean plant for the enriching of uranium. It was assessments about the purpose of aluminum tubes that were at the center of the flawed Iraq intelligence.

In the North Korea case, intelligence analysts saw the tubes as ideal for centrifuges. But Mr. Albright said the relatively weak aluminum tubes were suitable only for stationary outer casings — not central rotors, which have to be very strong to keep from flying apart while spinning at tremendous speeds.

Moreover, he added, the aluminum tubes were "very easy to get and not controlled" by global export authorities because of their potentially harmless nature. So that purchase, by itself, Mr. Albright added, was "not an indicator" of clandestine use for nuclear arms.

New Doubts On Nuclear Efforts By North Korea (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, March 1, 2007

The Bush administration is backing away from its long-held assertions that North Korea has an active clandestine program to enrich uranium, leading some experts to believe that the original U.S. intelligence that started the crisis over Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions may have been flawed.

The chief intelligence officer for North Korea, Joseph R. DeTrani, told Congress on Tuesday that while there is "high confidence" North Korea acquired materials that could be used in a "production-scale" uranium program, there is only "mid-confidence" such a program exists. Meanwhile, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, the chief negotiator for disarmament talks, told a conference last week in Washington that it is unclear whether North Korea ever mastered the production techniques necessary for such a program.

If the materials North Korea bought "did not go into a highly enriched uranium program, maybe they went somewhere else," Hill said. "Fine. We can have a discussion about where they are and where they've gone."

The administration's stance today stands in sharp contrast to the certainty expressed by top officials in 2002, when the administration accused Pyongyang of running a secret uranium program -- and demanded it be dismantled at once. President Bush told a news conference that November: "We discovered that, contrary to an agreement they had with the United States, they're enriching uranium, with a desire of developing a weapon."

The accusation about the alleged uranium program backfired, sparking a series of events that ultimately led to North Korea's first nuclear test -- using another material, plutonium -- nearly five months ago.

In 2002, the United States led a drive to suspend shipments of fuel oil promised to Pyongyang under a 1994 accord that froze a North Korean plutonium facility. The collapse of the 1994 agreement freed North Korea to build up a stockpile of plutonium for as many as a dozen nuclear weapons. Pyongyang conducted its test with some of that plutonium -- while the alleged uranium facility faded in importance.

Plutonium and highly enriched uranium provide different routes to building nuclear weapons. The North Koreans were able to reprocess spent fuel rods -- which had been monitored by U.N. inspectors under the 1994 agreement -- to obtain the weapons-grade plutonium for a nuclear test last year. A uranium-enrichment program would have required Pyongyang to build a facility with thousands of uranium-spinning centrifuges to obtain the highly enriched uranium needed for a weapon. Iran's nuclear program, which the United States alleges is intended for weapons, involves enriched uranium.

When Bush took office in 2001, a number of top administration officials openly expressed grave doubts about the 1994 accord, which was negotiated by the Clinton administration, and they seized on the intelligence about the uranium facility to terminate the agreement. The CIA provided an unclassified estimate to Congress in November 2002 that North Korea had begun constructing a plant that would produce enough "weapons-grade uranium for two or more nuclear weapons per year . . . as soon as mid-decade."

David Albright, a respected former U.N. inspector and president of the Institute for Science and International Security, issued a report last week in which he likened the intelligence on North Korea's uranium facility to the discredited intelligence before the invasion of Iraq that Baghdad was building a nuclear program. "The analysis about North Korea's program also appears to be flawed," he wrote.

In the upcoming issue of the Washington Quarterly, Joel S. Wit, a former State Department official who, with Albright, recently met with North Korean officials in Pyongyang, also raises questions about the intelligence estimate.

Administration officials insist they had valid suspicions at the time about North Korean purchases -- including 150 tons of aluminum tubes from Russia in June 2002 -- to halt any possible cooperative talks with Pyongyang. Officials also say that a senior North Korean official admitted to the program in October 2002, when Hill's predecessor, James Kelly, confronted North Korean officials over the U.S. intelligence findings at a meeting in Pyongyang. North Korea subsequently denied that any such admission took place.

Kelly told reporters at the time he had informed the North Koreans that "this was a big problem and that they needed to dismantle it right away, before we could fully engage in a whole range of things that might well be mutually beneficial."

U.S. participants at the meeting said in interviews there was little dispute at the time North Korea appeared to be admitting the program, though one said the admission was more "tonal" -- such as the North Korean official's belligerent attitude -- than would appear in the transcript of the discussion.

During the early years of the crisis, the United States took a firm stand that North Korea must first admit to the uranium facility, rejecting proposals from other nations that it was more important to freeze the plutonium facility in order to halt North Korea's production. In May 2004, DeTrani -- then with the State Department -- was dispatched to give the North Koreans a detailed, 90-minute presentation of all the materials that Pyongyang had procured overseas, including aluminum tubes, chemicals and even a centrifuge kit from a Pakistani nuclear smuggling network, a U.S. official said.

The North Koreans have consistently denied having a uranium-enrichment program, and U.S. officials say suspected procurement activities have largely ceased in the past two years for unknown reasons. Some speculate that Pyongyang found a uranium program too difficult, especially since the plutonium facility was active. Others say DeTrani's presentation spooked them and they either ended the purchases or became more discreet.

Hill has said he has raised the uranium program at every meeting with the North Koreans, but the recent deal struck with Pyongyang focuses on the plutonium program. Under the agreement, North Korea will close and "seal" its plutonium nuclear reactor at Yongbyon within 60 days in return for 50,000 tons of fuel oil.

Pyongyang must eventually disclose and dismantle its programs in order to receive significant aid and other benefits, including normalizing relations with the United States.

U.S. Discusses Releasing North Korean Funds (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman And Donald Greenlees

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — China and the United States are close to an accord to let North Korea regain some of the $25 million in its funds frozen in a bank in Macao now that it has agreed to start dismantling its nuclear arms program, American officials said Wednesday.

The American officials said arrangements for North Korea to get a portion of the funds frozen at Banco Delta Asia, a small family-owned bank accused of money laundering, have been the subject of intense discussions this week in China. A deal could be announced in the next few weeks, they said.

The issue of the funds, frozen a year and a half ago, was a major factor in the off-again-on-again six-party negotiations with North Korea over its nuclear program. North Korea angrily boycotted the talks for most of the last year, charging that the bank action was based on false charges and was an example of economic coercion.

The intention to ease the freeze on the North Korean funds was not announced at the time of the North Korea accord reached on Feb. 13, but officials said at the time that they expected the issue to be resolved. Daniel Glaser, a deputy under secretary of the Treasury, has been in China this week for discussions about the subject.

DOJ_NMG_0138682

Mr. Glaser said this week that the United States had gone through more than 300,000 documents from Banco Delta Asia and consulted on them with both North Korea and China. The effort, American officials said, was meant to determine which of the North Korean funds were tainted by illegal activities and which were legitimate.

"All of this work that we've done has put us in a position where we can begin to take steps to resolve the Banco Delta Asia matter," Mr. Glaser told reporters in Hong Kong on Monday. He said the resolution of the matter would be completed "in a timely fashion" and "as quickly as possible."

The expected return of some of the frozen funds to North Korea — officials involved in the discussions say the sum could exceed $12 million — offers a striking case study of how the United States has used its financial laws to extend its reach to foreign banks and isolate a country from the international financial system.

Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state who negotiated the nuclear deal with North Korea, said Wednesday that he had no doubt that freezing the funds compelled North Korea to negotiate.

"I think they were concerned about the fact that we were able to go after an important note of their financing," he said, testifying before the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. Hill added that the agreement on nuclear matters meant no easing of American concerns over North Korea's illicit activities on drugs, weapons or counterfeiting. "I can assure you that we have not, and will not, trade progress on denuclearization by turning a blind eye to some of these other activities," he said.

The Bush administration hopes to replicate the North Korean experience with Iran, but American officials involved in the planning acknowledge that this might be more difficult because Iran has a web of banking relationships throughout Europe and the Middle East.

Sanctions against Iran approved by the United Nations Security Council in December have contributed to Iran's economic isolation, administration officials say. In addition, Treasury steps similar to those against Banco Delta Asia have forced Iranian banks to carry out transactions, including the sale of oil, in currencies other than the dollar.

These steps have complicated business deals and the willingness of some foreign companies to invest in Iran, energy experts say. Recently, for example, Russia said it was slowing its investment in an Iranian civilian nuclear plant, saying that it objected to being paid in euros.

Banco Delta Asia was seen in financial circles as an early test case of American efforts to use such sanctions against not only North Korea but also other countries charged with supporting terrorism or illegal weapons proliferation. In 2005, for example, the Bush administration labeled Banco Delta Asia a "primary money laundering concern" and charged that it was helping North Korea carry out counterfeiting, narcotics trafficking and other illicit activities.

North Korea denied the accusations, and Banco Delta Asia, in filings with the Treasury Department, said it had no evidence of such activities for North Korea.

Nevertheless, the bank and the Chinese government closed accounts of 20 North Korean banks, 11 North Korean trading companies, 9 North Korean citizens and 8 Macao-based companies that do business with North Korea, according to bank records. The bank also promised to cease any further business with North Korea or its business partners.

American officials have suggested that some of these accounts helped North Korea's leader, Kim Jong-il, maintain a lavish lifestyle in Pyongyang, the capital.

While the $25 million in Banco Delta Asia is believed to be a small part of North Korea's financial activities with the outside world, it reflects only the amount of money in the bank at the time the funds were frozen. The volume of transactions conducted by the bank for North Korea could involve many times that amount of money, according to people close to the investigation into the bank.

The main enforcement tool by the United States was an announcement that it was considering a step barring American banks from doing business in dollars with Banco Delta Asia, effectively threatening to shut it out of the international banking system. To protect themselves, American banks then stopped doing business with Banco Delta Asia.

Those steps, in turn, forced the bank to shut itself down, hand itself over to the Chinese government and freeze all funds linked to North Korea.

US-North Korea Talks Set For March (AP)

AP, March 1, 2007

U.S. and North Korean officials will meet in New York on March 5-6 to discuss initial steps toward normalizing relations, the State Department said Wednesday.

Spokesman Sean McCormack said U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill will meet with North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan.

DOJ_NMG_0138683

Talks on establishing normal relations after decades of hostility were called for in the six-party nuclear disarmament agreement signed in China on Feb. 13.

McCormack said Hill and Kim will spent a lot of time working on the agenda for the normalization process.

"It's not a meeting that will produce immediate results," McCormack said.

Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, said Tuesday that officials had seen North Korea take preliminary steps toward shutting down its main nuclear reactor, which the North pledged to close and seal in return for an initial load of fuel oil. More aid would follow once North Korean technicians had disabled its nuclear programs.

"There are parts of this nuclear program that we have to pay a lot of attention to, to see if we have the kind of disclosure and the inspection capabilities that we're looking for," Maples said.

Hill is scheduled to appear at a House Foreign Affairs Committee hearing today.

N. Korea, U.S. Talks 'Just A First Step' (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, March 1, 2007

The State Department yesterday ruled out "immediate results" from U.S.-North Korea talks on establishing full diplomatic relations, which officials said will take place on Monday and Tuesday in New York.

U.S. intelligence officials, meanwhile, said the North has taken preliminary steps to shut down its main nuclear reactor, as required by a Feb. 13 agreement under which it would scrap its atomic programs in exchange for about $300 million in aid.

The deal, signed in Beijing by the United States, North and South Korea, China, Japan and Russia, also calls for a "working group" to begin work on several bilateral issues -- including diplomatic relations -- within the next two weeks.

"I would caution you that this meeting is just a first step; it's an initial conversation," he said. "Don't look at it as a meeting that is going to produce immediate results. Nobody is going to come out the front door and wave a piece of paper with some agreement on it."

The talks will be conducted by the two countries' chief nuclear negotiators, Christopher Hill and Kim Kye-gwan. Mr. Kim is expected to arrive in San Francisco today and meet with nongovernmental groups in the San Francisco Bay Area before heading to New York tomorrow.

North Korea has also invited Mohamed ElBaradei, director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, to Pyongyang for talks on dismantling the North's nuclear facilities.

On Capitol Hill, Army Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, said on Tuesday that recent information and analysis show the North has taken initial steps to close its main nuclear reactor at Yongbyon.

"There are parts of this nuclear program that we have to pay a lot of attention to, to see if we have the kind of disclosure and the inspection capabilities that we are looking for," he told the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Joseph DeTrani, mission manager for North Korea in the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, said the United States will continue to insist that the North declare all of its nuclear programs, including the suspected enrichment of uranium.

Pyongyang has never admitted publicly to having such a program, though U.S. officials insist the North Koreans acknowledged it when confronted with evidence in 2002.

Mr. DeTrani said the U.S. has "high confidence" that North Korea was acquiring materials for a production-scale enrichment program in 2002. The assessment of the program's continued existence is "at the mid-confidence level," he said.

The six-party talks, which produced the Feb. 13 agreement, began in 2003 but were dogged by repeated North Korean boycotts. The last one followed Washington's successful effort in 2005 to persuade a Macau bank to freeze about $24 million in North Korean assets.

Mr. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, indicated yesterday that the Treasury Department may be ready to ease those restrictions, saying that such a development "will not solve all of North Korea's problems with the international financial system."

"It must stop its illicit conduct and improve its international financial reputation in order to do that," Mr. Hill told the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

In Pyongyang yesterday, senior officials from the two Koreas held their first formal negotiating session in seven months.

The South's chief delegate, Unification Minister Lee Jae-joung, criticized the North for conducting missile and nuclear weapons tests last year and urged it to "quickly implement the Feb. 13 agreement," said spokesman Lee Kwan-se.

North Korea's senior Cabinet councilor, Kwon Ho-ung, defended his country's missile tests as a "legitimate right for self-defense as a sovereign nation," but remained silent on the nuclear issue.

The North will hold talks with Japan on establishing diplomatic relations and resolving other disputes March 7 and 8 in Vietnam, Japan's Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki said yesterday.

In U.S. Overtures To Foes, New Respect For Pragmatism (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28 — In the span of just two weeks, the United States has agreed to hold high-level contacts with Iran and Syria, and to start down the path toward formal diplomatic recognition of North Korea.

Has the Bush administration gone soft on its foes?

As recently as Jan. 12, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice repeated what has been a constant of Bush foreign policy: a refusal to bestow on Iran, Syria and North Korea the legitimacy of diplomatic engagement as long as they refuse to bend on disputed issues.

"That's not diplomacy," Ms. Rice said before a Senate panel, in defending the administration's stand on Iran and Syria. "That's extortion."

Administration officials insisted Wednesday that the new overtures, including an agreement to join Iran and Syria in talks on Iraq, did not mean there had been a change in policy. "There is no crack," the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said. "A number of people have been characterizing U.S. participation in a regional meeting as a change in policy; it is nothing of the sort."

But foreign policy experts, administration critics on Capitol Hill and former diplomats disagreed, saying the administration appeared to have recognized the extent to which it had tied its own hands by insisting on talking only to friends. Even Ms. Rice had called the opening to Tehran and Damascus a "diplomatic initiative."

"The question isn't whether the axis of evil is dead; it's alive as it was yesterday," said Daniel P. Serwer, a vice president at the United States Institute of Peace and a former diplomat who served as executive director of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. "The question is whether the concept, as it was applied, is dead. And it's absolutely clear to me that you have to talk to who you have to talk to, in order to get things done."

Within the administration, there has long been a tug of war between advocates of engagement, represented by the diplomats at the State Department and sometimes led by Ms. Rice, and those who have sought to isolate enemies, a group led by Vice President Dick Cheney and defended by the former United Nations ambassador, John R. Bolton.

In the period leading up to the start of the Iraq war in 2003 and in the years immediately after, those pushing for isolation appeared to have the upper hand.

But last November's election results, along with the morass in Iraq and a yearning for some foreign-policy home runs as the clock winds down on the Bush administration, have made room for proponents of engagement.

A senior administration official who advocates at least limited contacts with America's enemies said, "There wasn't one big 'Aha!' moment, when suddenly we were being heard."

But, he said, "there seems to be more of a recognition of the limited success" of the approach.

At a dinner and lecture on Tuesday night at the Library of Congress, it looked like a reunion of the pro-engagement crowd. Seated at the front was former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, along with the new deputy secretary of state, John D. Negroponte; also in attendance was Robert L. Gallucci, the former chief United States negotiator during the North Korean nuclear crisis of 1994.

It was a veritable bevy of advocates of realpolitik, headlined by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, who told the audience, "America must be prepared to talk to our enemies."

Ms. Rice has come under criticism from conservative hard-liners, both in and out of the administration. So far, her close relationship with President Bush has allowed her to prod the administration toward more engagement, while at the same time taking pains not to push Mr. Bush further than he is willing to go, administration officials said.

In the North Korea case, Ms. Rice pressed for United Nations Security Council sanctions after it exploded a nuclear device in October. Then, three months later, she telephoned Mr. Bush directly from Berlin, where she was traveling, to get his approval for the United States to pursue an accord with North Korea on nuclear issues. In doing so, she bypassed layers of government policy review that had derailed past efforts to negotiate an agreement, administration officials said.

The State Department announced Wednesday that as part of the agreement, in which North Korea agreed to shut its main nuclear reactor in exchange for food and fuel aid, the United States and North Korea would hold "working group talks" on Monday and Tuesday on the normalization of relations.

In the case of Iran and Syria, Ms. Rice followed a similar strategy. In the weeks leading up to Tuesday's shift, she joined the rest of the Bush administration in increasingly confrontational oratory toward Iran. She accused Iran of aiding Shiite militias in attacks against American troops. She referred to “increasing lethality” in those attacks, which she said the United States would not stand for.

One senior administration official said the hard line helped Ms. Rice answer critics who accused her of being too soft. It also allowed the United States to sit at the table with Iran and Syria from a position of strength, the official said.

“The government of the U.S. now feels as though it has leverage,” another senior administration official said. “People ask, ‘What’s changed?’ That’s what’s changed.”

It remains unclear whether an administration that has been committed for so long to not talking to its enemies can make a sincere about-face. At this point, administration officials caution that they have no plans to negotiate one-on-one with Iran or Syria.

But they said the same thing about talks with North Korea, maintaining that Washington was willing to talk to the North only within the context of six-nation talks, while American officials were actually meeting one-on-one with their North Korean counterparts.

Still, there are not many people in the administration who believe that Vice President Cheney has suddenly changed his mind, and now favors engagement.

That means that Ms. Rice will be under pressure to show results quickly, a tall task. “You can’t expect miracles here,” said Lee H. Hamilton, a co-chairman, with Mr. Baker, of the Iraq Study Group, which advised the United States to engage Syria and Iran.

“There has to be a sustained effort,” Mr. Hamilton said. “Successful diplomacy requires very careful preparation and very extensive follow-through.”

Diplomacy Could Define End Of Bush's Term (USAT)

USA Today, March 1, 2007

WASHINGTON — It happened to Ronald Reagan, and it is happening to George W. Bush.

This week, the administration agreed to sit down with Iran and Syria at a conference on stabilizing Iraq. Two weeks ago, Bush agreed to provide aid to North Korea if it freezes its nuclear program. In February, the administration stepped in to revive peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians — something it declined to do for six years.

IRAQ CONFERENCE: U.S. may meet with Iran, Syria

The Bush administration has "come to the conclusion that there are limits to military power and that in diplomacy, it's often more necessary to talk to your opponents than your friends," says Richard Armitage, deputy secretary of State during Bush's first term.

On Wednesday, White House spokesman Tony Snow said Bush isn't changing positions.

"This is not a crack in the wall," he said of plans to meet with Iran and Syria. "It is another example, though, of the United States working diplomatically."

Bush's moves recall Reagan in 1986 after his administration was damaged by revelations it secretly sold weapons to Iran and used the money to fund anti-communist guerrillas in Nicaragua. Weakened by the Iran-contra scandal, Reagan shuffled his Cabinet and intensified arms-control talks with the Soviet Union.

Foreign policy experts say they see a new pragmatism in the Bush administration.

Bush's new flexibility is a result of his desire to salvage his Iraq policy and tamp down other crises around the globe, says Richard Haass, head of the Council on Foreign Relations. "It's ironic that what was a war of choice (in Iraq) has narrowed the administration's choices and forced it to adopt a more traditional foreign policy."

Personnel changes might have smoothed the way. When Donald Rumsfeld was Defense secretary, the Pentagon took on foreign policy roles that traditionally went to State Department diplomats. Now, "you have more of a team player" in Robert Gates, Rumsfeld's successor, says Bruce Riedel, a former National Security Council official. Gates "recognizes the importance of diplomacy and (sees) how overstretched his resources are," Riedel says.

Anne-Marie Slaughter, dean of the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs at Princeton University, says Vice President Cheney and the Pentagon have seen their influence wane. "The State Department is once again running foreign policy," she says.

In an interview Wednesday on CNN, Cheney dismissed that idea: "I get to give (Bush) my advice. And sometimes he takes it, sometimes he doesn't. That's always been the deal."

Conservatives say the administration's recent moves could embolden U.S. foes. North Korea's behavior has "gotten worse," and Iran is likely to speed efforts to build nuclear weapons, says Danielle Pletka, vice president at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank.

DOJ_NMG_0138686

Recent administration moves include:

·North Korea. The United States and four other countries agreed to give North Korea fuel oil if it shuts down a program that has produced plutonium for nuclear weapons. The accord is similar to a 1994 pact Bush criticized when he came into office. Also, U.S. and North Korean officials meet next week to discuss steps toward normal ties after decades of hostility.

·Iran. The administration says it will join Iran and Syria at the Iraq conference this month. It has resisted talks with both and pushed sanctions and banking restrictions to isolate Iran.

·Middle East peace. Bush sought to isolate Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and declined calls to try to broker Israeli-Palestinian peace. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice now says Bush is determined to see progress toward a Middle East peace deal before leaving office.

"In the last two years of an administration, … you focus on what's doable," says Kenneth Duberstein, Reagan's last chief of staff. "You all of a sudden get realistic and pragmatic."

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

CAIRO, Feb. 23 — Ali Mezar has spent his life fishing a narrow, muddy patch of the Nile in this, one of the most crowded cities in the world. But Mr. Mezar has little contact with urban civilization. He sleeps in his boat, makes tea from the dirty Nile water and on good days earns a few dollars.

Not far away, on the shoulder of a busy avenue, Karim Sayed, 21, herds sheep and goats matted with urban filth. He spends his days staring into oncoming traffic, hoping to make a sale before the police move him or confiscate a sheep.

At the city's edge, in a packed neighborhood built entirely by its residents, Mina Fathy and his neighbors fix sewerage, water and electricity problems on their own because they say the government offers them virtually no service in such functions.

Cairo is home to 15 million and often described as the center of the Arab world, an incubator of culture and ideas. But it is also a collection of villages, a ruralized metropolis where people live by their wits and devices, cut off from the authorities, the law and often each other.

That social reality does not just speak to the quality and style of life for millions of Egyptians. It also plays a role in the nation's style of governance.

The fisherman on the Nile, the shepherd in the road and residents of so-called informal communities say their experiences navigating city life have taught them the same lessons: the government is not there to better their lives; advancement is based on connections and bribes; the central authority is at best a benign force to be avoided.

"Everything is from God," said Mr. Mezar, the fisherman, who was speaking practically, not theologically. "There is no such thing as government. The government is one thing, and we are something else. What am I going to get from the government?"

Cairo has been the capital of Egypt for more than 1,000 years, and sits where the dry sands of the desert lead to the fertile Nile Delta. Egyptian officials like to say that this is where modern bureaucracy was invented, where the mechanics of governance first took shape.

While the Egyptian government is the country's largest employer, it is by all accounts an utterly unreliable source of help for the average citizen. That combination, social scientists say, helps create a system that has stifled political opposition and allowed a small group to remain in power for decades.

One brick in the foundation of single-party rule has been public resignation. There is no widespread expectation that the authorities will give the common man a voice, and so there is rarely any outrage when they do not. The fisherman, the shepherd and Mr. Fathy all said that the most they could hope for from the government was that it stay out of their lives.

"We hope God keeps the municipality away from us," Mr. Sayed said as he sat in a wooden chair, surveying his fetid flock of goats and sheep with headlights streaming by.

Such a feeling of separation is one reason that the leadership has been able to clamp down on opposition political activities without incurring widespread public wrath, political analysts say.

"People see the government as something quite foreign or removed from their lives," said Diane Singerman, a professor in government at American University in Washington who has written extensively about Cairo. "Commuters to the city, or poor peddlers and working people, do not see the government as particularly interested in their lives, and they also see politics as quite elite and risky and something to stay away from."

Officials say part of the disillusionment comes from unrealistic expectations, a holdover from the heady days of Gamal Abdel Nasser, Egypt's leader from 1954 to 1970, when government jobs were deemed a right and cradle-to-grave care a promise.

Mr. Mezar and his cousin Muhammad Hassan fish the Nile just as their parents and their grandparents did, living in the bottom of their small wooden boats. Dark from the sun, hands callused from their oars, they are the image of Egypt, and they often smile and wave dutifully as tour boats motor up the river, with tourists snapping their pictures.

They dock their boats beneath a busy overpass, waking each morning at 6, filling their glasses with tea made from water scooped directly from the Nile. They worry that despite their fishing licenses, the police will demand their fish or write a ticket for some invented infraction.

"There is only despair," Mr. Hassan said as he slowly rowed while his son, Rageb, 22, stood barefoot on the front of the boat putting out the net. "It is all about connections. If you know someone, you get 20 jobs. If not, you get nothing."

He said they knew about bilharzia, the life-threatening parasite in the slow-moving waters on the edge of the Nile, but their priority is catching fish.

"We get checked for bilharzia," he said.

"Really?" he was asked.

"No, never," he replied, shaking his head.

There were four boats working the river one morning, including Mr. Hassan's. The crews were all relatives of his. No one expressed anger — or depression. Only resignation.

"I am sick of Egypt," Mr. Mezar said. "I like fishing, but you see, are there any fish? I would give all of this if the government gave me a job."

Cairo has grown like a living organism, swallowing up agricultural lands and villages as its population has ballooned. Nearly three-quarters of the population live like Mr. Fathy, in informal communities.

Mr. Fathy comes from Manshiet Nasser, a sprawling labyrinth of brick apartment buildings along trash-strewn dirt roads that is home to hundreds of thousands of people. Informal communities are not shantytowns, but neighborhoods that grew organically, without any urban planning. People simply built homes, some buying agricultural land, some squatting on desert land.

The nature of these communities has bred a sense of distance and alienation from the government, experts in Cairo's life say. The government only provided services when the neighborhoods reached a critical mass, when the numbers of people could no longer be ignored. Few have schools. Roads are so narrow that police trucks cannot enter. Electricity is pirated. Order is established by the community, independent from the authorities.

"My impression is that they think they are something different from the rest of the city," said Abdel Halim Ibrahim Abdel Halim, an urban planner and architect. "They feel like they provided housing for themselves, they control that housing."

Residents of Manshiet Nasser, which is on a plateau, often refer to those in the formal center of the city as "people who come from under," as Salah Ibrahim, 40, meant when he said, "People who come from under never listen to us." He said a road in front of his house had been flooded with sewage for days until, finally, the neighbors all donated money to have it repaired.

"Every house is on its own," said Mr. Fathy, who said he had paid a bribe of 2,000 pounds, about $350, when inspectors insisted that he tear down the third-floor apartment he was building on top of his parents' building. "Every house has to solve its own problems."

Sarkozy Outlines Foreign Policy For France (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, March 1, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 28 — The center-right presidential candidate Nicolas Sarkozy wants to toughen sanctions against Iran, keep Turkey out of the European Union, create an independent European defense strategy and have a friendly but not a submissive relationship with the United States.

Unveiling his foreign policy on Wednesday, Mr. Sarkozy, who is the interior minister and head of the governing party, the Union for a Popular Movement, called the American-led invasion of Iraq a "historic mistake" and thanked President Jacques Chirac for his "lucidity" in keeping France out of it.

But Mr. Sarkozy was vague about what the United States should do in Iraq. He warned that withdrawing American troops too soon would "lead to chaos" but said avoiding a withdrawal would lead the Iraqis to "react with more violence, and that would benefit the terrorists."

With a speech and a news conference on Wednesday, Mr. Sarkozy sharpened his message, subtly portraying himself as tougher and more reliable on national security than his main rival, the Socialist candidate Ségolène Royal.

He defined Iran as the most urgent issue he would face if elected, saying, "The idea of an Iran with nuclear weapons is unacceptable."

DOJ_NMG_0138688

But he parted company with Ms. Royal, who has said Iran must be denied even a civilian nuclear program. Mr. Sarkozy branded her position as irresponsible, adding that France should help other countries build nuclear power plants, beginning with Algeria, its former colony.

Mr. Sarkozy enjoys a slight lead over Ms. Royal in the first round of the French presidential election on April 22, according to some opinion polls. Even so, a high level of voters have expressed only tepid support for either of them.

In addition, a recent surge of support for the centrist candidate François Bayrou and the candidacy of the far-right National Front leader Jean-Marie Le Pen make the outcome of the first round even more uncertain.

Without mentioning Ms. Royal by name, Mr. Sarkozy sought to create distance between them. He pledged to keep French military spending at 2 percent of the gross domestic product, suggesting that it was unfair that France and Britain were the only two members of the European Union to spend enough and make sacrifices for defense. He called it important, for example, for France to build a second aircraft carrier.

Ms. Royal, by contrast, said this month that France should take the money earmarked for the carrier and spend it on education and research instead.

At the time, Mr. Sarkozy criticized her proposal as a "curious idea," and Defense Minister Michèle Alliot-Marie, a Sarkozy supporter, called it "irresponsible."

In his remarks on Wednesday, Mr. Sarkozy said human rights would be a cornerstone of his foreign policy, adding that the president of France should speak out against abuses in China and Russia.

Ms. Royal, during a recent trip to China, seemed to compliment her hosts in saying, "Sometimes the justice is swifter than in France." The period between arrest and execution can be only weeks in China's repressive justice system, and she was criticized by human rights advocates and her political foes as naïve.

Since Mr. Sarkozy's trip last September to the United States, where he lavished praise on the country and was granted — at his request — a meeting and a photo session with President Bush, Mr. Sarkozy has sought to assure French voters that he will not bend to the will of America.

"I ask our American friends to let us be free, free to be their friends," he said Wednesday.

To underscore his independence from the United States, he cited his opposition to Turkey's entry into the 27-country European Union, which the Bush administration has strongly promoted.

"President Bush is very attached to the idea that Turkey become a member of the E.U.," Mr. Sarkozy said. "So you will judge my capacity for independence from the U.S. For me, it's no. Turkey is not meant to join the E.U., because Turkey is not a European country."

Ms. Royal has yet to devote an entire speech and news conference to foreign policy. Instead, she has found herself on the defensive for a number of offhand remarks in that field.

Last month, for example, she created a diplomatic firestorm when she shifted some of her positions along the way and suggested that she was sympathetic to independence for Quebec. Her comment was sharply criticized by Canada's prime minister, Stephen Harper, who said, "Experience teaches that it is highly inappropriate for a foreign leader to interfere in the democratic affairs of another country."

A few days later, a well-known French comedian and prankster, Gérald Dahan, trapped Ms. Royal by tape-recording a telephone call with her in which he feigned a Quebec accent and posed as the province's premier, Jean Charest. Mr. Dahan said Ms. Royal's comments on Quebec would be as damaging as if he were to support independence for the French Mediterranean island of Corsica.

"The French would not be against this, by the way," Ms. Royal responded in the recording, which was played on the radio. "Don't repeat that. It will create another incident in France. It's a secret."

Mr. Sarkozy pounced on her words, saying: "For me, Corsica is not a joke. It is the Republic."

Ms. Royal was also widely criticized during a trip to the Middle East in December in which she did not speak out when a Hezbollah member of the Lebanese Parliament compared Israel to Nazi Germany.

Mr. Sarkozy came under fire this week, not on foreign policy, but an issue much closer to home.

The satirical investigative weekly Le Canard Enchaîné reported in its current issue that Mr. Sarkozy had received close to $400,000 in rebates on the 1997 purchase and renovation of his apartment in Neuilly, an upscale Paris suburb, where he was mayor from 1983 to 2002.

The paper, citing local property transaction records, said Mr. Sarkozy had paid 12 to 35 percent less per square meter than his neighbors to Lasserre, the real estate development company that sold him the apartment and was granted a number of real estate permits in Neuilly over the years.

Mr. Sarkozy denied the allegation on Tuesday, adding that the regional tax department confirmed in 1997 that the purchase had been made at the market price.

Judge rejects request by Muslim charity

Greg Krikorian

Times Staff Writer

A federal judge in Dallas has denied a request to declassify thousands of pages of FBI evidence in the prosecution of a Muslim charity, but said it was disturbing that a recently unsealed document falsely accused charity officials of anti-Jewish slurs.

In his ruling against lawyers for the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, U.S. District Judge A. Joe Fish concluded there was insufficient evidence to show the inaccuracies were part of a "widespread problem" with the government's evidence.

At the same time, Fish advised defense lawyers to return to court if they found more government summaries that were "significantly inaccurate or misleading."

The now-defunct Muslim charity and seven former officials face criminal charges alleging financial ties to the Islamic militant group Hamas, which the U.S. considers a terrorist organization.

Fish, agreeing with the government, said there was no justification for a defense request to declassify about 10 years' worth of surveillance based on the apparent fabrications found in the government's April 15, 1996, surveillance summary.

The document claimed that two Holy Land officials now facing trial made anti-Jewish remarks. But their supposed comments are not in the transcripts.

The alleged remarks included one Holy Land official calling Israel "the government of the demons" and telling a colleague, "Even Jesus Christ had called the Jews and their high priests ... the sons of snakes and scorpions."

The judge said he found it disturbing that the government's summary included inflammatory language not found in the transcripts.

Defense lawyers and prosecutors had no comment Wednesday on the ruling.

In their motion, defense lawyers said they had recently received declassified summaries representing about 10% of the conversations recorded by the government in court-authorized surveillance. They worried that additional discrepancies could exist in the documents.

"During the limited period that [we have] had access to declassified transcripts, we have discovered other errors both technical and contextual," defense lawyers wrote in their motion.

They said additional errors included a document that was "summarized inaccurately" and misled them in assessing whether potential witnesses were likely to help or hurt the defense.

The Holy Land Foundation, once the nation's largest Muslim charity, was closed by the government five years ago. Its former officials are accused of providing money to overseas charities controlled by Hamas.

The defendants deny any links to terrorism or knowledge that charities they funded had ties to Hamas.

The defendants also noted that some of the overseas charities linked in the indictment to terrorists had been supported by numerous groups, including the U.S. Agency for International Development.

U.S. senators go to bat for Arar; Two powerful politicians ask for probe of why Canadian was sent to torture in Syria, and why he is still on no-fly list

Tim Harper - WASHINGTON BUREAU

WASHINGTON–Two powerful U.S. senators have asked the independent congressional watchdog to investigate ways that Maher Arar can have his name removed from an American terror watch list.

Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the Democratic chair of the Senate judiciary committee, and Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the ranking Republican on the committee, also released letters yesterday in which they request independent probes of the role of Homeland Security and the U.S. Justice Department in the 2002 rendition of Arar to Syria.

Leahy, a long-time critic of the Bush administration's role in the Arar affair, says he has never received a satisfactory answer why American authorities sent him to Syria to be tortured rather than to Canada where he could have been investigated.

Leahy and Specter received a 100-minute briefing from Justice officials on the Arar file last month, but both men said it raised more questions than it answered.

The two senators said they wanted the Government Accountability Office to follow its earlier probe that found numerous individuals who have been wrongly placed on various American watch lists.

The GAO study also found there were too many roadblocks to innocent travellers who seek to have their names removed from the lists. The GAO report sparked a promised overhaul by the government here.

The senators argue that Arar warrants a special investigation because a Canadian inquiry cleared him of any terror ties.

"We ask that you look at the redress available both to people wrongly targeted in the course of their travel as a result of mistakes related to the lists," they wrote, "as well as any recourse available to people like Mr. Arar who are purposely placed on watch lists, but for whom significant additional scrutiny has been conducted which may support a different conclusion."

The Canadian government, which apologized to Arar and awarded him $10 million in compensation, says it has seen the U.S. dossier on Arar and does not agree with Washington's decision to continue to bar him from travel here.

Last week in Ottawa, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice reiterated that Ottawa and Washington were simply going to have to agree to disagree on the Arar impasse.

In their letter seeking an independent probe of the Homeland Security role in the decision to send Arar to Syria where he was tortured, the two senators say a previous probe requested by another Democrat foundered because of the department's foot-dragging.

In a letter to Inspector-General Glenn Fine, who has carved out a reputation as a thorough investigator of Justice Department actions, they asked for more information on who in that department gave the approval to whisk Arar to Syria.

"We are interested in how the decision was made," they wrote, "whether there were errors in judgment or violations of law and if so by whom, and what steps have been taken to redress any such errors and violations and to avoid repeating them in the future."

Fine is credited with blowing the whistle on abusive treatment of innocent Americans who were detained in the wide sweep of suspected terrorists in New York following the 2001 terror attacks. He also recently revealed the Justice Department was overstating its terror-related arrests.

Key documents withheld in German CIA probe: lawmakers (Murat Kurnaz)

By Louis Charbonneau

BERLIN (Reuters) - German lawmakers investigating the case of a man held for nearly five years at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay said on Thursday an inquiry was being held up as some official documents were being withheld and others had been delayed.

The papers relate to Murat Kurnaz, a Turkish man born and living in Germany, who was freed without charge last summer and says he was tortured and abused at the U.S. prison camp on Cuba where he was taken in 2001 from Pakistan.

Siegfried Kauder, chairman of a parliament investigation committee, said he had requested the files from authorities in the northwestern city-state of Bremen and had been assured weeks ago that they were on their way.

"As of today, they have not arrived at the secretariat of the committee," the conservative politician said. "In this situation, sensible work by the committee is impossible."

According to German media, the files are reports from German domestic intelligence sources in Bremen alleging that Kurnaz had links to radical Islamists.

Questions over Kurnaz and over charges Berlin may have helped the CIA kidnap a German citizen of Lebanese origin, Khaled el-Masri, three years ago have haunted Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier for more than a year.

SECURITY RISK

German media have accused Steinmeier, who as Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder's chief of staff at the time had responsibility for intelligence matters, of rejecting a U.S. offer to send Kurnaz from Guantanamo back to Germany in 2002 due to worries that he would be a security risk.

Steinmeier denies the allegation.

Kauder said it was unclear why the files had not been delivered. He added that the files were in Berlin at Bremen's state representation office.

Other committee members offered various explanations for the withholding of the files, with one suggesting the interior ministry was trying to censor them and another blaming the incompetence of Bremen state authorities.

An interior ministry spokesman confirmed it had reviewed the files but denied censoring them in any way before handing them back to the Bremen representation office.

The spokesman said the ministry had determined that some files were classified and should not be given to the committee, while the rest could be passed on.

Bremen's representation office declined to comment.

Ernst Uhrlau, the head of Germany's BND foreign intelligence agency, and his predecessor August

Hanning had been scheduled to testify at the inquiry on Thursday.

But committee members decided to postpone the testimony until they receive the files, which Kauder said were essential if they were to be able to effectively question the men.

Katrina victims flood Corps of Engineers seeking compensation

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — Thousands of hurricane victims walked or drove to the Army Corps of Engineers office here today to file damage claims against the agency over the devastating flooding that occurred after Hurricane Katrina's storm surge overpowered levees 18 months ago.

Residents have rushed all week to beat tomorrow's deadline to sue the corps over allegations that its poor design and workmanship was to blame for the flooding of New Orleans and adjacent areas.

The avalanche of claims comes as a deadline for filing tort claims under maritime law comes to a close; the success of the new claims is staked to several pending lawsuits alleging the corps was to blame for the flooding.

Between Monday and the 4 p.m. C.S.T Thursday deadline, the corps expects about 30,000 people will have handed in the form, known as a Standard Form 95. In addition, the agency has already received about 30,000 claims by mail.

Joseph Bruno, a lawyer heading a team of lawyers suing the corps, says the eventual number will be higher than the corps estimates — at least 100,000.

The number of people who can file claims is enormous. For example, plaintiffs lawyers say people who were forced to evacuate, lost their jobs and business owners who had to shut down have legitimate claims. The allegations in the suits amount to blaming the corps for flooding an area where up to a half million people lived.

Supreme Court hears arguments in faith-based initiative case; The justices seem split on whether to allow a challenge to Bush's plan on 1st Amendment grounds

By David G. Savage
Times Staff Writer

WASHINGTON — In a closely watched church-state separation case, a Bush administration lawyer urged the Supreme Court on Wednesday to shield the president's "faith-based initiative" from legal challenges in court.

U.S. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement said taxpayers who believe the White House is unconstitutionally promoting religion should not be accorded legal standing to sue in court. It would be too "intrusive on the executive branch" to permit lawsuits contesting how the president and his advisors conduct their affairs, he said.

The Wisconsin-based Freedom From Religion Foundation sued in 2004 to challenge the faith-based initiative on 1st Amendment grounds. The group said the White House officials were using public money to help church-based groups win grants and contracts.

It is the first major religion case to come before the high court since President Bush's two appointees took their seats. In their questions Wednesday, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. sounded as though they sided with the administration.

Overall, the nine justices seemed split during the hourlong argument. If they adopt the administration's view, the ruling could make it harder for critics to sue officials who use public money in ways that support religion. If the justices rule in favor of the Freedom From Religion Foundation, the group would still have to prove its case in court.

Roberts made it clear that he thought the group's claims should be thrown out of court. If taxpayers can sue the government whenever an official invokes God or religion, why couldn't anyone "sue our marshal for standing up and saying, 'God save the United States and this honorable court'?" asked Roberts, citing the invocation the justices hear when entering the courtroom.

Justice Antonin Scalia appeared to agree. Otherwise, he said, taxpayers could sue the president for having spent tax money to promote religion simply because he flew across the country to give a speech to a religious group. "The whole trip is about religion," Scalia said, but he added that "it really doesn't make any sense" to permit lawsuits challenging this spending.

Taking up the opposite view, Justice Stephen G. Breyer said courts and lawsuits are needed to enforce the separation of church and state. "People become terribly upset when they see some other religion getting the money from the state" to subsidize their faith, he said.

"We have a pretty clear, simple rule," Breyer said, that allows lawsuits "when the government spends money in violation of the establishment clause." The 1st Amendment says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion."

The issue of who has standing is technical but crucial. It can determine when and whether the government's conduct can be challenged in court.

Normally, people must say they have suffered a personal injury of some sort before they can sue in court. For example, taxpayers cannot sue to stop the war in Iraq simply because they disagree with it.

But nearly 40 years ago, the court under then-Chief Justice Earl Warren made an exception for challenges to government spending that promoted religion. Taxpayers can sue if tax money is used to favor religion, the court said in Flast vs. Cohen.

In Wednesday's argument, Solicitor General Clement urged the court to narrow that exception considerably. In one exchange, he said taxpayers should not be allowed to sue even if officials used tax money to build a church.

The Bush administration said Freedom From Religion's suit should be thrown out on the grounds that the challengers did not have standing to sue in court. However, the U.S. appeals court in Chicago allowed the suit to go forward. In a 2 to 1 ruling, Judge Richard Posner said plaintiffs sought to show that the White House-sponsored meetings were "propaganda vehicles for religion."

But before the suit could be heard, the Supreme Court agreed to hear the administration's appeal filed on behalf of Jay Hein, who directs the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives.

Clement said the government should be shielded from suits over how officials use general tax money. He agreed taxpayers could sue if Congress passed a law that distributed money directly to churches or religious groups. But it is a different matter if the White House uses general funds to encourage religious groups to do charitable work, he argued.

A lawyer for the Wisconsin group said the administration's approach would "insulate from any taxpayer challenge really huge swaths of conduct.... The government could hire a corps of chaplains and send them out to the populace at large," said Washington lawyer Andrew J. Pincus.

In one key exchange, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy seemed to lean in favor of the administration's view. He said it would be "unduly obtrusive" to allow judges to challenge the president's handling of such programs. "We would be supervising the White House and what it can say, who it can talk to," Kennedy said in a disapproving tone.

A coalition of liberal groups filed a friend-of-the-court brief that urged the court to reject the administration's argument.

"Tax dollars may not be used to subsidize religious activity," said Steven Shapiro, legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union. "Barring taxpayers from enforcing this fundamental principle in court would effectively license the government to violate the Constitution."

However, Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the conservative American Center for Law and Justice, urged the court to go further than the administration suggested and overturn the Warren-era rule that allows taxpayers to sue in religion cases.

"The church-state separationists have been given a free pass ... to bring lawsuits," he said Wednesday, adding that the court should "remove the special privileges afforded to atheists and others who are antagonistic to religion."

The case, Hein vs. the Freedom From Religion Foundation, will be decided in several months.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Australian Detainee Is Charged Under '06 Law (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Pentagon officials announced yesterday that David M. Hicks, an Australian detainee in U.S. custody for more than five years, will face two counts of providing material support for terrorism, the first time anyone has been charged under the U.S. law passed last year governing military trials for some foreign terrorism suspects.

The case against Hicks marks the first use of rules established by the Military Commissions Act of 2006, enacted when Republicans controlled Congress and after the U.S. Supreme Court struck down earlier rules for the military trials.

Some Democrats, with their party now in control of Congress, have been outspoken about wanting to revamp the Military Commissions Act to provide suspects with more rights and to eliminate the use of evidence obtained through coercion. Sens. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) have introduced legislation that would restore the rights of detainees such as Hicks to challenge their detentions via habeas corpus petitions. A federal appeals court in Washington recently ruled that such challenges are prohibited.

The filing of charges could also prompt Hicks's attorneys to initiate a legal challenge of the law. Defense attorneys for a group of foreign nationals at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, including Hicks, have filed lawsuits stating that the law's provisions are unconstitutional, but they recently lost at the appellate level.

DOJ_NMG_0138702

The detainees' lawyers said they plan to file a petition Monday for an expedited Supreme Court hearing. Another Guantanamo detainee, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, filed a petition with the Supreme Court this week alleging that the Military Commissions Act is unconstitutional.

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), who has long supported the Military Commissions Act, said yesterday that he believes that Hicks will receive a fair trial and that if he is found guilty, the U.S. judicial system will properly review the commissions process as part of an automatic appeal.

"After four years of starts and stops, I am pleased to see this trial is going forward," Graham said. "Mr. Hicks deserves his day in court."

A defense official familiar with the military commissions said yesterday that the department expects legal challenges but will go ahead with a mandated arraignment of Hicks within 30 days.

Australian officials have protested the length of Hicks's captivity without trial and have been pressing the United States to try him swiftly and send him back to Australia to serve any sentence. Prime Minister John Howard said he raised the issue with Vice President Cheney when Cheney visited Australia last week.

U.S. officials said last year that they would be willing to transfer Hicks to Australia after he faces a military commission, and the entreaties by a close ally could have spurred U.S. officials to move his case forward.

Hicks, 31, a former kangaroo skinner, is among 10 Guantanamo detainees who were designated to face military commissions in 2004, before legal challenges stopped the process. He is not accused of crimes related to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States or of having attacked U.S. troops or anyone else.

"The first thing out of the chute has nothing to do with 9/11, and I think that raises a lot of questions," said Jumana Musa of Amnesty International. "Is this a practice military commission?"

Susan J. Crawford, the convening authority for the military commissions, referred two charges of providing support to terrorist groups against Hicks but did not find probable cause for a charge of attempted murder levied against him by military prosecutors.

According to charging documents, Hicks spent 1999 through 2001 working and training with extremist groups in the Balkans, Pakistan and Afghanistan before joining up with al-Qaeda. Military prosecutors wrote that Hicks provided information to his captors that linked him to conversations with Osama bin Laden and to several training camps in Afghanistan.

Hicks allegedly "collected intelligence on the American Embassy" in Kabul in 2001, and after the Sept. 11 attacks he went to Kandahar, Afghanistan, where he received an AK-47 rifle and guarded a tank as U.S. forces began their bombing campaign, according to charging documents.

Military prosecutors allege that Hicks later traveled to Kunduz, Afghanistan, and joined al-Qaeda, the Taliban and others "on the frontline outside the city for two hours" before trying to escape to Pakistan in a taxi.

Also yesterday, officials transferred five more detainees out of the Guantanamo Bay detention facility, sending two to Afghanistan and three to Tajikistan. That raises the total released or transferred to about 390. Another 385 remain.

U.S. Charges Australian Detainee With Supporting Terrorism (MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg

McClatchy Newspapers, March 1, 2007

The Pentagon on Thursday formally accused an Australian citizen being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, with a single charge of providing material support for terrorism, setting the stage for the first military trial of a terrorism suspect under legislation that Congress passed last year.

The charge alleges that David Hicks, 31, a onetime Outback cowboy and kangaroo skinner, was in league with al-Qaida at the time of the U.S. invasion in 2001, had met with al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden and had joined Taliban and al-Qaida supporters who were fighting U.S.-allied forces outside Kunduz, Afghanistan, during combat Nov. 9, 2001.

Hicks fled the fighting with bullets flying overhead as U.S.-allied tanks roared through trenches, the charges claim, and was captured as he was attempting to flee to Pakistan.

DOJ_NMG_0138703

Under new procedures, which Congress approved after the Supreme Court ruled that an earlier Pentagon trial scheme was illegal, Hicks must be arraigned within 30 days. His trial must be within 90 days after that, meaning his case will go before a military commission by July.

It would be the first U.S. war-crimes trial since World War II.

The decision to charge Hicks only with supporting al-Qaida was something of a surprise. Prosecutors initially also had charged him with attempted murder, alleging that he had directed "small arms fire, explosives or other means and methods with the intent to kill diverse persons."

But that charge was crossed out on the official charge sheet by Susan J. Crawford, a former chief of the military appeals-court system whom Defense Secretary Robert Gates recently put in charge of the commission's process.

The Pentagon offered no explanation why the charge was dropped, merely releasing the original charge sheets with a bold pen stroke across the attempted murder section, accompanied by Crawford's handwritten initials and Thursday's date.

Hicks' defense attorney, Marine Maj. Dan Mori, slammed the prosecution, charging that Hicks had been held for five years at Guantanamo on "made-up offenses."

"David has been charged with only one offense: material support of terrorism," Mori said. "Such a charge has never existed in the laws of war."

Other international law experts also questioned the charge.

"If he's not in a foreign army, not in a uniform, simply a guy who has shown up with an AK-47 and starts taking potshots at us, he's not a foreign combatant. He's a common criminal. You don't try him in a military commission," said Michael Byers, a professor of international law at the University of British Columbia in Canada.

Byers, who has taught at law schools in the United States, Israel and South Africa, said the Bush administration sought to create a third kind of justice for alleged al-Qaida terrorists that didn't exist under international law or existing U.S. military or civilian law.

"If you were a prisoner of war who had violated the laws of war, then you could be charged with a war crime," he said. "And if you were a civilian who had attempted to kill someone you could be charged with murder; and this middle category simply didn't exist."

Hicks is among the best-known captives at the remote U.S. Navy base in southeast Cuba, in part because his five-year detention without trial has stirred controversy in human rights circles in his homeland, a staunch war-on-terrorism ally of the Bush administration.

The eight-page charge sheet casts him as an illegitimate warrior trying to repel the 2001 U.S. invasion that toppled the Taliban and routed al-Qaida in reprisal for the 9-11 attacks.

It describes the Christian-born Hicks as a globe-trotting convert to Islam who fought as a member of the Kosovo Liberation Army in the Balkans before traveling to Pakistan in 1999, where he joined a terrorist organization known as the Army of the Righteous or Army of the Pure.

It says he traveled to Afghanistan in 2001, where he attended al-Qaida training camps, stayed in a residence that also housed shoe-bomber Richard Reid and met al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden, to whom he complained about a lack of English-language training materials.

At one point during the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan, the charge sheet alleges, Hicks was issued an AK-47 rifle and he guarded a tank.

Later, near Kunduz, he allegedly spent two hours on the front line before it collapsed and was forced to flee. During the retreat, Hicks saw "bullets flying and (U.S. ally) Northern Alliance tanks coming over the trenches." Also present at that battle was American John Walker Lindh, who's now in a U.S. prison.

Hicks has been at remote Guantanamo since the prison camp was established in January 2002, in a crude compound called Camp X-Ray.

The chief prosecutor, Air Force Col. Morris Davis, last month recommended charges against three captives: Hicks, Canadian Omar Khadr, 20, and Yemeni Salim Hamdan, 36, bin Laden's onetime driver in Kandahar, Afghanistan.

It was Hamdan's Navy defense lawyer who successfully challenged the first war-crimes court format all the way to the Supreme Court.

U.S. Files Charges Against Australian Citizen (AP)

By Anne Flaherty, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 2, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The United States has filed charges against David Hicks, an Australian citizen suspected of aiding the Taliban in Afghanistan and the first terrorism-war era detainee to be charged by the Defense Department under new rules for military commissions.

The decision was made even though officials of Australia already had asked the United States not to bring such charges. Australia has been a steadfast ally to the Bush administration in fighting terrorism.

Hicks is a former kangaroo skinner captured in Afghanistan in December 2001. He has been held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for more than five years without trial.

According to government officials and documents, the Defense Department will announce that Hicks is being charged with "providing material support for terrorism." Hicks would be have a trial in a special military tribunal, established in a law that Congress passed last year, rather than a civilian court. Opponents have vowed to challenge the constitutionality of the military tribunal proceedings.

An earlier formulation of such military tribunals was declared unconstitutional last year by the Supreme Court.

Hicks' legal status has been a sore spot for Australia. Last month, nearly half the members of Australia's Parliament signed a letter to the U.S. Congress appealing for help repatriating him.

The topic was also discussed this month in a meeting between Vice President Dick Cheney and Australian Prime Minister John Howard. Under growing public pressure, and with elections due later this year, Howard has begun pushing U.S. officials to deal with Hicks' case more quickly.

Last year, the Supreme Court said that the court system in place at the time for these detainees was illegal and violated international agreements on the treatment of military prisoners.

In the fall, Congress passed a law that outlined the rules for trying terrorism suspects; the system is intended to protect classified information and provides detainees with fewer rights than civilian or military courts.

According to a Pentagon official, who asked not to be identified because the announcement had not been made, the military is expected to file charges soon against another nine detainees.

Once formal charges are filed, a timetable requires preliminary hearings within 30 days and the start of a jury trial within 120 days at Guantanamo Bay, where nearly 400 men are held on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Acknowledges Gulf Coast Troubles (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, March 2, 2007

President Bush on Thursday acknowledged the deep frustration of Hurricane Katrina victims and said the federal government shares the blame for the slow recovery of the Gulf Coast.

He gave residents of the battered region a message: "The federal government still knows you exist."

In stops across coastal Mississippi and Louisiana, Bush defended the federal allotment of $110 billion in relief aid. Of that total, less than half has been spent.

"If it is stuck because of unnecessary bureaucracy, our responsibility at the federal, state and local level is to unstick it," Bush said at Samuel J. Green Charter School, which recovered from flooding.

In his first visit to the region in six months, Bush sought to fight the perception that those whose lives were devastated by the August 2005 storm had fallen off his agenda.

DOJ_NMG_0138705

The Bush administration's initial response to the most destructive natural disaster in U.S. history was widely seen as a failure.

And the president is still dogged by criticism. Democratic lawmakers are pushing for more action.

"I committed to the people of this part of the world and the Gulf Coast that the federal government would fund recovery — and stay committed to the recovery," Bush said during his 14th trip to the region. It was his first visit since the one-year anniversary of the storm.

Much of New Orleans outside the tourist areas remains in shambles. Violent crime has soared and health care is limited. Many residents are thinking of getting out for good.

On the outskirts of the French Quarter, Bush had lunch at Li'l Dizzy's Cafe with Louisiana officials. Sitting next to him was New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, who has been outspoken in demanding a better federal response. Bush later lauded Nagin as a strong-willed leader.

Exasperated officials from the region said it was telling that Katrina did not get a mention in Bush's State of the Union speech in January.

"If you don't get New Orleans straight, the United States will never be the same," said Wayne Baquet, who owns the cafe where Bush ate. It was flooded and looted during Katrina.

Baquet said he worried the nation no longer was paying attention to New Orleans. "Everybody ought to be on the bandwagon trying to get New Orleans back," he said. "Everybody."

In Washington, some Democrats criticized Bush for not intervening more often.

"Long-term recovery for the Gulf Coast requires a whole lot more than 18 months of empty promises," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., chairman of the Senate Small Business and Entrepreneurship Committee. "Businesses that were once the heart of the Gulf Coast economy are now hanging on by a thread."

Kerry said legislation offering tax breaks to encourage businesses to build or expand in areas hit by hurricane was a good first step. But, he said, the government's disaster loan program needs to be overhauled, fixing problems that have prevented businesses from getting timely financial assistance.

At the charter school, Bush delighted math and science students by popping into their classes. They didn't mind the interruption and raced to his side for group photos.

Bush began his trip in Mississippi by touring five homes in a Long Beach neighborhood. He gave an American flag to Ernie and Cheryl Woodward, who rebuilt their home with the help of a federal grant.

"People's lives are improving, and there is hope," he said.

Bush got a friendly reception as he walked from house to house in the southern Mississippi neighborhood.

"Staying busy?" he asked a construction crew. One of the workers told him the crew was still working on the same block of the neighborhood a year and a half after the storm.

The federal official overseeing recovery efforts said Katrina's damage was so vast that it was hard to estimate when the recovery will be completed. Of $110 billion in relief aid that Congress has approved, $86 billion has been committed to projects, and $53 billion has been spent.

"We all have a sense of urgency," Don Powell, Bush's coordinator for the Gulf Coast recovery, told reporters on Air Force One.

"But I think it's important to put it in perspective about the size of the storm, and how overwhelming this storm was," Powell said. "I think there's been some good progress."

Bush Notes Frustration In Gulf Coast Recovery (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, March 1 — President Bush acknowledged on Thursday that many Gulf Coast residents remained frustrated with the slowness of rebuilding after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, but said, “Times are changing for the better.”

DOJ_NMG_0138706

On a trip inspecting new housing rising from the rubble in Mississippi and Louisiana, Mr. Bush visited homeowners, met local officials and promised to speed the recovery of areas flooded 18 months ago by the hurricanes.

It was Mr. Bush's 14th trip to the Gulf Coast since Hurricane Katrina made landfall on Aug. 29, 2005.

At his first stop in New Orleans, Mr. Bush had lunch with state and local officials at Li'l Dizzy's Café on the outskirts of the French Quarter. In brief remarks before the meal, Mr. Bush noted concerns about the rebuilding delays.

"I fully understand that there are frustrations, and I want to know the frustrations," he said. "To the extent we can help, we'll help."

Earlier in Long Beach, Miss., near Gulfport and Biloxi, Mr. Bush joined Gov. Haley Barbour in a walking tour of houses that had been rebuilt with help from the federal government under the Community Development Block Grant program.

Though some members of Congress from both parties have said the federal government should do more to accelerate the recovery, Mr. Bush said he was impressed and inspired by the progress he saw.

But at a meeting with local officials in Biloxi, he said: "I fully understand that there's still work to be done. There's a continued frustration with the slowness of federal response at times."

Wayne M. Baquet, owner of Li'l Dizzy's restaurant, said: "It's great that the president came to New Orleans. It's great that he's addressing the problems here. We may have 10,000 people living in trailers. That's ridiculous."

Business is good, said Mr. Baquet, brother of Dean Baquet, who was recently named Washington bureau chief of The New York Times.

"We need the middle class back," Mr. Baquet said. "We lost a lot of our middle class."

On his first visit after the storm in 2005, the president recalled, he saw "piles of rubble, literally debris stacked upon debris."

Mr. Bush said he had always had faith that he would see houses being built on the storm-battered coast.

"The federal government's role has been to write checks," he said, and the role of state officials is "to expedite the federal money to the local folks."

Mr. Bush said: "I told the people that I would work with Congress to write a $110 billion check for the people of Louisiana and Mississippi, and that check has been written. Now it's incumbent upon us to get the money into people's hands."

State and local officials, particularly in Louisiana, have been criticized for not transferring federal rebuilding money into the hands of homeowners more quickly.

Sometimes, Mr. Bush said, "it's hard to see progress when you're living close to the scene." But as a visitor, he said, he detects a resurgence, a renewal, because "the spirit of the people down here is strong."

Mississippians said their recovery had been hindered by the high cost of insurance for residential and commercial structures and by the need to raise buildings onto piers or stilts to comply with federal construction standards in flood zones.

Some elected officials saw Mr. Bush's trip as an effort to make amends for the fact that he said nothing about the recovery in his State of the Union address on Jan. 23.

"It was a glaring omission," said Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, who stayed in Washington for Senate business. "Much of the vast devastation left by Katrina and Rita remains, and the job of recovery is far from finished."

One purpose of the trip, Mr. Bush said, was "to tell the people here in the Gulf Coast that we still think about them in Washington." Another purpose, he said, was to show taxpayers "what their money has done to help revitalize" the region.

Nellie Partridge, 84, was sitting on her porch in Long Beach when Mr. Bush arrived. "There's no telling who's going to show up," Mr. Bush said as he arrived with Mr. Barbour.

Ms. Partridge hugged the president and told him that he was "one of my favorite people."

Mr. Bush said Washington had "obligated," or made available for specific purposes, $86 billion of the $110 billion but that just $53 billion had been spent.

"There is money in the pipeline," Mr. Bush said. "If it is stuck because of unnecessary bureaucracies, our responsibility at the federal, state and local level is to unstick it."

Donald E. Powell, the federal coordinator of Gulf Coast rebuilding, was asked about the pace. "We all have a sense of urgency," Mr. Powell said. He noted progress like children in school, "help wanted" signs and open hotels and restaurants.

On Visit To Gulf Coast, Bush Hears Frustrations About Pace Of Storm Aid (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, March 1 -- In his first visit to the Gulf Coast in six months, President Bush said Thursday that he heard "loud and clear" the growing complaints in the region that the federal response to Hurricane Katrina has become ensnared in red tape.

But in a trip designed to highlight the progress made in the 18 months since the hurricane devastated New Orleans and the Mississippi coast, the president insisted that "people's lives are improving and there is hope."

As billions of federal dollars have sat in state accounts untapped in part because of complex federal rules, Louisiana officials in particular have become vocal about what they called the Bush administration's wavering interest in the rebuilding process. The frustration came to a boil when Bush did not mention Katrina during his State of the Union address, prompting Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) to observe that the "the pains of the hurricane are yesterday's news in Washington."

After a meeting with state and local officials in Biloxi, Miss., Thursday, Bush said he had listened as the officials described their "continued frustration with the slowness of federal response at times. It's important for me to hear that."

In Washington, House Democrats renewed their own criticism of the administration. They promised to move legislation -- which has not been endorsed by Bush -- to forgive some federal loans to disaster-wracked communities while easing matching fund requirements tied to some federal aid.

"Hurricane Katrina was a natural disaster, compounded by a man-made disaster. It is now 18 months past time to get our response right," said a statement signed by Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (Md.) and Majority Whip James E. Clyburn (S.C.).

Bush's trip, his 14th since Katrina, was a continuation of his attempts to undo the political damage caused by the storm, which proved to be a pivotal event in his presidency. The federal government's bungled response to the disaster undermined the administration's claim to competence and helped propel Bush's approval ratings downward.

In the days after Katrina hit, thousands of residents in New Orleans were forced to rooftops and to fetid, ill-equipped shelters to escape the rising floodwaters, even as federal disaster officials insisted things were under control.

A little more than two weeks after Katrina made its landfall on Aug. 29, 2005, Bush stood in historic Jackson Square and promised to rebuild this shattered city and the rest of the Gulf Coast with "one of the largest reconstruction efforts the world has ever seen."

Things have since moved at a frustratingly slow pace -- particularly in the New Orleans area -- despite $110 billion in federal money set aside for storm recovery and the president's repeated visits.

The federal government has overseen the repair of 220 miles of levees and floodwalls, and is working to make the storm-protection system stronger than it was before Katrina, a project that should be completed in 2010.

However, only 45 percent of the pre-Katrina population of New Orleans has returned to the city, which, while slowly improving, remains a shadow of its former self: only 40 percent of the food establishments, 30 percent of the child care centers and 17 percent of the buses are back in business, according to a January report by the Brookings Institution. The Louisiana-run Road Home program, which provides rebuilding grants to homeowners who had inadequate storm insurance, has sent checks to 2,718 hurricane victims as of Wednesday, despite having received more than 110,000 applications and having federal funding of more than $7.5 billion in the bank.

Officials said the pace of the program is now increasing. "We are seeing at the pinnacle of the program where things are now starting to happen more quickly," said Gentry Brann, communications director for ICF International, the Virginia-based firm hired to administer the program.

Local residents have also complained about a shortage of low-income housing, as the Bush administration has been reluctant to rebuild the city's decrepit and previously crime-ridden public housing projects, instead favoring lower-density, mixed-income housing.

DOJ_NMG_0138708

Before meeting with Louisiana officials at a New Orleans restaurant today, Bush again vowed to see through the rebuilding of the Gulf Coast until the job is done. "I committed to the people of this part of the world and the Gulf Coast that the federal government would fund the recovery and stay committed to the recovery," he said.

Federal and state officials have blamed one another for the problems with the crucial program. Federal officials point out that it was set up by the state and that the federal money is in place to be given to storm victims. State and program officials, meanwhile, blame complex federal regulations aimed at preventing fraud for much of the delay.

"It needs to speed up. Things are moving too slow," said Donald E. Powell, the president's Gulf Coast recovery coordinator. Still, given the sheer size of the recovery effort, he said, "expectations need to be realistic. This was a terrible, terrible storm. It is going to take some time."

Bush Checks In On Gulf Coast, Hears His Critics 'Loud And Clear' (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

NEW ORLEANS — Stung by criticism that he and his administration had neglected the hurricane-tattered Gulf Coast, President Bush on Thursday made his first visit to the region in six months, proclaiming, "This is a hopeful day."

Bush, standing in a muddy lot near new homes in Long Beach, Miss., said: "Part of the reason I've come down is to tell people here in the Gulf Coast that we still think about them in Washington…. Times are changing for the better, and people's lives are improving. And there is hope."

In the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, which hit Aug. 29, 2005, the administration was criticized for its slow response. Reports issued by Congress, interest groups and even the White House said delays hindered rescue and recovery efforts in New Orleans and elsewhere on the Gulf Coast.

In January, Bush was criticized for not mentioning the devastation in his State of the Union address.

House Democratic leaders said in a statement ahead of Bush's Gulf Coast visit: "Hurricane Katrina was a natural disaster, compounded by a man-made disaster. It is now 18 months past time to get our response right."

Administration officials said the criticism was misdirected.

"I think there's been lots of progress over the last 18 months," said Don Powell, the administration's Gulf Coast recovery coordinator. "Children are in school. 'Help wanted' signs are up. The port is 100% back. Restaurants are open."

He added: "Is there more to be done? Absolutely."

Bush has made 14 trips to the region since the hurricane. Most were in the first two months after the disaster, in which damage estimates reached $100 billion or more. He last visited the area in August, to mark the storm's anniversary.

On Thursday, Bush made four stops in Mississippi and Louisiana. At the Samuel J. Green Charter School in New Orleans, he visited third- and fifth-grade students and posed for photos.

He called the school "a bright spot," a sign that life was returning to normal in the city.

"I'm here to herald success — success for today and, equally important, success for the future of this important city," Bush told a crowd in the cafeteria, where the high-water mark from flooding was visible on the walls.

Administration officials said more than 50 of New Orleans' public schools had reopened, serving about 28,000 students.

Critics said that was fewer than half of the 128 schools and 60,000-plus students in the city's two public school systems before Hurricane Katrina.

Gaining access to the $110 billion in federal money set aside for hurricane relief and recovery is a persistent point of tension between the administration and regional officials. Powell said $53 billion had been spent so far.

He said that it was the responsibility of local officials to "draw down" the funds earmarked for them, and that the administration was committed to removing any red tape.

"We're doing everything we can to speed that process," Powell said.

But Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.) said the administration had refused to remove a requirement that local governments provide a 10% match to receive federal funds — a figure seen as prohibitive for communities whose tax base was wiped out.

DOJ_NMG_0138709

At a news conference in Washington, Landrieu said the 10% requirement had been waived for other disasters, including Hurricane Andrew in Florida in 1992 and the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in New York.

"The president can move the recovery of the Gulf Coast forward by a giant leap with a simple stroke of his pen," said Landrieu, who turned down an invitation to accompany Bush on Thursday. "I call upon the president to use his authority to do the right thing…. If he won't, I will push hard to get it done legislatively."

Bush pledged to officials on the Gulf Coast that Washington was listening and would respond.

"One of the things I've heard loud and clear is that there's a continued frustration with the slowness of federal response at times," Bush said after meeting with officials in Biloxi, Miss.

Later, over lunch at Li'l Dizzy's, a New Orleans cafe that was flooded and looted after the storm, he told New Orleans officials that he would look into the possibility of waiving the 10% match for recovery assistance.

Bush Renews Commitment To Helping Recovery (TP)

By Steve Ritea

The Times Picayune, March 2, 2007

Standing in the once-flooded basement of one of New Orleans' 31 charter schools, President Bush on Thursday reiterated his commitment to help the storm-ravaged city rebuild and "break through" bureaucratic "logjams" to allow more of the federally dedicated $110 billion can begin flowing into the Gulf Coast.

With only $53 billion spent thus far, "part of the day today we talked about if the money is out the door in Washington, where is it and how come it hasn't been out farther?" he said. "And that's one of the things we're going to continue to work on, to make sure that obligated money ends up in somebody's pocket, so it helps."

In his 12th visit to the Gulf Coast since the 2005 hurricanes, Bush also took time to herald the city's innovative approach to reforming its long-failing public school system, particularly with its use of charters, public schools subject to state standards and oversight, but governed by individual boards that are given the freedom to take innovate approaches to education.

"Charter schools, to me, say innovation, individuality," he said. Even though Hurricane Katrina "did terrible devastation ... it gave a great chance for renewal. And one of the areas where renewal is most evident is in the school system of New Orleans."

Bush did not announce any plans to waive a state and local match currently required for federal aid, despite a prediction from several Louisiana officials that he would.

After spending the morning in coastal Mississippi, Air Force One touched down at Armstrong International Airport in Kenner at approximately 12:30 p.m., after wind and rain forced his staff to abandon their original plan to fly him one state over by helicopter. The president stayed in New Orleans until about 5 p.m.

The presidential motorcade closed off Interstate 10, snaking into the city's Treme neighborhood and Lil' Dizzy's Cafe, where he and a host of local dignitaries lunch on Trout Baquet, Shrimp Grillades with Grits and the Seventh Ward Pork Chop.

Bush was joined by parish presidents from across the region, Mayor Ray Nagin, Sen. David Vitter, Rep. Bill Jefferson and Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu, among others. Gov. Kathleen Blanco was returning from Germany, where she had been lobbying for a steel manufacturing plant in Louisiana.

"I fully understand that there are frustrations, and I want to know the frustrations," Bush said after sitting down at a table there. "To the extent we can help, we'll help."

City Council President Oliver Thomas, who attended the lunch, said the president "was more than receptive ... He was on point with all the issues we're dealing with."

Vitter said he and other officials spent part of the meal lobbying Bush to waive state and local matches currently required for federal aid money.

Historically, FEMA has asked state governments to pay at least 10 percent of the cost of rebuilding most public property, in an effort to establish a local stake in recovery, although the Bush administration immediately agreed to waive that requirement in New York after the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks.

Vitter said he's encouraged by Thursday's meeting with the President and hopes it could soon be waived for Louisiana, noting: "I think between the president and Congress, there's an excellent chance."

Nagin agreed, but was slightly less optimistic.

"I think they're seriously considering it," the mayor said. "He didn't make any commitments, but he's a good listener and hopefully it'll work out in the end."

After lunch, the president arrived at Samuel J. Green Charter School in Uptown, a block away from a group of fewer than 100 protesters waiving anti-Bush signs. At the school, he visited a fifth-grade math class and a third-grade science class. Bush complimented students on their "sharp-looking uniforms," consisting of navy polo shirts and trousers, and posed for pictures with students.

In both cases, the throng of reporters and photographers classrooms outnumbered the students.

Speaking before an audience of mostly education officials in the school's cafeteria, Bush said he'd "come back to New Orleans...to remind people that the federal government still knows you exist, still knows you have issues and wants to work with your leadership to address those issues."

The president's speech touched briefly on housing, infrastructure and crime, although the latter "really is a local responsibility," but "to the extent that we can help, we will."

Bush also promised to make the levees that failed during Katrina "stronger than ever," noting "we're making progress there," but "there's still more work to be done."

A good chunk of his speech, however, focused on education.

Bush remained upbeat on the subject, pointing out successes he perceived in the city's charter schools, but made no reference to the struggles in the state-run Recovery District, which has grappled with a lack of basic supplies, including books, at the start of the year and more recently a wait-list that stalled some 300 students for several weeks before they could be placed in classrooms.

Bush in fact recognized Recovery District Superintendent Robin Jarvis and Gaylen Picard, the wife of former state Superintendent of Education Cecil Picard, who died Feb. 15 after a long battle with Lou Gehrig's Disease.

A little more than two months after Katrina, the state Legislature voted to sweep 107 New Orleans Public Schools that were performing below the state average into the state-run Recovery District, leaving just 21 with the local system.

Today, 56 public schools are open in the city, educating about 28,000 students.

"I like a system that is willing to challenge the status quo when the status quo is failing," he said. "And one of the reasons I've come to this school is that it represents a group of citizens, including your principal and your parents and the teachers and the citizens, who said, 'We're tired of mediocrity in the school system.' It is not acceptable to have children trapped in schools that will not teach and will not change."

The President referred to about $450 million in federal funding allocated for city schools, urging local officials "to use some of the unspent money to recruit and attract teachers."

He praised Louisiana's accountability program, a component that dovetails with the federal No Child Left Behind program his administration helped pass.

Bush also acknowledged the city's Catholic schools, which "were quick to start up after the storm."

In closing, the President likened the city's spirit to the banner season of the New Orleans Saints, which advanced to the conference championship in the team's history this past season.

"Here's a team that a lot of people didn't give much hope for ... when the season started," he said. "And it rose...(to) become a national story ... The same thing is going to happen to the city."

Bush Visits New Orleans' Charter School (AP)

By Becky Bohrer

AP, March 2, 2007

NEW ORLEANS - Calling it a bright spot in a city still going through difficult times 18 months after Hurricane Katrina, President Bush visited one of the city's 31 charter schools during a trip to New Orleans, praising local efforts to change a school system that was struggling even before the storm.

DOJ_NMG_0138711

"I like a system that is willing to challenge the status quo when the status quo is failing," Bush told a receptive audience of about 150 people, including education and elected officials, at Samuel J. Green Charter School.

"I'm here to herald success," Bush said.

Critics, including teachers' union leaders, believe charters are not the way to go, saying the charter model is unproven for providing solid academic results and has created a two-tier public education system here. Advocates counter that charters, which are privately run but receive public dollars, offer parents choice, are built around accountability and are in New Orleans to stay.

Before Katrina, there were more than 120 schools in the city's public school system, which was plagued by low student test scores, neglected buildings and financial mismanagement. The state took over a handful of schools it deemed "academically unacceptable." But, after Katrina flooded 80 percent of New Orleans and shut down the city, including all schools, the state accelerated the takeover.

Now, 56 schools are open. The local school board still runs five of the best-performing schools. Twenty are run by the state and 31 by private charter groups sanctioned by state or local school authorities.

New Orleans is set to add nine charter schools for the 2007-08 term, bringing the total to 40. The city had seven charter schools authorized by the state before Katrina, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Education said.

Darryl Kilbert, superintendent of public schools in New Orleans, said Thursday he is not opposed to any education system that offers parents' choice. But, he said traditional public schools and charters should have equal accountability requirements and responsibilities. "It is too new for anything to be evaluated," Kilbert said of the charter system.

Bush's dedication to charter schools has been evident since Katrina. Charter schools in Louisiana received about $45 million from two grants given by the Bush's Department of Education after the 2005 hurricanes, to help schools reopen, and quickly, as charters, a department spokeswoman said Thursday. Most of the money from each grant went to New Orleans, she said.

On Thursday, Bush, who had earlier met with state and local officials to discuss the rate of recovery and storm-related bureaucracy, praised Green Charter School as a sign of what's working in the city. The school opened days before Katrina hit in 2005, and reopened five months later, its auditorium painted blue and green to represent the devastating floodwaters and hope for the future, principal Tony Recasner said. It now has about 350 students in grades K-8.

While charter school advocates hailed Bush's visit as a vote of confidence in the city's still-new charter system, union leader Brenda Mitchell saw it as an attack on public education and the continuation of what she described as a failed federal response to helping New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina.

"It's not fine here. You shouldn't pit one against the other and shouldn't come in and glorify one over the other," she said. "There isn't evidence."

A federal study released last year found fourth graders in traditional schools did better in math and reading than students in charters though a federal Education Department official at the time downplayed it as a snapshot.

Mitchell said charters have seemingly created a competition between schools and parents trying to enroll their kids in classes.

Meg Casper, a spokeswoman at the state Department of Education, said charters must pass a "rigorous" screening process and deliver results. But she said this year will be considered a baseline for student testing in all the city's public schools. Testing is set to take place in the next few weeks.

City schools, particularly those run by the state's Recovery School District, have faced significant challenges over the last year, in trying to reopen safe schools for students who continue to register for classes and in hiring enough teachers. RSD says it continues to register up to 300 students a week.

RSD, which unlike the locally-run schools and some charters, has an open enrollment policy. It it looking at opening several more schools this term and says it could open at least a dozen more schools come fall.

Bush urged local officials to put some of the federal education aid they've received toward recruiting teachers. House Democrats, including U.S. Reps. Charlie Melancon and William Jefferson of Louisiana, have signed onto legislation to provide about $250 million over five years to help bring teachers to New Orleans and help Gulf Coast colleges and universities recover from Katrina.

Bush Leaves Coast (BSH)

By Tom Wilemon

Biloxi Sun Herald, March 2, 2007

BILOXI - Air Force One departed the Mississippi Coast at 12:24 p.m. as President Bush headed to New Orleans following visits with residents of a Long Beach neighborhood and a meeting with elected officials in Biloxi.

" I fully understand there's still work to be done, that even though progress has been made, this storm was so devastating that we have still got to stay focused on the task, and that we've got to work with the Governor and the local officials, the supervisors and the mayors, to continue to help address their needs," Bush said after the meeting with elected officials at Biloxi City Hall. "And of the things I've heard loud and clear is that there's a continued frustration with the slowness of federal response at times. And therefore, it's important for me to hear that, and my friend, Don Powell, to hear that so that we can come and do what the people expect us to do, which is to respond to the needs of people in Mississippi."

Earlier, the President visited with people in a Long Beach neighborhood who have rebuilt or are rebuilding their homes with federal grant and loan money. Bush said he had come to the Coast to let people know Washington had not forgotten about them and for the U.S. taxpayers to see what their tax money had done to help areas that had been virtually wiped out.

"My most vivid recollection is the piles of rubble, literally debris stacked upon piles of debris," Bush said. "I had faith that I would come back to a house but I had trouble visualizing it."

He visited several homes in the area.

"One of the things people like to say is, 'Welcome to my home,'" he said. "It has a special ring to it here on the Gulf Coast."

It was the President's 14th visit to the Coast since the hurricane. Biloxi Mayor A.J. Holloway gave Bush a gag gift of appreciation: a personalized car tag that read "Bush 43."

"You've been to the Katrina zone 14 times in 18 months," Holloway said. "It's not that we don't like seeing you, but you've been here so many times. It's about time you had one of these. Don't leave home without it."

For more on the President's visit, check back at sunherald.com throughout the day and read the Sun Herald on Friday.

Gulf Coast's Halting Recovery Leaves Much To Be Done (USAT)

USA Today, March 2, 2007

In his first trip to the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast in six months, President Bush told residents Thursday he understood their frustrations with the glacial pace of recovery since Hurricane Katrina. What the president doesn't seem to grasp is how much his administration can do to ease that frustration.

Bush has committed $86 billion to the devastated area and visited 14 times since Katrina. Certainly there has been progress, and Bush visited some symbols of that Thursday — the rebuilt home of 84-year-old Nellie Partridge in Long Beach, Miss., and the Samuel J. Green charter school in New Orleans.

But throughout the region, and particularly in New Orleans, the lingering devastation is massive. Just about half of New Orleans' pre-Katrina population of 455,000 hasn't returned; as many as a third of residents are thinking of leaving within the next two years, according to a University of New Orleans survey. Of the nearly 109,000 Louisiana homeowners who have applied for rebuilding grants, fewer than 2,700 have received them. In Mississippi, homeowners are facing an insurance crisis that makes recovery nearly impossible.

Much of this is a state or local responsibility. But there's more Washington can do, beyond writing checks and rebuilding the Army Corps of Engineers' levees that failed:

•Louisiana has asked the federal government to waive a requirement that local governments put up 10% of the cost of rebuilding public projects. While the requirement is reasonable, many localities are broke, according to the Louisiana Recovery Authority. Further, the 10% mandate has turned the process into a bureaucratic quagmire. Bush could quickly waive it, or at least work with local officials on a backup plan they've advanced to cut through the red tape.

DOJ_NMG_0138713

•The Federal Emergency Management Agency, slow to respond to Katrina in the first place, has been slow to produce new flood maps for coastal communities hit by the storm. That leaves residents uncertain about where and how to rebuild. FEMA now promises the maps will be out this summer, nearly two years after Katrina struck. Bush should be pushing the agency to do better.

Beyond these concrete actions, the president could energize the rebuilding effort simply by putting it back in the national spotlight. Bush inexplicably failed to mention Katrina in his nationally televised State of the Union address last month. His visit Thursday brought a planeload of reporters to the Gulf Coast. Returning with the frequency he did in the first year after the disaster could boost tourism and help recruit more of the volunteers whose work has been essential to the recovery.

Eighteen months ago, when the wounds of Katrina were still fresh, Bush stood in New Orleans' historic Jackson Square and promised to "do what it takes (and) stay as long as it takes, to help citizens rebuild their communities and their lives."

If that pledge is to be fulfilled, the president will have to do more of what he did Thursday and a lot more in Washington.

Experts: U.S. Unprepared For Nuclear Terror Attack (MCT)

By Greg Gordon

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - Although the Bush administration has warned repeatedly about the threat of a terrorist nuclear attack and spent more than $300 billion to protect the homeland, the government remains ill-prepared to respond to a nuclear catastrophe.

Experts and government documents suggest that, absent a major preparedness push, the U.S. response to a mushroom cloud could be worse than the debacle after Hurricane Katrina, possibly contributing to civil disorder and costing thousands of lives.

"The United States is unprepared to mitigate the consequences of a nuclear attack," Pentagon analyst John Brinkerhoff concluded in a July 31, 2005, draft of a confidential memo to the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "We were unable to find any group or office with a coherent approach to this very important aspect of homeland security. ...

"This is a bad situation. The threat of a nuclear attack is real, and action is needed now to learn how to deal with one."

Col. Jill Morgenthaler, Illinois' director of homeland security, said there's a "disconnect" between President Bush's and Vice President Dick Cheney's nuclear threat talk and the administration's actions.

"I don't see money being focused on actual response and mitigation to a nuclear threat," she said.

Interviews by McClatchy Newspapers with more than 15 radiation and emergency preparedness experts and a review of internal documents revealed:

The government has yet to launch an educational program, akin to the Cold War-era civil defense campaign promoting fallout shelters, to teach Americans how to shield themselves from radiation, especially from the fallout plume, which could deposit deadly particles up to 100 miles from ground zero.

Analysts estimate that as many as 300,000 emergency workers would be needed after a nuclear attack, but predict that the radiation would scare many of them away from the disaster site.

Hospital emergency rooms wouldn't be able to handle the surge of people who were irradiated or the many more who feared they were.

Medical teams would have to improvise to treat what could be tens of thousands of burn victims because most cities have only one or two available burn-unit beds. Cham Dallas, director of the University of Georgia's Center for Mass Destruction Defense, called the predicament "the worst link in our health care wall."

Several drugs are in development and one is especially promising, but the government hasn't acquired any significant new medicine to counteract radiation's devastating effects on victims' blood-forming bone marrow.

Over the last three years, several federal agencies have taken some steps in nuclear disaster planning. The Department of Health and Human Services has drawn up "playbooks" for a range of attack scenarios and created a Web site to instruct emergency responders in treating radiation victims.

The Energy Department's Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory is geared to use real-time weather data, within minutes of a bombing, to create a computer model that charts the likely path of a radioactive fallout plume so that the government can warn affected people to take shelter or evacuate. The government also has modeled likely effects in blast zones.

DOJ_NMG_0138714

Capt. Ann Knebel, the U.S. Public Health Service's deputy preparedness chief, said her agency is using the models to understand how many people in different zones would suffer from blast injuries, burns or radiation sickness "and to begin to match our resources to the types of injuries."

No matter how great the government's response, a nuclear bomb's toll would be staggering.

The government's National Planning Scenario, which isn't public, projects that a relatively small, improvised 10-kiloton bomb could kill hundreds of thousands of people in a medium-sized city and cause hundreds of billions of dollars in economic losses.

The document, last updated in April 2005, projects that a bomb denoted at ground level in Washington, D.C., would kill as many as 204,600 people, including many government officials, and would injure or sicken 90,800. Another 24,580 victims would die of radiation-related cancer in ensuing years. Radioactive debris would contaminate a 3,000-square-mile area, requiring years-long cleanup, it said.

Brinkerhoff, author of the confidential memo for the Joint Chiefs, estimated that nearly 300,000 National Guardsmen, military reservists and civil emergency personnel would be needed to rescue, decontaminate, process and manage the 1.5 million evacuees.

The job would include cordoning off the blast zone and manning a 200-mile perimeter around the fallout area to process and decontaminate victims, to turn others away from the danger and to maintain order. Brinkerhoff estimated that the military would need to provide 140,000 of the 300,000 responders, but doubted that the Pentagon would have that many. And the Public Health Service's Knebel cited studies suggesting that the "fear factor" would reduce civil emergency responders by more than 30 percent.

Planning for an attack seems to evoke a sense of resignation among some officials.

"We are concerned about the catastrophic threats and are trying to improve our abilities for disasters," said Gerald Parker, a deputy assistant secretary in Health and Human Services' new Office of Preparedness and Response. "But you have to look at what's pragmatic as well."

Dr. Andrew Garrett of Columbia University's National Center for Disaster Preparedness, put it this way: "People are just very intimidated to take on the problem" because "there may not be apparent solutions right now."

The U.S. intelligence community considers it a "fairly remote" possibility that terrorists will obtain weapons-grade plutonium or highly enriched uranium, which is more accessible, to build a nuclear weapon, said a senior intelligence official who requested anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information. The official said intelligence agencies worry mainly about a makeshift, radioactive "dirty bomb" that would kill at most a few hundred people, contaminate part of a city and spread panic.

But concerns about a larger nuclear attack are increasing at a time when North Korea is testing atomic weapons and Iran is believed to be pursuing them. Al-Qaida's worldwide network of terrorists also reportedly has been reconstituted.

The 9/11 Commission's 2004 report rated a nuclear bombing as the most consequential threat facing the nation.

"We called for a maximum effort against the threat," Lee Hamilton, the panel's vice chairman, told McClatchy Newspapers. "My impression is that we've got a long ways to go. ... I just think it would overwhelm us."

Dr. Ira Helfand, a Massachusetts emergency care doctor who co-authored a report on nuclear preparedness last year by the Physicians for Social Responsibility, chided the administration for trying "to create a climate of fear rather than to identify a problem and address it." The doctors' group found the government "dangerously unprepared" for a nuclear attack.

Government officials say they have drafted playbooks for every sort of radioactive attack, from a "dirty bomb" to a large, sophisticated device.

But radiation experts and government memos emphasize the chaos that a bigger bomb could create. Emergency responders could face power outages, leaking gas lines, buckled bridges and tunnels, disrupted communications from the blast's electromagnetic pulse and streets clogged by vehicle crashes because motorists could be blinded by the bright flash accompanying detonation.

No equipment exists to shield rescue teams from radiation, and survivors would face similar risks if they tried to walk to safety.

DOJ_NMG_0138715

Defense analyst Brinkerhoff proposed having troops gradually tighten the ring around the blast zone as the radiation diminished, but warned that the government lacks the hundreds of radiation meters needed to ensure that they wouldn't endanger themselves. He said those making rescue forays would need dosimeters to monitor their exposure.

Emergency teams would have no quick test to determine the extent of survivors' radiation exposure. They would have to rely on tests for white blood cell declines or quiz people about their whereabouts during the blast and whether they had vomited.

For those with potentially lethal acute radiation sickness, only limited medication is available, said Richard Hatchett, who's overseeing nearly $100 million in research on radiation countermeasures for the National Institute of Allergies and Infectious Diseases.

The Department of Health and Human Services might commit to a limited purchase of one promising drug as early as this month. But currently federal health officials plan to fly victims of acute radiation sickness to hospitals across the country for bone marrow transplants.

The National Planning Scenario expressed concern that uninformed survivors of an attack could be lethally exposed to radiation because they failed to seek shelter, preferably in a sealed basement, for three to four days while radioactive debris decayed. Another big problem: Only a small percentage of Americans store bottled water, canned food and other essentials for an ordeal in a shelter.

Helfand said it would be too late to help most people near the blast, but that advance education could save many people in the path of the fallout.

Education is critical, he said, because attempting to evacuate could "put you on a crowded freeway where you'll be stuck in traffic and get the maximum radiation exposure."

California's emergency services chief, Henry Renteria, said it might be time "to re-establish an urban area radiation shelter program."

Brinkerhoff wrote that people could build their own radiation-proof shelters if the government engaged in "large-scale civil defense planning" and gave them meters and dosimeters to monitor the radiation.

Since there hasn't been "any enthusiasm to address this kind of preparedness," Brinkerhoff concluded, the only choice for most people would be to flee.

Hundreds Of Incidents Reported Of Smuggling Of Nuclear Materials (MCT)

By Greg Gordon

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - The number of experts who believe that terrorists could obtain the apparatus for a nuclear bomb is impressive and growing.

The 9/11 Commission described in 2004 the relative ease with which terrorists could conceal the needed weapons-grade plutonium or highly enriched uranium, which it said would be "about the size of a grapefruit or an orange."

Since 2001, law enforcement officials have developed training exercises on how terrorists might smuggle eight components for an improvised 10-kiloton bomb into the United States and then detonate it near the White House.

Experts in and out of the government worry that the most likely source of nuclear material is Russia and the former Soviet bloc nations, where stocks of weapons-grade plutonium and uranium are stored at loosely guarded sites.

And some people are trying to get their hands on them.

The International Atomic Energy Agency reports 976 incidents of illicit trafficking of nuclear and radioactive materials since 1993 - with 149 of them last year alone. In 2006, a man in the former Soviet republic of Georgia was arrested for allegedly trying to sell highly enriched uranium to terrorists.

In a recent interview, Lee Hamilton, who was vice chairman of the 9/11 Commission, said the United States must do more. He suggested spending $3 billion to $4 billion on securing nuclear material in the former Soviet Union. Currently, U.S. officials spend about $1 billion a year.

DOJ_NMG_0138716

Joe Cirincione, author of "Bomb Scare: The History and Future of Nuclear Weapons," said some radioactive materials in former eastern bloc nations are "guarded by little more than a chain-linked fence, a padlock and a guard that works during the day."

He said he considers it a certainty that, "if we just keep doing what we're doing, a terrorist group will get a nuclear weapon or the materials for a nuclear weapon and use it sometime in the next 10 years."

"You just can't keep tempting fate like this," he said.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and his agency have sought nearly $3 billion to buy sophisticated radiological detectors. They're placing the detectors at U.S. borders to scan incoming cargo. Eventually, the detectors will be positioned around major cities, but the newest generation of equipment won't be ready for a couple of years.

Punishment To Fit The Nuclear Crime (WP)

By Anne-Marie Slaughter And Thomas Wright

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

A joint sting operation by the CIA and officials from the Republic of Georgia foiled an attempt by a Russian man to sell nuclear-bomb-grade uranium on the black market last summer. This event, only made public in January, was the latest in a series of alarming incidents that remind us of the severity of the threat posed by nuclear terrorism.

To build a nuclear weapon, terrorists must acquire materials from a state. National governments are unlikely to cooperate with terrorists because they fear retaliation from the victim of such an attack and its allies, but rogue scientists, generals or other individuals can work with criminal networks to deliver nuclear weapons to the highest bidder. To counter this danger, we should make the illegal transfer of nuclear materials a crime against humanity triable by international tribunals and by national courts in every country.

Current efforts to close down the nuclear black market have an Achilles' heel -- certain states will not cooperate and will even protect nuclear criminals. For instance, A.Q. Khan, Pakistan's "father of the bomb," lives comfortably under house arrest; U.S. officials have not been allowed even to interrogate him. Pakistan's government is too frightened of a domestic backlash to act harshly against a national hero. Globally, of the dozens suspected of involvement in his network, only three have been successfully prosecuted.

During the Cold War, the United States used deterrence to avert Armageddon; the Soviet Union understood that aggression, even of a conventional nature, would carry too high a price. This old wisdom offers new hope; the United States should actively deter individuals who trade in nuclear materials by making the costs of such behavior unacceptably high.

Making nuclear transfer a crime against humanity captures the enormity of the offense and would dramatically increase the cost of getting caught. Nuclear transfer threatens the lives of millions of people. It merits a place in infamy alongside genocide and other evils. Creating a nuclear transfer taboo would strip away feigned protestations of innocence and illusions of a victimless crime. It would stigmatize black-market financiers and other facilitators of nuclear transfers as the ultimate merchants of death.

In addition to highlighting the dangers of this action, making nuclear transfer a crime against humanity would greatly expand opportunities for prosecution, denying national governments the ability to shelter these criminals.

The International Criminal Court has jurisdiction over crimes against humanity. The inclusion of nuclear transfer as such a crime could be confirmed at the next review conference, in 2009. The ICC could then indict and prosecute those suspected of such acts. Even if the United States cannot bring itself to join the ICC, it could work with allies to empower the ICC to act, just as the Bush administration has done on Darfur.

Similarly, as a matter of international law, crimes against humanity are subject to universal jurisdiction. That means that any nation, including the United States, could prosecute nuclear traders anywhere in the world. National governments can pass statutes confirming such jurisdiction in their courts.

Finally, the U.N. Security Council could pass a Chapter VII resolution urging a prosecutor to investigate these cases or even establish a special tribunal to prosecute those suspected of nuclear transfer. A tribunal could be a fallback if efforts to incorporate nuclear transfer into the ICC charter were unsuccessful.

This initiative would make international law work as a tool of American national security strategy rather than as a constraint on it. Failing states would no longer provide safe haven for rogue individuals. The potential costs of nuclear transfer for criminal networks would clearly exceed its potential rewards. It would be multilateralism and international law at its best: hard-edged tools to further American and global interests.

Most important, it is the only way to overcome a real problem. The status quo -- trusting nondemocratic states to safeguard U.S. security interests by cracking down on their criminal networks -- has failed. The convention on genocide was signed after the Holocaust. This time, we should not wait until after the fact to act.

Civil Air Patrol Revives Role As Eyes Of Skies (WT)

By Audrey Hudson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

The Civil Air Patrol guarded the U.S. shoreline from Maine to Texas against German U-boats during World War II, and now the all-volunteer force is playing a vital role in the war against terrorism.

The 56,000-member-strong organization is participating in a growing number of homeland security missions, conducting aerial reconnaissance of military ships and other offshore activity, protecting sensitive and critical infrastructure from terrorist attacks, and assisting the U.S. Border Patrol.

"We were the eyes of the home skies when we started 65 years ago to spot German submarines and rescue downed pilots, and now we are going back to our roots as the eyes of the home skies," said Col. Kay Joslin Walling, commander of the Middle East Region of the Civil Air Patrol, which includes the District, Maryland and Virginia.

The volunteers of the Air Force auxiliary in Washington protect the country by acting as the enemy during monthly "Falcon Virgo" exercises over the nation's capital, where they perform a high-tech game of hide-and-seek with armed Air Force jets.

"As the National Capital Wing's planes closed in on restricted areas, ground forces tracked them with radar, and surface-to-air missile operators locked them in their radar sights," the Civil Air Patrol (CAP) reported to Congress on its 65 years of operations.

"Air Force F-16 fighter jets intercepted the mock enemies and escorted them out of the restricted airspace," the report said.

The organization will celebrate its 65th anniversary this week with Capitol Hill lawmakers.

When World War II ended, CAP focused on search-and-rescue missions, and disaster relief in cases of floods, tornadoes, hurricanes, snowstorms and fires. The patrol also fights the illegal drug trade and last year netted $1 billion in seizures. In their new role in the war on terrorism, pilots use state-of-the-art equipment and a fleet of airplanes to participate in regular patrols and terrorist-event exercises.

Since the inception of the Homeland Security Department, CAP has provided surveillance for the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City, the Kentucky Derby and other major events.

Using satellite digital imaging systems, Cessna airplanes relay reconnaissance photographs in real time to emergency or disaster centers. They were crucial in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina in 2005 and the attacks on the World Trade Center in 2001.

The New York Wing was the first aircraft in the air over ground zero after September 11, shooting aerial images of the damage the next day to determine how rescue workers could traverse the scene.

White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend presided over an exercise last weekend to test the government's response to bombing scenarios. Capt. Dan Proffen used his day off to patrol critical infrastructure along the Chesapeake Bay.

"Nothing should be able to slip past me," Capt. Proffen said as he piloted a Cessna Skylane equipped with a Garmin G-1000 glass cockpit and computerized controls.

"This plane will fly itself," said Col. Jerry Weiss, commander of the Maryland Wing.

DOJ_NMG_0138718

"It wows the people sitting in the emergency operations center, when the pictures appear in real time. We can watch as evacuations unfold," Col. Weiss said. "It's situational awareness for people sitting in a room with no windows."

CAP officials call the effort a bargain for the government: less than $400 to fly a Cessna 182 for four hours, compared with $1,800 for one hour to operate a Black Hawk helicopter.

"All of us have real jobs; we don't get paid for this, which is why we are so financially cost-efficient," Col. Walling said.

Capt. Proffen joined the CAP-operated cadet program at age 17. Eight years later, he continues to volunteer his time flying weekly patrols and uses his vacation time from Johns Hopkins University's Applied Physics Laboratory, where he works as an engineer, to serve as a flight instructor for new cadets.

After takeoff from the Bay Bridge Airport on the Eastern Shore, Capt. Proffen headed north toward a plume of black smoke, which upon closer inspection appeared to be a field-clearing effort on a stretch of land surrounded by the frozen Bay waters.

Flying a loop around a Susquehanna River dam to check the structure's integrity, Capt. Proffen made his way back down the Bay for a final survey of the Bay Bridge yet avoided Aberdeen Proving Ground.

"We don't fly through there," Col. Walling later explained. "They shoot off some big guns over there."

Homeland Security Delays Federal IDs, Proposes Rules (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

The Bush administration will delay implementation of a new law to federalize driver's licenses, bowing to pressure from federal and state lawmakers who say next year's deadline can't be met.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday announced the delay and released 162 pages of proposed regulations to guide the national identification system.

"These standards correct glaring vulnerabilities exploited by some of the September 11 hijackers who used fraudulently obtained driver's licenses to board the airplanes in their attack against America," Mr. Chertoff said.

"Raising the security standards on driver's licenses establishes another layer of protection to prevent terrorists from obtaining and using fake documents to plan or carry out an attack," Mr. Chertoff said.

The deadline will be extended from May 2008 until December 2009, and up to 20 percent of state homeland security grants can be used to implement the program.

Congress mandated the identification cards in the 2005 Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act for Defense, the Global War on Terror, and Tsunami Relief Act.

New identification cards and driver's licenses will be required to pass airline screening or enter federal buildings and nuclear plants.

The cards will include the holder's name, date of birth, sex, an identification number other than a Social Security number, a facial digital photograph, an address and a signature. The cards must contain physical security features that can be read by a computer.

The proposed regulations reflect legislation pushed by Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican and ranking member of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, Mr. Chertoff said.

Miss Collins said she is "grateful that Secretary Chertoff has listened to the concerns of so many state leaders and my colleagues on this important issue."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican and ranking member of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, called the delay reasonable but said the new ID standards remain an urgent national security priority.

"Weaknesses in driver's licenses are still being exploited every day by illegal immigrants, identity thieves and terrorists," Mr. Davis said.

Mr. Chertoff said the standards will protect against identity theft and the use of fraudulent documents, and that background checks will be required of all division of motor vehicle employees.

The regulations say the federal government will not be given greater access to personal information and that no national database is created "because it leaves the decision of how to conduct the exchanges in the hands of the states."

DOJ_NMG_0138719

Some privacy advocates are concerned that the database of personal information will be used without limits or standards.

"The Real ID system may be decentralized, but if it is widely accessible, for purposes other that administering the driver's license system, it could turn into a massive tracking system," said Sophia Cope, a fellow with the Center for Democracy and Technology.

Cost And Privacy Concerns Cited In New Rules For Driver's Licenses (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

A law enacted after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to secure U.S. driver's licenses will cost $23.1 billion over 10 years, require motorists born after 1935 to present birth certificates or passports, and add $28 to the cost of issuing each license, officials said yesterday.

Long-awaited rules to implement the law, known as Real ID, did not quell criticism from states, privacy advocates and libertarian groups. They said it represents an unfunded mandate and creates a national ID-card system that will increase the consequences of identity theft.

The 162-page draft regulations "confirm the worst suspicions" of opponents, said Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.). He said Congress should repeal the law and reopen talks with states, technology experts and civil liberties groups rather than risk years of legal challenges.

The 2005 act overhauls how state ID cards and driver's licenses must be awarded and produced to combat forgery and fraud, while standardizing their data so they can be shared across state and federal databases.

The plan would delay from May 2008 to the end of 2009 the deadline for states to begin compliance, but all 245 million U.S. driver's licenses must comply by May 2013 to be used for federal purposes such as boarding aircraft.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said that technology will ease, not increase, privacy threats, and that the federal government will not keep a central database of personal information.

"Is it a reasonable amount of money that people should pay to prevent people from getting on airplanes or getting in buildings and killing Americans?" Chertoff asked. "I think most people would say . . . that's $20 well spent."

Associations representing the nation's governors, state legislatures and motor vehicle administrators complained that costs continue to grow, that the 2013 deadline is unreasonable and that more changes are needed.

Opponents from the American Civil Liberties Union, the Cato Institute and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights said the rules leave many questions to be answered in a 60-day comment period.

The rules do not propose to encrypt personal data stored in bar codes on licenses, for instance, leaving it accessible to commercial data brokers. Nor do they spell out how systems linking government databases will be built or who will own them. "They can't fix a law that is so fundamentally flawed," Cato official Tim Harper said.

Chertoff said states can spend up to $100 million this year and $37 million next year from U.S. homeland security grants to offset their $14.6 billion share of the tab. State officials say they had other plans for the money.

Seven former U.S. security officials and Sept. 11 commission staffers, led by panel member John F. Lehman Jr., said the United States should pay $1 billion in "up-front costs."

Federal Requirement For Tamper-Proof Licenses Will Raise Fees For Drivers By 2013 (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — Nearly 240 million Americans and legal residents will have to spend an estimated $20 more for a standardized and tamper-proof driver's license by 2013 to comply with a proposed new federal rule issued Thursday.

Congress imposed the mandate for the new licenses in 2005, agreeing with the 9/11 Commission that terrorists' access to fake licenses or state-issued identification cards made the 2001 plot easier to carry out.

But until now, the Department of Homeland Security had not issued rules governing the licenses' security features or the documentation that will be required to get one. It also had not estimated the costs — about $14.6 billion to states and about $7.8 billion to individuals — of setting up the system called Real ID over the next decade.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, trying to address concerns raised by the states, said the department would allow those having trouble meeting the original May 2008 deadline to delay the start of the program until the end of 2009.

But all states will still be required to replace all existing drivers' licenses by 2013 — even those not up for renewal — if they want their licenses to be accepted as identification at airports or federal buildings.

"This is going to cost money — security does cost money," Mr. Chertoff said Thursday. "But it is money well spent."

To help the states get started, Mr. Chertoff offered up to $100 million in federal grants this year, although the money would come from antiterrorism funds already promised to the states. So far, only $40 million in federal aid has been provided for the program.

Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, who had advocated delaying the start of the program, praised the revisions.

"The department has finally recognized that it simply was unfair to impose this burden on the states," Ms. Collins said Thursday on the Senate floor.

But the plan received largely negative reviews from state officials and civil liberties experts.

"We have always known this law would be a nightmare for motorists and taxpayers, and President Bush's rules have just confirmed that nightmare," Gov. James E. Doyle of Wisconsin said in a statement Thursday, predicting "higher fees, longer lines, fewer D.M.V. centers, and a major headache when you go to renew your license."

The National Governors Association said the federal aid Mr. Chertoff offered, representing about 10 percent of the cost in the first year and an unknown amount in future years, was woefully inadequate.

"It is a drop in a bucket," said David Quam, the association's director of federal relations, who estimated that the extra cost per person could reach $40. The cost of licenses now ranges from as much $85 in New York to as little as $4 in North Carolina, according to the AAA.

Representatives from the American Civil Liberties Union said the new identification cards would leave the nation less secure. That is because Homeland Security said in the proposed rule issued Thursday that it did not intend to require the encryption of biographic data contained in a machine-readable strip on the license.

"You will create greater security vulnerabilities for sophisticated terrorists than the ones we are closing," said Timothy Sparapani, legislative counsel at the A.C.L.U.

Applicants will have to prove their address, date of birth and legal status in the United States with valid government-issued documents. Exceptions will be granted to people born before 1935 and in certain other cases, like people who were victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Before states can issue a new license, they will need to electronically confirm that the applicant's documentation is accurate. That will require states or the federal government to create electronic databases of birth certificates, immigration records and other documents — a task that could be difficult to complete in time, some state officials said Thursday.

Mr. Chertoff said the proposed rule, which is on track to become final in several months, would give states the option to make it illegal for merchants to automatically collect biographic data from the licenses.

States will also be permitted to issue a different type of license for people who cannot confirm they are in the United States legally. But these would not be valid as a form of federal identification.

Several states including Maine and Montana, angry over the high cost of the program and concerns about privacy, are considering or have voted on legislation calling for the repeal of the law. Jim Guest, a Missouri state legislator helping coordinate the repeal effort in more than 30 states, said the revolt would continue.

"All of our concerns are still there," Mr. Guest said.

FEDERAL DIARY: Hoyer Makes Good On Health-Care Promise (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, March 2, 2007

The House majority leader delivered on a promise yesterday.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) introduced a bill that would increase the government's contribution toward federal employee health-care premiums -- as he had pledged he would to two unions earlier this week.

DOJ_NMG_0138721

Under the proposal, the government would pay 80 percent of the cost of premiums in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, saving the average federal worker about $500 annually. Currently, the government picks up 72 percent of premium costs.

"This legislation will help take the bite out of rising health care costs and make it easier for federal employees to afford quality health care for themselves and their families," Hoyer said in a statement.

The rate of premium growth in the federal employee program has slowed in recent years, dropping from an average increase of 12.7 percent in 2002 to an average 6.4 percent in 2006. The Office of Personnel Management, which administers the program, used financial reserves in the program to hold this year's average premium increase to 1.8 percent.

Still, a number of insurance plans in the federal program raised their premiums by more than the average 1.8 percent increase. Premiums for health maintenance organizations, for example, rose by 6.3 percent, and some Washington area federal HMOs raised their rates higher.

More than half of the federal program's enrollees, or 2.27 million people, are covered by Blue Cross Blue Shield. This year, the annual share of premiums paid by a federal employee who chose Blue Cross standard coverage will be $1,489 for individual coverage and $3,492 for family coverage.

In introducing the bill, Hoyer said that Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) has joined as the chief co-sponsor.

Hoyer has tried to lower health-care costs for federal employees and retirees in past years and promised unions, which held their annual legislative conferences this week, that he would renew his efforts. The introduction of the bill yesterday was welcomed by John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, and Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union.

The prospects for Hoyer's proposal are uncertain, in part because Congress is under pressure to reduce the federal deficit and rein in spending. His proposal also runs counter to a Bush administration plan, announced last month, that would reduce the government's contribution to health-care premiums for new retirees with less than 10 years of federal service.On the Front Burner

"Welcome to the hot seat."

That's how Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, greeted Paul A. Schneider, who joined the Department of Homeland Security as undersecretary for management two months ago. Schneider came to the Hill yesterday to testify before the subcommittee on management, investigations and oversight.

Committee members expressed concern about morale of employees at Homeland Security, noting that the department got rock-bottom scores in important job-satisfaction, leadership and management areas in a survey conducted by the Office of Personnel Management.

Schneider said the department plans to launch focus groups in the next 60 days to explore workforce issues and find solutions. The survey suggested that too many employees do not feel they are being recognized for their hard work and that communication between supervisors and employees needs to be improved, he said.

Efforts to reduce reliance on contractors also are underway, he told the panel, chaired by Rep. Chris Carney (D-Pa.). Starting this year, Schneider said the department is focusing "on developing a mature acquisition workforce through targeted recruiting and advanced training programs."Talk Shows

Ground Zero Victims (opinion) (NYT)

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

Mayor Michael Bloomberg has finally joined the urgent campaign to get Washington to care for the responders who helped New Yorkers after the Sept. 11 attacks. Many responders — and people who studied, lived or worked around the World Trade Center — are seriously ill, and Mr. Bloomberg can play an important role in making the federal government take responsibility for them.

DOJ_NMG_0138722

Mr. Bloomberg was once skeptical about what is being called ground zero disease. But he is now campaigning to get Washington to pay $150 million a year for three health centers that already treat police officers, firefighters and others made sick by the attacks. The money is badly needed to improve care in these underfinanced, overworked centers.

There should also be a fund to compensate those who have been made sick, modeled on the Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund. There are some private fund-raising efforts under way, including one by The New York Times Company Foundation, but the big money will have to come from the federal government. One source could be the $1 billion that Congress set aside to cover lawsuits against the city and its contractors.

Mr. Bloomberg is prepared to make it available, but only if Congress passes a law to protect the city and its contractors from negligence suits by the victims. It should do so. The victims will get more money, and sooner, from a compensation fund than if they have to pursue individual lawsuits and pay attorneys' fees.

The entire nation was attacked on Sept. 11, not just New York. Congress and the Bush administration should be prepared to come up with the additional funds, and the legislative fixes, that are needed to compensate the victims.

WAR NEWS:

House Democrats Set To Retreat From Effort To Cap Troop Levels (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Iraq war is proving a humbling experience not just for President Bush, but also for those in Congress who want to end it.

Plagued by internal divisions, House Democrats have largely abandoned efforts to cap the increase in U.S. troop levels for Iraq and will focus instead on highlighting the war's strain on the military and competing U.S. interests in Afghanistan.

The major battleground is a wartime spending request which the administration is still adjusting and which has blossomed into a major test for the Democrats charged with drafting the legislation.

The House Appropriations Committee may add as much as $1 billion to Mr. Bush's request to beef up U.S. operations in Afghanistan and shift additional funds to rural-development programs. More than $2 billion would be set aside to improve the readiness of strategic military reserves in the U.S., and provisions would be added to curb the frequent practice of stretching personnel in Iraq by extending combat tours for units already deployed.

But the White House is given discretion to bypass any such restrictions that it finds burdensome, and President Bush will have a relatively free hand to add the more than 21,500 soldiers and Marines he wants by the end of May.

Rep. John Murtha, one of the bill's chief managers, had pushed a tougher line that could have capped the buildup at one to two brigades below Mr. Bush's target. But given divisions in his party, the Pennsylvania Democrat was forced to retreat for fear of jeopardizing the larger package.

The sometimes stormy back-and-forth, which has played out since Mr. Murtha announced his proposals in early January, has been a humbling lesson for him and other Democrats in just how difficult it is for Congress to achieve the unity needed to challenge a president's war powers. Similar debates over Vietnam, a larger war with many more casualties, stretched for years. And while Iraq helped to mobilize voters for Democrats in the November elections, helping them win control of Congress, delivering on their promise of change is proving difficult.

"For seven weeks Democrats have been all over the block," said House Republican Leader John Boehner of Ohio. "They have no strategy to stop the war. They have no strategy to win the war. They are the majority here on Capitol Hill. It's time for them to grow up and make a decision."

Last night, the Appropriations leadership was still struggling to pull together the bill, which will include the administration's $93.4 billion defense request, as well as $6 billion for State Department and foreign-aid accounts, and $3.4 billion disaster assistance at home.

The war debate, by so fracturing the House, makes this a much more difficult challenge for Democrats still finding their legs as the majority. Complicating the task is the fluid situation on the ground in Iraq and Afghanistan, and the fact that the Pentagon appears to have underestimated its needs for support personnel and Mine Resistant Ambush Protected armored vehicles. Further, there may also be adjustments to Pakistan economic assistance following President Cheney's visit there this week.

An administration official said last evening that there may be "slight adjustments" within its requests. But the Pentagon has discussed much larger needs approaching $5 billion.

Appropriations Chairman David Obey is under pressure to add billions more for domestic priorities, including farm aid and child health programs. But to protect himself from critics on the right, the Wisconsin Democrat has set the goal that every dollar for these needs will be more than matched by additional funds for defense and homeland security.

This has opened the door to both more military spending and additional funds for homeland-security priorities that have received less attention in the past. These include rail- and transit-security measures, explosive-detection devices and tighter inspections of air cargo carried on passenger planes.

Mr. Obey is pressing still for language that would bar major U.S. military action against Iran without prior authorization from Congress. But the more serious policy battle -- and dilemma for Democrats -- has been how far lawmakers should go in trying to cap or restrain the new commitment of U.S. troops in Iraq.

The new forces ordered by Mr. Bush are intended to quell sectarian violence in Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods in Baghdad and strengthen Marine forces against the continued al Qaeda presence in Anbar province. But the Army is so short of combat-ready units, it will take until May to complete the "surge" of five brigades, creating an awkward situation for both the military and Congress.

Coming in the middle of a fiscal year, it was highly unlikely Congress could roll back the president's decision even if it had the political will to limit funding for the surge.

In testimony before the Senate Appropriations Committee this week, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said Mr. Bush could use his "food and forage" powers to continue the mission even if Congress were to limit funds. "It is my belief that given the mission he has the food and forage responsibilities and authority to resource as he needs...to accomplish the mission," Gen. Pace said.

Democrats Split Over Iraq War Funding (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON

After starting the 110th Congress with a big antiwar mandate, Democrats are scrambling to find a way forward on an issue that is driving wedges deep into their new majority.

At issue is how aggressively Democrats can challenge President Bush's war policy without alienating so many of their own caucus members that they lose key votes.

The next test will be how the House handles Mr. Bush's $93.4 billion war-funding request, which comes before the Appropriations Committee next week.

"It's a work in progress," says Rep. Ike Skelton (D) of Missouri, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, commenting on behind-the-scenes talks this week to find a consensus within the Democratic caucus on the war.

Early in the week, House Democrats balked at a proposal by Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, who chairs the Defense subcommittee on that panel, to use the war-funding request to rein in Bush's options as commander in chief.

Mr. Murtha's plan, announced on an antiwar website, proposed that the funds be used on the condition that the Pentagon meets standards of readiness and training for troops to be deployed to Iraq.

After a fractious caucus meeting on Tuesday, House leaders backed off the Murtha proposal, but opened new rifts with liberals in their caucus who favor stronger moves to get US forces out of Iraq.

"The American people are going to have a great deal of difficulty with Democrats who say they oppose the war, yet vote to fund it," says Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D) of Ohio, who is also a presidential candidate.

DOJ_NMG_0138724

A longtime, staunch supporter of the military, Murtha has emerged as a lightening rod in an intense intraparty debate over how to end US involvement in Iraq.

On the one hand, the 44-member Blue Dog Coalition, which is made up of fiscal conservatives, opposes moves that would either deprive US troops of funding they need or appear to micromanage the war.

"There's a growing consensus for setting standards for our troops to be well trained, well equipped, and well rested, but to also give the president waivers," in case such guidelines cannot be met, says Rep. Chet Edwards (D) of Texas, who chairs the subcommittee on military quality of life and veterans' affairs.

Such waivers would require Bush to "take responsibility for troops not being well trained," and would make any lapses in training or equipment more visible to the public. But the waiver policy still allows Bush to send reinforcements to "bring home a battalion that's worn out. Without such flexibility, it would be micromanaging," he adds.

On the other hand, the 71-member Congressional Progressive Caucus (CPC), the largest group of Democrats in the House, is calling for a "fully funded" withdrawal of US forces from Iraq within six months.

"I'm telling them point blank that the only money I'll support is fully supporting the withdrawal of every last soldier and contractor in Iraq," says Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D) of California, who chairs the CPC. "There's going to be a respectable showing of members against the [defense] supplemental [spending bill], unless it is clearly to support our troops, while bringing them home."

A lawmaker at the heart of next week's firestorm over funding, Rep. David Obey (D) of Wisconsin, who chairs the full House Appropriations Committee, notes that Congress struggled for years to find consensus over how to end the war in Vietnam. "Between 1970 and 1972, we had 31 different approaches, before we got a vote that had teeth," he says.

Moreover, the focus on Democrats is misplaced, he adds. The war will end "when enough Republicans go down to the White House and say, 'Mr. President, it has to end,' " he says.

On the Senate side, the Appropriations Committee that will pick up this bill after it clears the House is chaired by Sen. Robert Byrd, one of the strongest and earliest critics of the Iraq war.

"The Congress has consistently supported our men and our women in uniform, Congress will continue to support our troops and their families," he said at that panel's first hearing on supplemental war funding Feb. 27. But he added that "Congress is not a rubberstamp or presidential lapdog, obedient and unquestioning."

Meanwhile, Senate Democrats are as deeply divided as their House counterparts over the best approach to respond to Bush's call for a surge of 21,500 troops in Iraq.

After Senate Republicans blocked votes on a nonbinding resolution opposing the troop buildup earlier this month, Democrats have been working to draft a binding resolution, which may include the repeal of the 2002 authorization to use force in Iraq.

"Quiet conversations are going on behind the scenes addressing the concerns raised by some in the caucus," says Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senate majority leader Harry Reid.

Senate Republican and Democratic leaders also say they are close to agreement on debating Bush's proposal for a "surge." "This time, it looks as if we will be able to offer amendments," including one that commits the Senate to fully funding the war, says Don Stewart, a spokesman for GOP leader Mitch McConnell.

Democrats Want Troops Out If Goals Unmet (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, March 2, 2007

House Democratic leaders have coalesced around legislation that would require troops to come home from Iraq within six months if that country's leaders fail to meet promises to help reduce violence there, party officials said Thursday.

The plan would retain a Democratic proposal prohibiting the deployment to Iraq of troops with insufficient rest or training or who already have served there for more than a year. Under the plan, such troops could only be sent to Iraq if President Bush waives those standards and reports to Congress each time.

DOJ_NMG_0138725

The proposal is the latest attempt by Democrats to resolve deep divisions within the party on how far to go to scale back U.S. involvement in Iraq. Rep. James Moran said the latest version has the support of party leadership and said he believes it is final and has the best chance at attracting broad support.

"We're going to report out" a war spending bill "that's responsive to the will of the voters last November and brings our troops home as soon and safely as possible," Moran, D-Va., said in an interview Thursday.

Moran, a member of the House committee that oversees military spending, said the plan was discussed in a closed-door meeting of committee Democrats on Thursday.

Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., declined to confirm the details and or say whether Pelosi backs the plan. But he said: "We have said we want to make sure our troops have all the training and equipment they need and that the Iraqi government must meet the benchmarks President Bush endorsed."

Bush said the Iraqis had promised to meet certain goals when he offered to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. For example, the Iraqis pledged to spend more money on reconstruction and reach a political agreement to share the nation's oil resources.

If the Iraqis fail to live up to their promises, some troops could be left behind under the Democrats' plan to train Iraqi troops or conduct counterterrorism missions, Moran said.

Bush requested $93.4 billion for this year's military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Moran said that as of Thursday, the proposal was on track to add an extra $1 billion to step up efforts in Afghanistan. Money also would be added to improve health care for veterans and help wounded active-duty troops, as well as provide relief for hurricane victims.

The legislation also would require Bush to seek congressional approval for any military operations in Iran.

The Senate, meanwhile, could begin floor debate on Iraq as early as next week. Sens. Joseph Biden, D-Del., and Carl Levin, D-Mich., have proposed a resolution that would call for combat troops to come home by March 2008.

As Democrats finalized their spending plan for this year, White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten told Senate Republican leaders that the administration will need additional funding to pay for the influx of troops to Iraq.

The Pentagon initially estimated the 21,500 troops would cost $5.6 billion through Oct. 1. But 6,000 more personnel will be needed to provide support to the combat units, according to GOP aides.

The administration also might amend its funding request in order to provide more money for Afghanistan.

The White House is expected to offer to trim other parts of the 2007 war spending request such as the controversial V-22 tilt-rotor aircraft to offset the money needed. Bolten did not offer a specific figure for the support troops, the aides said.

Also on Thursday, an influential Senate Democrat floated the idea of cutting $20 billion from Bush's request for military operations next year in Iraq and Afghanistan, only to be swiftly overridden by his colleagues.

The trial balloon floated by Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad would have trimmed Bush's $142 billion war budget for 2008 by about one-seventh in keeping with cost estimates by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office.

Conrad's idea would have applied to the next budget year beginning Oct. 1 — a separate issue from the debate over Bush's $100 billion request for immediate supplemental war funding.

But it raised concerns among Democrats sensitive to any accusations of shorting funding for troops in battle.

"Our caucus feels strongly that we should go with the president's numbers" on 2008 war costs, Conrad said.

Some Lawmakers Want To Fund Civilian Projects Through War Bill (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

As House Democrats wrangle over details of a $100 billion war spending bill -- including whether restrictions should be placed on troops sent to Iraq -- some members want to add significant money for agricultural relief, Hurricane Katrina reconstruction and other nonmilitary projects.

Rep. Collin C. Peterson (D-Minn.), who chairs the Agriculture Committee, said yesterday that rural states hit hard by floods, droughts and snowstorms in the past two years need $4 billion in emergency farm relief. And attaching the request to the war bill is the best way to insure they get it, he said.

Members from Gulf states want funds for improving levees in areas devastated by Katrina. And lawmakers from across the country say their states need federal help to cover deficits in a children's health insurance program.

As of yesterday, Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), who chairs the House Appropriations Committee, had agreed to add about $3 billion to the war bill to help close military bases and relocate troops as part of the Base Realignment and Closure process. And he approved an additional $750 million for the State Children's Health Insurance Program, a joint federal and state program that provides health care for six million poor children.

Obey has not agreed to the farm-relief request, according to Democratic aides familiar with the discussions. But Peterson made it clear that conservative Democrats and some Republicans from farming communities would be inclined to support the war bill if it included disaster aid. "A lot of these guys are farm guys," Peterson said. "Disaster relief is important to them."

Even though the details of the bill are still in flux, Republicans lost no time yesterday attacking Democrats for fattening the already hefty war bill. "Our focus ought to be on supporting our troops in harm's way, not in porking up this bill with everyone's latest ideas of how we ought to be spending the taxpayers' money," said Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), the minority leader.

The bill is a response to President Bush's request for $100 billion in supplemental funds to pay for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan for the rest of the fiscal year. Democratic aides said the details of the bill are likely to be finalized and released next week and will be debated by the Appropriations Committee sometime within the next two weeks, before it is sent to the House floor for a vote. Although it is highly likely that the bill will be approved by the committee, the outcome on the floor is more difficult to predict.

Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), the Democrats' most celebrated war critic and chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on defense, is trying to use the bill as a vehicle for exerting congressional control over Iraq policy. Murtha wants to include language that says troops must meet certain readiness and equipment standards before they can be deployed. Some liberal Democrats oppose any legislation that would further fund the war. Some senior Democrats want to include a provision that would allow the president to dispatch troops that do not meet readiness standards, as long as he formally notifies Congress that he is doing so.

Republicans and some conservative Democrats have said that they will oppose such restrictions, even if it means voting against a bill that is fundamentally designed to pay for the war. "We will not support a bill that inhibits the president's ability to win this war in Iraq," Boehner said.

Fed's Bernanke Wins Praise For Reply To Sliding Markets (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

BERNANKE WINS praise for response to market volatility.

Lawmakers in both parties welcome Fed chief's reassuring midweek testimony, which followed market-rattling commentary from predecessor Greenspan. Rep. Jim Cooper praises Bernanke for a "steady hand" at the central bank.

Treasury's Paulson, on the job less than a year, spoke by phone with Bush but offered little publicly to calm investor jitters. In a speech yesterday, two days after market's plunge, Paulson struck upbeat notes and urged "a broad view of the economy."

Congressional aides say market drop that began in Asia will raise pressure on Paulson, who visits China next week, to get results on yuan.

DEMOCRATS JOCKEY for attention from black voters.

At civil-rights commemorations this weekend in Selma, Ala., Sens. Obama and Clinton will speak at separate churches blocks apart. One organizer frets they may distract the spotlight from Georgia Rep. John Lewis, beaten by state troopers during 1965 march across Edmund Pettus Bridge.

Democratic campaigns increase scrutiny of potential Gore entry after former vice president's Oscar win. The coverage Gore would attract, a strategist for one contender reasons, "robs most candidates' ability to push a positive message" for two to three weeks, and require intensive "care and feeding" of political insiders and donors.

REPUBLICANS AIM to force Democrats into tough health-care choices.

DOJ_NMG_0138727

As health-funding debate accelerates, Senate Republicans seek to resist spending increases by limiting "S-Chip" child-health program money on low-income children, not adults. Democratic-leaning states such as Illinois that cover adults under the program bristle at the idea.

Bush asked Congress for $4.8 billion in new money over five years, just over half of what Congressional Budget Office says is needed to maintain programs at current enrollment rate. Maverick Republican Sen. Smith of Oregon, facing re-election next year, draws intraparty fire for seeking funds from higher cigarette taxes.

Though Bush rebuffed governors' funding pleas, "Many states are rearing to go in covering more uninsured children," Urban Institute's Stan Dorn says.

ENDORSEMENT? Though Gore now basks in liberals' praise, neoconservative author Robert Kagan insists Gore might have ousted Saddam Hussein himself had Florida votes been counted differently. "It's entirely possible that [Gore] also might have gone to war in Iraq," Kagan tells C-SPAN in interview to air Sunday night, "because he was one of the leading hawks...in the Clinton administration." A Gore spokeswoman couldn't be reached, but Gore warned six months before war began that attacking Iraq would squander America's goodwill and distract from the war on terrorism.

COLLISION COURSE: Democratic Sen. Schumer and Republican Sen. Domenici propose guaranteed diabetes screening and treatment under Medicaid. Though Schumer says preventive steps could save $30 billion over 10 years, their legislation faces administration pressure to restrain Medicaid spending.

PLAN B: Divided over how to confront Bush on Iraq troops levels, House Democrats highlight issue with broader appeal: accountability for billions in federal spending on Katrina and other issues they contend are rife with mismanagement and abuse. A House Republican Leadership aide argues that such initiatives mask Democrats' desires for higher spending: "Republicans are trying to turn off the faucet on the front end, whereas Democrats keep looking for a bigger hose."

DAMAGE CONTROL: Bush administration seeks more help for workers hurt by trade. Labor Secretary Chao leads an interagency effort, consulting quietly with trade-friendly Democrats on Capitol Hill. Senate Finance Chairman Baucus, backing aid for service as well as manufacturing workers, calls more "trade adjustment assistance" essential for extending presidential trade-negotiating authority.

Senate Democrats Vow To Confront Bush On Iraq But Are Still Working Out The Details (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — Senate Democrats tried Thursday to bridge their political differences over how to confront President Bush on Iraq even as they acknowledged that agreement on an approach remained out of reach.

“We have not gotten our arms around how the caucus is going to move forward,” Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, said as Democrats searched for a plan that would satisfy antiwar lawmakers, keep the party’s centrists on board and win over some Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0138728

The leadership had been preparing to move forward this week with a proposal that would have essentially repealed the 2002 resolution granting Mr. Bush the power to invade Iraq and imposed new restrictions on how American troops could be used there.

But the plan put off some Democrats, because it said explicitly that "the president is authorized to use the armed forces of the United States in Iraq" for the purposes of protecting American forces and bases, training Iraqi soldiers and policemen, conducting operations against terrorists and protecting Iraq's borders.

Critics of the war, particularly those who opposed the 2002 authorization, worried that this approach would effectively put them on record as sanctioning almost any use Mr. Bush and his commanders might make of the troops, giving Democrats shared responsibility for a war that most of them now oppose and several have rejected all along.

"It's still George Bush's war," said Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, "but we run the risk of gaining some ownership of it if we don't make it absolutely clear that we are the party that wants to get out of there."

Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat, said he believed that the party's leaders were close to reaching a new consensus, but he cautioned that any legislation would have to be precisely written.

"I haven't given up," he said. "I really think we can carefully word this and come up with strong support in our caucus. But I am one of the 23 who voted against the war, and I want to read this very carefully to make sure I am not authorizing the war at this point."

Democrats sought to smooth over the problems by drafting another proposal, which began circulating Thursday. That version made it clear that the intent was to narrow the initial authority for the war and placed new emphasis on the phased redeployment of troops. It also put stricter limits on the United States role in protecting Iraq's borders and said the conflict required a political rather than a military solution.

Mr. Reid said the Democrats were determined to move legislatively on the war after finishing work on a domestic security measure.

Senate Democrats were somewhat defensive about their internal divisions, which have left them open to criticism that unlike the House of Representatives, they have yet to weigh in with a strong vote on the war even though public dissatisfaction with it contributed to their election gains in November.

"We've only been in the majority for six weeks," said Senator Patty Murray of Washington, another member of the leadership, adding that there had been dozens of committee hearings about what to do. "We are working our way for how to do it right," she said, "and that's a lot better than we've done in the last three to four years."

Mr. Reid sought to play down any party divisions, saying Democrats were united behind the broad idea that the "war in Iraq is going wrong." He noted that 49 senators, nearly all of them Democrats, sought unsuccessfully last month to force a vote on a proposal opposing the administration's troop buildup in Iraq but were thwarted procedurally by Republicans.

Even as the Democrats searched for a policy solution, the political sensitivity over trying to restrict war spending was brought into sharp focus on Thursday.

Senator Kent Conrad, Democrat of North Dakota and chairman of the Budget Committee, raised the idea of cutting $20 billion from the president's $145 billion request for next year for Iraq and Afghanistan. But he quickly dropped that idea after fellow Democrats insisted on keeping the president's number in the nonbinding budget framework that is the first step toward bills financing all of the government's programs, not just the war.

Democrats in the House and the Senate say that even with popular sentiment against the war, trying to agree on how to influence its course is proving much more difficult than some had anticipated.

In the Senate, a working group of nine Democratic senators and their senior aides have been meeting privately throughout the week, trying to resolve their disagreements on how to limit the president's war authority.

"It's tricky finding the right formula where you can express the reservations about what's going on without interrupting legitimate military activities that are being conducted because we're there," said Senator Jim Webb, a Virginia Democrat who was elected last fall. "That's the debate right now."

GOP Regroups To Foil War Plans Of Democrats (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0138729

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

Republicans in Congress -- including most who have defected from President Bush's plan to send reinforcements to Iraq -- have closed ranks and are prepared to thwart the Democrats' continued efforts to undermine the war strategy.

Most of the 17 House Republicans who voted for a resolution against the troop-surge plan -- which was about half the number predicted by Democrats -- now oppose moves to cut war funding or attach conditions to appropriations bills that would hamstring the war effort.

All but one of the seven Senate Republicans that backed the anti-surge resolution in their chamber say they will not support any funding cuts. The one other dissident Republican -- Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska -- declined to comment on the issue.

"I don't think we should micromanage the war or tie the president's hands," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, a Virginia Republican who last month voted with Democrats to pass a nonbinding resolution disapproving of Mr. Bush's plan to deploy 21,500 more troops.

"The question of the surge was one of policy [and] an opportunity for me to express my frustration with the policy," Mr. Davis said. "But when it comes to conducting the war, that is the president's authority. ... We have to close ranks behind him and allow this [plan] to work."

Rep. Phil English of Pennsylvania, another Republican now supporting the president after helping pass the nonbinding resolution, called the Democrats' proposals "a direct body blow to U.S. troops."

Democrats have struggled to appease their anti-war support base while not exposing themselves to criticism for endangering troops in the field. Their leaders have continued to block proposals from some of their rank and file to cut off war funding, which is Congress' chief weapon and would end U.S. involvement in Iraq.

The leadership, nevertheless, remains determined to block the president's war plan with moves somewhat shy of pulling the funding plug.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, intends to put forward a plan to either curb funding or presidential war powers later this month.

"We are prepared to give the troops everything they need," Reid spokesman Jim Manley said. "The goal is to redeploy the troops and bring as many home as soon as possible."

House Democrats are considering putting conditions on the war funding, such as requiring the president to certify that troops meet stringent readiness standards before deployment, that would make it difficult if not impossible to deploy reinforcements.

A series of ideas to incrementally restrict funding have failed to gain traction, including a proposal last week by Rep. John P. Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat leading the anti-war push.

Mr. Murtha, chairman of the defense appropriations subcommittee, wants to effectively stop the surge in midstream by amending the war-funding bill to limit troops to one-year stints in Iraq with at least one year at home between deployments. The troops also would have to be certified as fully trained and equipped before being deployed.

"If they want to cut the funding, they ought to have the courage to stand up and do it forthright," said House Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican.

"So let's quit hiding in the shadow of the tree, trying to decide what [the Democrats'] strategy is," he said. "They have no strategy to stop the war. They have no strategy to win the war."

Panetta Dismayed By Party's War Debate (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

A senior Democratic adviser said yesterday he is disappointed and dismayed by the efforts of House and Senate Democrats to change administration policies in Iraq, predicting they would lead to further division and stalemate in Congress on the war.

DOJ_NMG_0138730

"If you stand back, the whole debate has been pretty frustrating. The bigger problem is that [Democratic leaders'] proposals are not going anywhere, such as some revised authority for the war," said Leon Panetta, a key Democratic member of the Iraq Study Group whose proposals to stabilize Iraq were largely dismissed by President Bush.

"But those efforts are doomed. Either they are going to be blocked in Congress or vetoed by the president, or both. The end result is that it will make us more divided and impotent on war policy," President Clinton's former White House chief of staff said in an interview with The Washington Times.

Mr. Panetta's blunt complaints about how his party has bungled the war debate underscores a partywide discomfort among many Democrats that their leaders have failed to craft a politically viable compromise that can draw some bipartisan support.

Instead of recent Democratic leadership proposals that would set strict requirements for troop readiness training and deployment, Mr. Panetta wants his party to set performance benchmarks for the Iraqi government, as suggested by the study group.

"The issue shouldn't be about the troops or fighting over what we do there. The issue ought to be over what the Iraqis do. That's where we ought to be focusing our pressure by saying with one voice to the Iraqis, this is what you ought to accomplish. They said they would implement a whole series of political reforms and have yet to do that," he said.

"Why can't they come up with a proposal to put more pressure on the Iraqis to hold them to these benchmarks," he said.

But other Democratic advisers aren't willing to give up on the possibility that Mr. Bush's troop surge may be able to reduce the violence in Baghdad and stabilize the country. They think the Democrats should give the administration six months before attempting to impose funding cuts or other sanctions against the war.

"A lot of [the Democrats'] efforts have been pointless," said Michael O'Hanlon, a senior foreign policy analyst at the Brookings Institution who advises Democrats on national security issues.

"So I think, rather than monkeying around [with anti-war legislation], they should wait until the fall and basically say, whether you like Bush's handling of the war or not, at least recognize it is reasonable that it could work and give it six more months," Mr. O'Hanlon said.

That view, though, appears to have little support among Democrats in Congress who have been trying to come up with legislation that can unite anti-war liberals who want to force a pullout and more moderate members who want other alternatives.

Despite the Democrats' midterm election victory, largely because of growing opposition to the war, Mr. O'Hanlon said. "I don't think the American public endorsed a Democratic alternative on Iraq. They became frustrated with Bush on his strategy and wanted that strategy challenged."

Vice President Says U.S. Troop Withdrawal From Iraq Could Worsen War In Afghanistan, Elsewhere (WP/AP)

By Tom Raum

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney said Thursday night that a too-soon withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq could send victorious militants spreading out, with some flocking to Afghanistan to fight alongside a regrouping Taliban. He demanded that the Democratic-controlled Congress support President Bush's military buildup "on time and in full."

Speaking before a receptive audience of conservatives, the vice president -- just back from a trip that included unannounced stops in Afghanistan and Pakistan -- sharply criticized efforts by some Democrats to restrict funds for additional troops or to place restrictions on their deployment.

While noting that the House had already passed a nonbinding resolution voicing opposition to Bush's Iraq policy, Cheney said that "very soon both houses of Congress will have to vote on a piece of legislation that is binding." The legislation would, among other things, help pay for the additional 21,500 troops Bush is sending to Iraq.

"I sincerely hope the discussion this time will be about winning in Iraq, not about posturing on Capitol Hill. Anyone can say they support the troops, and we should take them at their word. But the proof will come when it's time to provide the money and the support," Cheney said. "We expect the House and the Senate to meet those needs on time and in full."

The vice president spoke at an annual dinner of the Conservative Political Action Conference. The audience included conservative activists, leaders and policymakers.

Cheney mentioned his just-ended visits to Afghanistan and Pakistan. In Afghanistan, a bombing at the gate of the military base where the vice president was staying killed 23 people, including two Americans. The Taliban claimed the attack was aimed at Cheney, but officials said it posed no real threat to him.

During his visit to Pakistan, Cheney expressed concern to President Gen. Pervez Musharraf over al-Qaida's regrouping inside Pakistan's tribal regions and an expected Taliban spring offensive in neighboring Afghanistan.

"If our coalition withdrew before Iraqis could defend themselves, radical factions would battle for dominance. The violence would likely spread throughout the country and be very difficult to contain. Having tasted victory in Iraq, the (militants) would look for new missions. Many would head for Afghanistan to fight alongside the Taliban," Cheney said.

He said others would head for capitals across the Middle East and work to undermine moderate governments. "Still others would find their targets and victims in other countries on other continents. Such chaos and mounting danger does not have to occur. It is, however, the enemy's objective," Cheney said.

"In these circumstances, it's worth reminding ourselves that, like it or not, the enemy we face in the war on terror has made Iraq the primary front in that war," he added. Then, to laughter and applause, Cheney said, "To use a popular phrase, this is an inconvenient truth."

It was a play on the Academy Award-winning environmental documentary featuring former Vice President Al Gore, "An Inconvenient Truth."

"If you support the war on terror, then it only makes sense to support it where the terrorists are fighting us," Cheney said.

Cheney also recited a litany of conservative themes and goals, invoking the memory of Ronald Reagan and calling on Congress to "make all tax cuts permanent" that were enacted in Bush's first term.

"You've come to Washington at a very eventful time, with a new Congress at work and some very consequential debates under way," Cheney said.

"With a divided government, and strong feelings on both sides of the aisle, getting things done is a bit more of a challenge than it was before. But the American people expect results and the president and I are committed to working with Congress for the good of the country. What we will not do is abandon the conservative principles we ran on in 2000 and 2004."

Baghdad Sees Day With Little Bloodshed (USAT/AP)

USA Today, March 2, 2007

BAGHDAD — Baghdad experienced one of its least violent days in months Thursday when there were two reported bombings and one fatality.

The relative lull in violence came in the third week of a U.S.-Iraqi plan to improve security in Baghdad. President Bush has ordered an increase of 17,500 U.S. troops in the capital to conduct house-to-house searches and help disarm sectarian militias.

A U.S. military report said Monday that the number of roadside bombs was down 20% since the security initiative began in mid-February and sectarian murders were at their lowest levels in a year.

The day was not completely calm. A bomb exploded on a minibus carrying employees of the capital's provincial council, killing one person and injuring four in an eastern neighborhood.

A roadside bomb exploded alongside the convoy of Jalal Eddin al-Sagheer, a prominent Shiite cleric whose ties to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki have made him the target of past assassination attempts. The imam was not injured, but several bodyguards were wounded.

Al-Sagheer said his convoy was blasted in a Sunni area of southwest Baghdad en route from the airport.

"They targeted me again," he said but declined to blame any specific group. Al-Sagheer has had close calls in the past, which he said were linked to his denunciations of Sunni insurgents and foreign jihadists such as al-Qaeda in Iraq.

There was artillery fire in Baghdad after nightfall. In recent days, U.S. gunners have pummeled areas of south Baghdad suspected of being a staging ground for car bombings and other attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0138732

U.S. and Iraqi forces discussed an agreement to expand the security sweep into the Shiite stronghold of Sadr City. Such a move would test the willingness of the powerful Mahdi Army militia to grant its American foes access to all parts of Baghdad under its control.

Sadr City leaders and a U.S.-Iraqi military delegation studied plans to establish an "operational base" in the district, said Rahim al-Daraji, one of the two mayors of Sadr City. "We discussed ways to coordinate … and define the movements of these troops," he said.

Also Thursday:

•In the Sunni militant stronghold of Fallujah, 40 miles west of Baghdad, a bomb-rigged car exploded near a convoy heading to a police officer's wedding. At least five people were killed and 10 injured, police Lt. Wessam Mohammad said. The bride and groom were not harmed.

•In his first interview since he was hospitalized Sunday, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said he was in good health and would return to his country but gave no date.

"I enjoy good health, despite the rumors you've heard," Talabani, 73, told Associated Press Television News at the King Hussein Medical Center, a hospital in the Jordanian capital of Amman.

Talabani collapsed Sunday in northern Iraq, suffering from exhaustion and dehydration caused by lung and sinus infections. He was flown to Jordan for treatment later the same day.

Pentagon Stays Cautious But Sees Progress In Iraq (AFP)

AFP, March 2, 2007

Three weeks after the launch of the new US strategy in Iraq, Pentagon officials were cautious Thursday saying early signs were good, but that it was too soon to make concrete conclusions.

"I would say, just looking at the reports from the people on the ground ... I think their assessment would be, 'It's too early to draw any conclusions,' because this is still in the early stages," Pentagon number two Gordon England said.

But the deputy defense secretary acknowledged at a Senate committee hearing on the 2008 budget that there had been reports of fewer sectarian killings in the country.

Admiral Edmund Giambastiani, the deputy chief-of-staff, stressed that the US administration was not prepared to make definite conclusions on "just a week or two of statistics to indicate an overall trend."

"However, we do see sectarian killings are down right now. And that's substantial. And we hope that that trend continues. But it's not really a trend yet," he told the committee.

Giambastiani said he had talked to Lieutenant General David Petraeus the commander of US forces in Iraq on Wednesday "and he relayed that the sectarian killings are down."

"One other potential bright spot -- potential, I mention -- is that the sectarian migration from Baghdad, for example, and throughout the country, is also down."

The US Army announced on February 7 that the US-Iraq security plan unveiled in January by President George W. Bush was being fully implemented.

Under the plan, Bush, the commander-in-chief of US forces, is deploying some 21,500 extra US combat troops to Iraq to quell the violence in Baghdad and Anbar province.

Iraq's Displaced Trickle Home (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

BAGHDAD — At a time of epic displacement, Fuad Khamis has done something extraordinary: He has moved back home.

"When I arrived, I was overwhelmed and frightened at the same time," says Khamis, a Sunni Arab taxi driver from Baghdad's religiously mixed Sadiya neighborhood.

His house was damaged and there wasn't a piece of furniture left. But the father of five says his Shiite neighbors have welcomed him back with hugs and kisses.

DOJ_NMG_0138733

Encouraged by a major security clampdown that began Feb. 13, and reassurances from his neighbors, Khamis is one of the first to test Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's recent pledge to reverse the tide of sectarian "cleansing" sweeping Baghdad and move tens of thousands of people back home.

Launched after years of unchecked violence between Sunni Arabs and Shiites, the program faces major hurdles, including a dearth of confidence among many of the city's residents in the government's ability to secure their neighborhoods.

"I believe in miracles and fairy tales, but not in the government's intention or ability to move the displaced back into their homes," says Hussein Azaidi, a Shiite Muslim with years of poverty etched on his face who now finds shelter in an abandoned school in Baghdad's teeming Sadr City area.

Even if the government can convince families that their old neighborhoods are safe, there is no guarantee they can regain their homes. Many residences have been looted or torched, others commandeered by gunmen or occupied by families fleeing violence elsewhere.

U.S. reservations

Maliki has taken a tough line, labeling as terrorists everyone living in homes that were taken by force and informing parliament they would be arrested.

But the U.S. military, which is to contribute 17,500 troops to the Baghdad crackdown, says its forces won't help the government evict squatters. U.S. officials believe it is a recipe for further abuses.

"It's a no-win situation," says Col. Douglass S. Heckman, senior U.S. advisor to the 9th Iraqi Army Division in east Baghdad.

Acknowledging the complications, Iraq's Cabinet on Thursday gave occupants an extra two weeks to vacate the homes of the displaced or obtain written permission to remain.

Maliki's government does not have the means to carry out a major resettlement program. Abdul Samad Sultan, minister of migration and displacement, expects many families will go home on their own once they see it is safe. They are being offered about $200 to help with the cost of the move. Apart from that, Sultan can only offer to issue badges allowing their return to contested areas and ask their erstwhile neighbors to write letters welcoming them back.

"I think that the Iraqi people have big hearts and can forgive the past," Sultan says. "They have seen the results of violence."

As many as 1,000 families have trickled back to areas such as Madaen, Shaab and Mahmoudiya, the Migration Ministry says. But they are a small portion of the total number of displaced.

Across Iraq, as many as 540,000 people have fled their homes since February 2006, when the bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra unleashed waves of sectarian killing, according to a recent report by the Santa Monica-based International Medical Corps. About 80% of the displaced are from the greater Baghdad area, the group says.

The government's resettlement plan hinges on the ability of the U.S.-backed army and police to clear out sectarian gunmen and maintain a presence so the criminals do not return, as they have in the past. But many residents say they feel safer under the protection of their sects' militias than the government.

Azaidi lived most of his life in Balad Ruz, a religiously mixed town northeast of Baghdad. When he sent his son to the market one afternoon, Sunni Arab gunmen snatched the youth, beat him to a bloody mess and sent him home with a message: Leave within three days or suffer the consequences.

The next morning, Azaidi moved his family to Sadr City, the stronghold of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr and his powerful Al Mahdi militia.

It was Sadr's representatives who found Azaidi a place to stay and helped him collect his monthly food ration.

But Sunnis accuse the same movement of driving them out of Sadr City and many formerly mixed districts. Hoping to avoid a showdown, Sadr officials have endorsed the security crackdown and invited Sunnis to return to Sadr City — an offer few show any sign of accepting.

Warning under the door

Each wave of displacement has fueled the next as gunmen in one neighborhood force out members of the rival sect to make room for their co-religionists fleeing other districts.

DOJ_NMG_0138734

Sabah Hassan, a Sunni police officer, ignored the first warning to leave the religiously mixed Amal neighborhood, which was slipped under his door last year, tucked into an envelope with a bullet. But when two of his brothers were abducted, he fled, leaving furniture, identification documents and a lifetime of memories behind.

The next day, Hassan sent his mother back to the house to collect a few belongings. But members of the local Sadr bureau had already moved in a displaced Shiite family, he said, and painted a warning on the wall: "Not to be rented or sold."

In some neighborhoods, families have asked neighbors to keep an eye on their homes, or rented them out to members of the dominant sect in their area.

For months, Hussain Mansour held out as fellow Sunnis fled the whispered warnings, threatening letters, cruising gunmen and bullet-riddled bodies that appeared overnight in his mostly Shiite neighborhood of Kadhimiya.

A year ago, gunmen burst into the home of Mansour's devout brother and shot him in the face in front of his family. Last summer, his uncle was gunned down as he carried groceries home. When Mansour went to the local Al Mahdi militiamen to ask for protection, he said most of them laughed.

"They were making fun of me, telling me they would skin me alive," he said. "I have never been so afraid."

Finally, a Shiite neighbor came to Mansour with a proposal. The man's relatives lived in a Sunni part of Baghdad and had received an anonymous letter demanding that they leave. Why not swap houses?

Mansour, a sad-eyed shopkeeper whom friends had called "the last of the Mohicans," didn't think twice. But he is miserable with the arrangement.

His new home is smaller, the furniture is old, and the roof leaks. But it's not just his house that he misses. "It's my memories, my childhood, it's where I grew up," he says. "No one wants to bury his good memories."

If Maliki's plan works, Mansour says, he will be the first to move back. But he holds out little hope.

The plan targets only Baghdad residents forced from their homes since the Samarra bombing — a small fraction of the total affected by decades of displacement stretching back to the darkest days of Saddam Hussein's rule.

About 1.8 million of Iraq's 26 million people have been internally displaced, and about 2 million others have fled to nearby countries, according to the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, which calls the exodus the largest movement of people in the Middle East since the creation of Israel in 1948.

Many still waiting

Iraq's government has had little success untangling previous rounds of displacement. Thousands of ethnic Kurds still live in squalid camps around the oil-rich city of Kirkuk, waiting for authorities to resolve property disputes dating back to their relocation under Hussein's policy of "Arabization," introduced in the 1970s.

In the mostly Shiite south, Sunni Arabs face mounting pressure from paramilitary groups such as Al Mahdi and the rival Badr Brigade.

Many have fled to Sunni-dominated cities in the center and north of Iraq but have struggled to adjust.

Humanitarian workers suggest that it would be more realistic to help the displaced find homes and jobs in their new communities than to try to send them home.

But, says Rafiq Tschannen, the International Organization for Migration's chief for Iraq, "nobody has the courage to admit that it is likely to be permanent."

"Pain filled my heart," he says, the day he left Sadiya after receiving a threatening letter. Now U.S. and Iraqi forces patrol the neighborhood.

If they stay, so will Khamis. Otherwise, he says, he will leave Iraq for good.

'Surge' Needs Up To 7,000 More Troops (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's planned increase of U.S. forces in Iraq will require as many as 28,500 troops, Pentagon officials told a Senate committee Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0138735

Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England also told the Senate Budget Committee that it will be clear within months whether the so-called surge in forces has succeeded in helping secure Iraq.

"By this summer we would have a much better indication in terms of the success of the program," England said. "And so at that time we would adjust however is appropriate to do so."

In January, Bush said he would send 21,500 more combat troops to Iraq. England said 6,000 to 7,000 support troops will be needed to back up the larger combat force.

England's estimate differed from a Congressional Budget Office (CBO) estimate last month that as many as 28,000 extra troops would be needed to support the increase.

Requests already have been granted for 2,400 support troops, said Adm. Edmund Giambastiani, vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. He said there are additional requests for 4,000 more.

Existing logistics bases, many of them in and around Baghdad, will limit the number of new support troops needed, Giambastiani said.

There are about 10,000 soldiers in Iraq now associated with the troop increase, according to Lt. Col. Carl Ey, an Army spokesman. In all, there are about 140,000 U.S. troops now in Iraq.

The increase in troops is expected to peak in May, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

Pentagon officials stressed that the additional troops will be properly equipped. Army Brig. Gen. Charles Anderson, director of force modernization, said in a briefing this week that they will have the body and vehicle armor they need.

Giambastiani also said the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan had affected the military's ability to deal with threats from other countries but not its ability to win a conflict.

"What will happen is there will be some added risk with regard to the time it takes us to be victorious or to win," he said. "And, potentially, you'll have some additional casualties. But let there be no mistake: We can get our job done if another crisis comes about."

Meanwhile, top members of the Senate Budget Committee scoffed at Pentagon estimates that the troop increase would cost $5.6 billion. By contrast, the CBO estimated the cost of sustaining 35,000 troops there, and determined it could be as much as $20 billion.

"Put me down as a skeptic on the $5.6 billion," said Senate Budget Chairman Kent Conrad, D-N.D.

"It's obvious the $5.6 billion is a number that's not accurate," added Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., the panel's top Republican.

7 At A Baghdad Wedding Are Killed By A Car Bomb (NYT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

BAGHDAD, March 1 — A car bomb that was apparently aimed at a policeman's wedding party in Falluja, west of Baghdad, killed seven guests on Thursday and wounded six, the local police said.

The attack appeared to be part of a mounting battle in western Iraq between insurgents with ties to Al Qaeda and other local and tribal groups, local residents said.

The bomb exploded in the late afternoon as the wedding party was gathering at the home of the groom, a policeman. Neither the bride nor the groom was wounded, but those killed were friends and relatives of the couple, said Abu Khalid, a cousin of the groom.

"Extremists are targeting the police, especially after the police increased arrests and pressure on members of armed groups in the last two weeks," he said, noting that there had been bombings in two nearby towns, including one at a mosque in Habbaniya that killed more than 30 people.

Falluja, in the Sunni-dominated Anbar Province about 35 miles west of Baghdad, has been a violent place since shortly after the American invasion in 2003. In 2004, it became an informal headquarters for the anti-American insurgency. After a lengthy United States military campaign emptied much of the city later that year, it was briefly quiet.

Violence has been increasing there in the past several months, with attacks by insurgents against local residents who want the gunmen to leave the area and counterattacks by local and tribal groups.

DOJ_NMG_0138736

A similar fight was under way on Thursday in Amiriyat al Falluja, a community just to the south, where insurgents whom residents described as being allied with Al Qaeda attacked. Two groups that have had ties to insurgents, the Islamic Party Fighters and forces of the 20th Revolution brigade, counterattacked in support of the local residents, apparently having turned against those insurgents because of their links to Al Qaeda.

The United States military also announced that a marine was killed by enemy fire on Wednesday in Anbar Province.

In Baghdad, where a new security plan is in its third week, the daylight hours were relatively quiet, with one civilian killed by an explosive device. Around 9:30 p.m., there was a battery of large explosions and a period of quiet and then more explosions, but there was only sketchy information about their origin.

The Ministry of Defense said that the blasts had come from the area of an American base in southern Baghdad and that they appeared to have been American attacks against insurgent strongholds in a violent Sunni neighborhood called Dora.

The Iraqi government announced Thursday that it had arrested 83 militants and rounded up 55 other suspects in the previous 24 hours. Troops also seized weapons and explosives, the government said.

In Baquba, north of Baghdad, the police found the bodies of nine people, some of whom had been shot. It was not clear how the others had died. In Mahaweel, about 40 miles south of Baghdad, a bomb exploded in a busy market, killing seven people, the local police said.

Before dawn on Thursday, an OH-58 Kiowa helicopter, generally used for reconnaissance, was forced to make a hard landing south of Kirkuk, the military said. The two soldiers on board were injured, but the injuries were not life threatening, the military said.

A military spokesman said a preliminary investigation found that the helicopter's problems were caused by mechanical failure, not hostile fire. In recent weeks, ground fire has downed at least eight helicopters.

Iraqi Troops, Tribesmen Kill 50 Suspected Insurgents (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

BAGHDAD, March 1 -- Iraqi security forces backed by Sunni tribesmen killed dozens of suspected Sunni insurgents over several hours of fighting Wednesday in a village in western Iraq, Iraqi police officials said Thursday.

The fighting was unusually fierce for an Iraqi-led operation and was also notable because of the collaboration of tribesmen in volatile Anbar province. In recent months, the U.S. military has aligned itself with dozens of tribal sheiks who are collaborating in an effort to drive the Sunni insurgent group Al-Qaeda in Iraq from the vast desert territory.

The clashes on Wednesday began about 1 p.m. when insurgents attacked a village near Fallujah, about 35 miles west of Baghdad, and ended about six hours later when Iraqi soldiers, police and the tribal fighters killed 50 suspected insurgents and captured 80 others, according to Abdul-Karim Khalaf, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry. Khalaf declined to say how many Iraqi security personnel were killed or injured.

"This is part of the Interior Ministry strategy to support the Baghdad security plan in targeting terrorism in the areas surrounding Baghdad," he said. "The tribes in this area refused to join al-Qaeda."

Two U.S. Marines died in apparently unrelated fighting in Anbar on Wednesday, the military said. The Marines' name were not released.

In Baghdad, a U.S. military commander said American and Iraqi forces would launch "full-scale operations" inside the expansive Shiite district of Sadr City, according to [a] news agency. U.S. forces do not maintain a visible, full-time presence in the militia stronghold but have increasingly used targeted raids to capture leaders of the Mahdi Army, the thousands-strong band of gunmen led by anti-American Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. The district is highly sensitive politically, both because Sadr is a supporter of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and because the Mahdi Army, which fought U.S. forces in two major battles in 2004, has the capability of amassing a formidable force.

"We have conducted special operations in Sadr City for some months, but this will be the first time we will launch full-scale operations there and the first time we will have a permanent presence there," Col. Billy Don Farris, commander of the 82nd Airborne Division's 2nd Brigade, told [a news agency].

"We are going to go to every building and every house and incrementally clear the area," he said.

A spokesman for Sadr, Abdul Razak al-Nadawi, said the Mahdi Army would not react with force to U.S. operations because Sadr has asked his followers to "calm down and to show self-control against what is done by the occupation."

As the Baghdad security plan entered its third week, an additional 3,100 U.S. soldiers from the 4th Brigade, 1st Infantry Division, based at Fort Riley in Kansas, arrived in the capital, bringing the total number of new U.S. troops to nearly 6,000. President Bush is sending 21,500 troops to Iraq in an attempt to stem rampant sectarian fighting.

Also Thursday, two U.S. military pilots were injured when an Army OH-58 Kiowa helicopter endured a so-called hard landing south of Kirkuk, in northern Iraq. The military said the helicopter did not appear to have been shot down and instead landed because of mechanical problems.

A resident of a nearby village said he heard a loud crash about 1 a.m. and saw the helicopter on the ground later that morning. The damaged helicopter was taken by truck to the main U.S. air base in Kirkuk.

New Signs Of US-Syria Thaw As Senior Official Sets Visit (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, March 2, 2007

Washington announced Thursday that it was sending a high-ranking official to Syria for the first time in two years, a move seen as a fresh sign of a possible thaw between Washington and Damascus.

Assistant Secretary of State Ellen Sauerbrey will travel to Damascus "in coming weeks" as part of a regional tour dealing with "humanitarian issues related to Iraqi refugees," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

Seeking to play down the diplomatic significance of the trip, McCormack said Sauerbrey would be "paired" on the tour with a representative of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). "It's not a bilateral mission," he said.

But he said Sauerbrey, who handles refugee and migration affairs at the State Department, would be authorized to meet with her Syrian counterparts to discuss the refugee issue.

She will also visit Jordan and possibly other countries in the region, he said.

Sauerbrey will be the highest ranking US official to visit Syria since early 2005, when Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage travelled to Damascus.

The United States withdrew its ambassador from Syria after Syrian authorities were implicated in the February 2005 assassination in Beirut of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq Hariri.

The administration of President George W. Bush has since refused high-level contacts with Syria, which it accuses of backing anti-US insurgents in neighboring Iraq and supporting efforts by the Lebanese Islamic movement Hezbollah to topple the pro-Western government of Lebanon.

But in a sudden policy shift, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced this week that she and other US officials would join their Syrian and Iranian counterparts in coming weeks at conferences on Iraq's future.

McCormack has refused to rule out bilateral contacts with Syrian and Iranian officials on the sidelines of those meetings, leaving the door ajar for what would amount to a major switch in Bush's policy of shunning what he considers rogue regimes.

The government had already lifted its diplomatic boycott on North Korea, holding bilateral meetings in recent weeks which helped produce a breakthrough six-nation deal two weeks ago under which Pyongyang agreed to the phased abandonment of its nuclear program in exchange for aid and recognition.

Senior officials from the two governments will begin direct negotiations in New York next week on normalizing relations as part of that agreement.

McCormack and other government spokesmen insisted this week that Washington is not ready for such a rapprochement with either Syria or Iran, saying any bilateral contacts in coming weeks would deal only with Iraq-related issues.

They explicitly ruled out any direct talks on Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program or Syrian desires to regain influence in Lebanon, a country it occupied until mass protests forced it to withdraw its troops after Hariri's slaying.

He said Sauerbrey's talks would focus solely on the crisis created by some two million Iraqis who have fled the sectarian bloodshed in their country, 600,000 of them to Syria and another 600,000 to Jordan.

Criticized earlier this year for its response to the refugee crisis fueled by its 2003 invasion of Iraq, Washington announced a series of measures last month, including boosting aid to the UNHCR and taking in 7,000 Iraqi asylum seekers.

Sauerbrey's mission in Syria will be to follow up on those plans, McCormack said.

"There's a point of mutual interest here," he said.

"They have an interest in dealing with the problem of refugee flows into Syria and the humanitarian situation there. We have an interest in seeing that the humanitarian situation is addressed," he said.

"On that point, certainly we want to work together."

Vietnamese Refugees Identify With Iraqis (USAT)

USA Today, March 2, 2007

My parents arrived in the United States as political refugees from an unpopular war. As part of the first wave of South Vietnamese refugees fleeing their country after the fall of Saigon, they had little choice in the transpacific move. To remain in Vietnam meant risking poverty, political persecution and possibly death. America was their opportunity to rebuild their lives, but they knew better than to think it would be easy.

Many Americans who wanted to forget about the war saw the Vietnamese refugees as painful reminders of the lives the country lost. A 1975 poll found that only 36% of Americans favored Vietnamese immigration. For my parents, still reeling from the end of the war and the separation from their families, this sentiment reminded them their struggles were not over. Their accents gave them away. When asking for help, they got responses such as: "Can't you speak proper English?" "You are not welcome here."

My parents are the first to point out how rarely these incidents occurred, though the ugly words stick in their memories decades later. What they prefer to remember instead are the Americans who did welcome them; the church volunteers and government employees who taught them English, signed them up for driving lessons, prepared them for job interviews. They helped create an environment where Vietnamese-American communities could grow, a place my family now considers home. My parents saw their generosity and patience as the very best of America.

These are qualities necessary to help a new generation of refugees emerging from our most recent war. With the Iraqi refugees count nearing 2 million, according to United Nations reports, and the U.S. government's recent plans to welcome 7,000 refugees for resettlement, a new community of Iraqi-Americans is inevitable. How Americans plan to respond to them and facilitate their resettlement is crucial. Certainly the culture shock will be immense, as it was for Vietnamese refugees. Iraqi refugees will not only have to deal with a new language and customs, but also the fear of anti-Iraqi sentiment. Considering the role U.S. foreign policy has had on Iraqis' lives and displacement, it is the government's responsibility to offer them the resources to salvage their community.

A new exhibit on the Vietnamese immigration experience recently opened at the Smithsonian in Washington, chronicling how far the Vietnamese-American community has come in 30 years. It is living proof that some good can come from a terrible war. America can help Iraqi refugees create a similar future.

How Much Embassy Is Too Much? (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Mention the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad to Lawrence Eagleburger and he explodes.

"I defy anyone to tell me how you can use that many people. It is nuts . . . it's insane and it's counterproductive . . . and it won't work," says the Republican former secretary of state and member of the Iraq Study Group. "I've been around the State Department long enough to know you can't run an outfit like that."

DOJ_NMG_0138739

The nerve center of Iraq reconstruction efforts, housed in an ornate former Saddam Hussein palace with soaring ceilings and its own espresso bar, the embassy in Baghdad is one of the largest foreign missions ever operated by the State Department. Its complexity and expense, some say, hampers reconstruction efforts and drains cash from diplomatic efforts worldwide.

According to a State Department count, about 1,000 federal employees report to the U.S. Embassy in Iraq, not including hundreds of private contractors. State Department personnel are assigned to roughly half the slots in Baghdad, and the rest are reserved for an array of agencies, including about 90 from the Justice Department, 20 from the Department of Homeland Security, and four each from the Commerce Department and the Transportation Department. They are needed, officials say, to rebuild transit and mail services, to assist small businesses, to advise politicians and peasants.

The mission's closely guarded budget is a source of controversy at State, and across the federal government. At $923 million for the 2006 fiscal year, the budget was 20 times that of the Beijing embassy's that year, according to the State Department. More than two-thirds of the money pays for security. Salaries for about 600 staff from other federal agencies are not included in that figure, nor are some expenses.

"Maintaining an oversized mega-embassy in Baghdad is draining personnel and resources away from every other U.S. embassy around the world, and all for what?" said a senior State Department official, who spoke anonymously because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Travel outside the Green Zone requires a security entourage and involves weeks of organization. The embassy is seen as a key target for violence, which, along with fear of reprisals, makes many Iraqis afraid to visit. Consequently, Americans who work there see relatively few of the people they are there to help.

"Diplomats, in order to carry out their mission, need to be able to get out regularly and move about freely to cultivate professional relationships with a broad cross-section of contacts in local government and society," said Steve Kashkett, State Department vice president for the American Foreign Service Association, the department's labor union and professional association. "If security conditions prevent them from doing so, it raises legitimate questions about the usefulness of a heavily staffed embassy."

"Just because we can't travel as freely as in a European capital doesn't mean we can't do our job," said a State Department official who declined to be named because he wasn't authorized to speak for the record.

The teeming embassy masks a desperate need for civilians to aid the reconstruction effort. To lure more, federal employees are offered 70 percent more than their base salaries for Iraq service, plus overtime, or special premiums for working long hours, according to the Office of Personnel Management. It is possible for senior employees to earn more than the secretary of state, who makes $186,600 a year. Kashkett said 1,700 diplomats have stepped up for Iraq service since 2003 -- about 20 percent of those eligible to go. The State Department has discussed drafting personnel.

Turkey Late To Wish Talabani Well (WT)

By Nicholas Birch

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

ISTANBUL -- Messages of good will have been flooding in since Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, an ethnic Kurd, was hospitalized in Jordan on Sunday. But a get-well wish from Turkey, one of Iraq's large neighbors, did not come until yesterday.

Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan called Mr. Talabani to convey his get-well wishes, an aide to Mr. Erdogan said.

"They had a brief conversation. Mr. Talabani said he believed that Turkey and Iraq can work together to quickly overcome their problems," the official told Agence France-Presse.

Mr. Talabani collapsed Sunday in northern Iraq from exhaustion and dehydration caused by lung and sinus infections. He was flown to Jordan for treatment later that day.

The delayed reaction from Turkey is not altogether surprising: It took Ankara nearly 70 years and over 20 Kurdish rebellions to get around to acknowledging the existence of its own Kurds. But with Iraq at a critical juncture, analysts fear its reticence limits its effectiveness as a regional power.

DOJ_NMG_0138740

Washington agreed this week to participate in an international conference on Iraq, but Turkey itself remains embroiled in a bitter row about whether or not to talk to Iraq's federal Kurdish authorities.

For months, Ankara has been pressuring Washington to do something about 5,000 Turkish Kurdish separatists in northern Iraq.

Tensions between Ankara and the Iraqi Kurds have been running high over the safe haven Turkish Kurd rebels reportedly have in the autonomous Kurdish region in northern Iraq, led by Massoud Barzani.

The Turkish army last month accused Iraqi Kurds of supporting the rebels and providing them with explosives for attacks in Turkey.

Despite objections from the military, Mr. Erdogan and Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul have both said Ankara is open to dialogue with the Iraqi Kurds to mend fences and discuss ways of curbing the rebels, contrary to earlier Turkish threats of a cross-border military operation into the region.

Two weeks ago, under U.S. pressure, Turkey half-heartedly signaled its willingness to begin talking with Iraqi Kurds. It hastily beat a retreat after Yasar Buyukanit, Turkey's top general, expressed his opposition.

Iraqi Kurds deny Gen. Buyukanit's assertions they are helping the separatists. While the Iraqi Kurds may be right, analysts say there is little doubt the Iraqis see the Turkish separatists as a potential bargaining chip in their efforts to get their hands on the oil-rich city of Kirkuk at a referendum planned for later this year.

"They won't do anything until the referendum," Turkish analyst Cengiz Candar said.

Every day brings reports of new Turkish military exercises on Iraq's northern border. Turkish nationalists have been calling for the army to push down to Kirkuk to protect the Turkish-speaking Turkmen community there. A Turkish Kurdish politician said last week that Turkey's Kurds would consider an attack on Kirkuk as an attack on themselves. He was promptly arrested and charged with "inciting enmity."

Turkish commentators say much of this noise is part of a struggle for domestic control between Turkey's religious-minded government and secularists led by the military.

"They're like kids throwing stones at each other," said veteran analyst Mehmet Ali Birand. Both sides have their eyes on presidential elections expected in May. Mr. Erdogan is considering running. Deeply suspicious of him, the army is determined to stop him.

But the pushing and shoving comes at a price.

"How can Turkey hope to lead regional efforts to find a solution on Iraq" if it recognizes neither Iraq's president, nor the internationally acknowledged leader of federal Iraqi Kurdistan, Mr. Candar said.

Pakistan Captures Former Taliban Official (LAT)

By Laura King And Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN — Pakistani authorities have arrested the former defense minister of the Taliban, the most senior insurgent leader to be seized in five years, a government official said Thursday.

The Pakistani government issued no immediate official statement about the detention of Mullah Obaidullah Akhund this week in the southern city of Quetta.

Local news reports said Akhund was detained Monday, the day U.S. Vice President Dick Cheney arrived for an unannounced visit to urge President Pervez Musharraf to take more robust steps against Islamic militants finding haven in Pakistan's tribal region bordering Afghanistan.

A U.S. intelligence official said the Pakistani government had mobilized in an effort to show that it was serious about cracking down on the Taliban and other extremist elements in the country.

"The fact that the Pakistanis captured him and are making this known — it shows that they are making a commitment, and that they want to demonstrate that they are committed and doing what they can in this area," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter.

He added that Akhund's capture was "a very significant development but it by no means marks the end of the Taliban."

DOJ_NMG_0138741

The U.S. official said that Akhund, in his former Cabinet post, had access to the highest levels of the Taliban.

"As defense minister, was he knowledgeable about Taliban operations, logistics and other matters? Yes," the U.S. official said. "He was a senior official in the Taliban, not of the level of Mullah Omar but a significant figure nonetheless."

Several other Taliban figures were arrested in the Quetta raid, a Pakistani government official said on condition of anonymity.

Although Pakistan is a key ally in the U.S.-led fight against the Taliban, the cause is unpopular in many parts of the country, and the Pakistani government has been reluctant to appear too compliant with U.S. demands.

Quetta, the capital of Baluchistan province, which borders Afghanistan, has long been viewed as a staging ground for the Taliban, though the Pakistani government strenuously denies harboring the Islamic militia. Akhund is a close associate of Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar, a fugitive since 2001.

Last year, Taliban fighters staged their strongest push against allied troops in Afghanistan since being driven from power more than five years ago. More than 4,000 people, mostly militants, died in fighting there last year, and both the Taliban movement and North Atlantic Treaty Organization officials have said they expect confrontations to intensify as the winter ends.

Akhund's arrest is the most high-profile seizure of a Taliban leader inside Pakistan. A spokesman for the militia, Abdul Latif Hakimi, was arrested here in 2005.

The U.S. military has killed some senior Taliban commanders in pinpoint strikes, including Mullah Akhtar Mohammed Osmani, who died in an allied airstrike in December in a remote area of Helmand province, just across the border from Baluchistan.

Mullah Omar, thought to still be a main leader of the insurgency, has eluded capture despite a $25-million bounty on his head.

Much of the militia's day-to-day command is thought to lie with an associate, Mullah Dadullah, who has made frequent public boasts that the Taliban this spring will make its strongest push yet against NATO-led forces.

Pressed By U.S., Pakistan Seizes A Taliban Chief (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, March 1 — The former Taliban defense minister was arrested in Pakistan on Monday, the day of Vice President Dick Cheney's visit, two government officials said Thursday. He is the most important Taliban member to be captured since the American-led invasion of Afghanistan in 2001.

The man, Mullah Obaidullah, was a senior leader of the Afghan insurgency, which has battled American and NATO forces with increasing intensity over the last year.

He is one of the inner core around Mullah Muhammad Omar, the Taliban leader. The leadership is believed to operate from the relative safety of Quetta, Pakistan, where Mullah Obaidullah was arrested.

It was not clear whether he was picked up before, during or after Mr. Cheney's visit. But the timing may be significant because Mr. Cheney's mission was intended to press Pakistan to do more to crack down on members of the Taliban and Al Qaeda who use Pakistan as a sanctuary.

Pakistan has come under rising criticism from American and NATO officials for acting against the Taliban and Al Qaeda only under pressure, conducting operations or making arrests timed for high-level official visits, then backing off.

While Mullah Obaidullah's detention may be a sign of a new commiment by Pakistan to move against the Taliban leadership, the arrest also seemed to confirm Western and Afghan intelligence reports that the Taliban were using Pakistan, and particularly Quetta, to organize their insurgency.

Pakistani officials have strenuously denied that the Taliban leadership is based in Pakistan, and there was no official announcement of the detention. But two government officials confirmed the arrest.

A NATO spokesman in Afghanistan, Col. Tom Collins, said he was not aware of any arrest. American government officials in Washington confirmed the capture, but cautioned that the arrest was unlikely to deal a significant setback to the insurgents.

DOJ_NMG_0138742

"He's a big fish, but nobody around here thinks this will deal a permanent blow to the operations of the Taliban," said one American government official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the arrest had not been formally announced.

Last year, NATO forces in southern Afghanistan bore the brunt of a resurgent Taliban. They have lost 85 service members since taking over command of southern Afghanistan in August, in suicide bombings, ambushes and often heavy fighting. Commanders and diplomats say it has become increasingly clear that control of the Taliban fighters traced back to Pakistan.

Over the past five months, Pakistan has come under more constant pressure for cooperation than ever, an American official in Afghanistan said recently. Democrats in Congress have raised the possibility of tying military assistance and other financial aid for Pakistan to its performance in fighting terrorism.

President Bush sent an unusually tough message to President Pervez Musharraf, timed to coincide with Mr. Cheney's visit, senior administration officials said.

Pakistani officials answer the criticism by pointing out that their own military has suffered more than any other, losing more than 600 soldiers in fighting with the militants, before the campaigns bogged down and the government reached peace deals with some tribal leaders.

Pakistani intelligence services also assisted the United States military in tracking another top Taliban official, Mullah Akhtar Muhammad Osmani, who was killed Dec. 19 in an American airstrike in southern Afghanistan.

Mullah Osmani was the Taliban's main financial official and was operating both in Pakistan and Afghanistan, and his death was considered an important blow to the insurgents, Colonel Collins said.

The former Taliban foreign minister, Mullah Wakil Ahmad Muttawakil, was detained by American forces in 2002 but was released in 2005 under a government reconciliation program. One of the Taliban's top military commanders, Mullah Fazel, remains imprisoned in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, along with the former Taliban governor of Balkh Province.

Mullah Obaidullah is originally from Panjwai district of Kandahar Province in southern Afghanistan. As recently as December, he gave an interview to [a news agency], boasting that the Taliban had gained in strength and could fight the world's strongest armies, and threatening to step up suicide attacks against foreign military personnel in Afghanistan.

He was often mentioned as being among the four most senior men of what is known as the Quetta Council, the inner circle around Mullah Omar, which is thought to have based itself in or near the city, in southwestern Pakistan.

A former Taliban spokesman, Abdul Latif Hakimi, who was himself arrested in 2005 by the police in Quetta, said Mullah Obaidullah was one of only two people who had direct access to Mullah Omar. He also said that Mullah Obaidullah had personally ordered military operations, including the killing of a foreign aid official in Kabul in March 2005.

Bomb Kills 3 Near School

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 1 — A bomb exploded Thursday in a garbage bin on a crowded shopping street in Farah, in the southwest, killing three civilians and wounding more than 54, including 10 schoolchildren, said Dr. Mohammad Qasim Bayan, the director of health in Farah Province.

The bomb exploded just after 8 a.m. at a busy intersection where laborers gather looking for work and children pass on their way to school. A police convoy was passing at the time of the explosion and the Farah city police chief, Said Aqa Saqib, said he suspected it was a remote-controlled bomb aimed at the convoy.

Chief Saqib said violence was spilling over from Helmand Province, where the Taliban seized control of much of the northern districts, and was aggravated by the government's campaign to eradicate the poppy crop.

An Uneasy Alliance (WSJ)

By Zahid Hussain

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

The U.S.-Pakistan partnership that came into being on Sept. 12, 2001 was a shotgun marriage and remains an uneasy alliance. Vice President Dick Cheney's surprise visit to Pakistan earlier this week underscores Washington's frustration with President Pervez Musharraf's inability to contain the activities of al Qaeda and the Taliban in the Afghan border region.

DOJ_NMG_0138743

The tension is further heightened as the U.S. Congress considers a bill making aid to Pakistan conditional on more effective action against these threats. The main question is whether this tightening of the noose will produce a positive result, or just make things even more difficult for Pakistan's beleaguered leader in an election year.

Islamabad certainly isn't taking the pressure lying down: A foreign ministry spokesperson warned that Pakistan would not take any dictation from outside. On Wednesday, the outgoing U.S. Ambassador Ryan C. Crocker was told by officials that Pakistan would not allow foreign interference in its internal affairs. Many observers fear that increasing pressure on Gen. Musharraf could strengthen the hardliners in the military who are skeptical of a partnership with the U.S.

Gen. Musharraf's 2001 decision to forge an alliance with the U.S. meant taking Pakistan to war with itself. This war, which has rarely been examined in depth, has pitted the military against the militants, the present against the past, and a political partnership with America against the culture of jihadist radicalism.

The outcome of this struggle will affect not only the fate of Pakistan, but also the ideological climate of the Middle East and the security of the world. Gen. Musharraf has provided the U.S. with active support in the hunt for al Qaeda fugitives. His security forces have captured and delivered to the U.S. several of the most wanted al Qaeda leaders, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and Ramzi bin al Shibh, the masterminds of the 9/11 attacks.

But Gen. Musharraf's break with the constituency that backed the Taliban has yet to come, exposing a paradox in his policy. He tried to combat al Qaeda while seeking to avoid direct confrontation with the Taliban remnants and the homegrown Islamic militants. He had to walk a fine line between a military reluctant to break entirely with its radical clients, and his status as America's key strategic partner in the region. The incestuous relationship between jihadist organizations and Pakistan's all-powerful Inter Services Intelligence -- which helped create much of the Islamic militancy and religious extremism that Gen. Musharraf is now confronted with -- has not completely broken down.

The recent spate of religious violence and the increasing number of suicide attacks are a grim reminder that the sectarian terrorist network is not only intact, but has expanded. This raises a serious question about Gen. Musharraf's efforts to combat religious extremism. A major reason for his failure to root out extremism and militancy is the lack of consistency in his policies. Pakistan's sectarian groups and jihadist organizations overlap, and are linked by similar ideological world-views and modes of operation.

Al Qaeda is now breeding a new militant threat in Pakistan. Several new terrorist cells have emerged out of the banned outfits which operate as an extension of al Qaeda. They harbor a new type of young militant coming from educated middle-class backgrounds rather than religious schools. These cells were behind many of the recent terrorist attacks in the country. A good number of these people have been trained in al Qaeda camps in the Waziristan tribal region -- which, according to U.S. intelligence agencies, is the new command center of the terrorist network. Those camps have also been used to train young Muslim radicals from Britain and other countries.

Gen. Musharraf appears to be in a no-win situation. The catastrophic failure of the Pakistan army operation that killed more than 700 Pakistani soldiers in Waziristan forced the authorities to make a truce with the militants. Gen. Musharraf justified the deal saying it would isolate the foreign fighters operating from the tribal region. NATO officials in Afghanistan disagree, saying that the activities of Taliban on the Afghanistan side had increased threefold since Islamabad signed the peace deal in North Waziristan last September.

There is a huge danger that any new military operation in Waziristan under pressure from Washington will divide the army. Over the last couple years, several midlevel army officers have been court-martialed for refusing to fight in Waziristan. But a policy of appeasement would certainly allow al Qaeda and the Taliban to expand their terrorist base. The militants have already established their rule in the North Waziristan tribal region. The situation is more worrying as their influence spreads elsewhere.

These are the fault lines from which a geopolitical earthquake could erupt, making the current situation look positively calm by comparison.

Report: National Guard Unprepared For Domestic Missions (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0138744

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - Stretched thin by the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the National Guard is less prepared now than it's ever been to respond to a major terrorist attack, a natural disaster or another domestic crisis, a congressionally appointed panel has found.

Because of the wars, the Commission on the National Guard and Reserves found, 88 percent of Army National Guard units and 45 percent of Air National Guard units that aren't deployed overseas have severe equipment shortages. That's reduced the Guard to its lowest readiness level ever and posed an unacceptable risk to Americans, said Arnold J. Punaro, the commission chairman and a retired Marine Corps major general.

In a report issued Thursday to Congress, the commission also faulted the Department of Homeland Security for failing to identify the domestic missions the National Guard should be expected to perform and criticized the Defense Department for not equipping the National Guard adequately for those missions.

Punaro said the Defense Department had told at least one governor, whom he didn't identify, that it could take as long as four years to replace equipment his state's National Guard units had left in Iraq.

"If major changes are not made, the Guard and Reserve, the capability to carry out their missions, will continue to deteriorate," Punaro told reporters. "And it will go down, down, down. They will be less and less ready, and we will be taking more and more risks."

The commission's 151-page report recommends 23 major changes to repair the problems. These include identifying the missions the National Guard is expected to perform at home, ensuring that the Guard gets the equipment it needs to carry out those missions, and establishing a bipartisan council of governors that would meet semi-annually and see that shortcomings are addressed.

The commission also recommended rewriting the charter for the National Guard Bureau, which co-ordinates the Guard's state and federal assignments. The proposed revisions also would give the bureau a stronger role in defense and emergency planning, enhance the rank of the bureau's chief to four-star general, and give the position a stronger advisory role with the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The commission urged a stronger National Guard role at the U.S. Northern Command, which has responsibility for defending the continental United States. It also said that the Northern Command should develop disaster response plans that account for state-level activities and include the use of National Guard and Reserve forces as first responders.

In a controversial move, the commission proposed that governors be given command over federal troops that respond to emergencies in their states.

Many of the recommendations, especially those urging greater federal and state cooperation, were aimed at avoiding the confusion that reigned after Hurricane Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast in 2005.

The commission opposed giving the National Guard chief a seat on the Joint Chiefs of Staff, which some lawmakers have said is necessary to ensure that the Guard gets the resources it needs. The commission said that doing so would essentially make the National Guard a separate service and harm cooperation with the active-duty military.

Lawmakers who want a stronger role for the Guard, while generally welcoming the report's findings, called some of its recommendations "tepid" and said they'd press ahead with legislation to give the National Guard a seat on the Joint Chiefs.

"The Guard deserves a place at the table when decisions at the Guard are made that affect its readiness, its missions and effectiveness," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., in a statement.

The commission was created two years ago to find solutions to long-standing problems with how the National Guard and Reserves are equipped and how they are used both at home and abroad. A comprehensive report on their findings and recommendations is due in January 2008.

Panel Slams Treatment Of Guard, Reserves (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0138745

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, March 2, 2007

The National Guard and Reserves don't get enough money or equipment and are left out of important planning for national emergencies, an independent panel concluded Thursday, long after the Iraq war and Hurricane Katrina exposed serious stresses on the services.

The report from the Commission on the National Guard and Reserves compounds earlier criticism of the Bush administration's response to the devastating hurricane that struck the Gulf Coast in August 2005. The administration also is still struggling to better manage the reserves nearly four years into the Iraq war.

The 151-page report found a significant lack of communication between reserve officials and other military leaders, the Homeland Security Department and U.S. Northern Command, which is responsible for the military's defense of the U.S. homeland.

Calling those failures unacceptable, panel Chairman Arnold Punaro said in an interview that federal agencies must get past their turf battles to better protect the public.

"This is unacceptable. The American people would find it unacceptable," said Punaro, a retired Marine Corps general. "These are not problems that have just cropped up in the last two years or five years. These are issues that have been pretty much ignored and glossed over for decades."

The panel, which was created by Congress, also criticized the Pentagon for not budgeting or planning specifically for civil support missions, such as domestic disaster response, because they are viewed as extensions of wartime preparation.

"This is not a sustainable course, and their capability to do their mission will deteriorate over time if it's not changed," Punaro said. "The thought that if we are capable of doing the away game, we can do the home game, we believe is a flawed assumption."

He told reporters Thursday that if there is a chemical, biological or radiological incident, "we're going to need mass decontamination, we're going to need mass medical. ... That capability is not there in sufficient quantities to deal with those scenarios."

Members of Congress, meanwhile, criticized the commission for not going far enough in its recommendations., Sens. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Kit Bond, R-Mo., said they will continue to push for their legislation, which gives the Guard chief budget authority and the power to buy equipment, and also makes that person a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The senators said the panel endorsed only halfway measures to solve the Guard's problems. "Their recommendations are thin soup," said Leahy.

And Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia, who is the ranking Republican on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said that while the commission recognized the challenges that face the guard, "admiring the problem isn't enough. The Commission's recommendations for the most part won't address the issues they acknowledge."

Guard and Reserve troops have been under increasing strain since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, serving in Afghanistan and Iraq while also patrolling the border with Mexico and responding to hurricanes and other natural disasters. During parts of 2005, the citizen soldiers made up nearly half of the U.S. forces in Iraq, with some facing repeated deployments.

At the same time, Guard units have struggled to get the equipment and training needed to go to war, often swapping armored trucks, radios and other equipment between the states to meet battle and disaster requirements.

In what likely will be one of its more controversial recommendations, the report said governors should be given more command authority over active duty military troops responding to local disasters. In previous situations such as Hurricane Katrina, military leaders have worked side-by-side with governors, but have maintained command of their active duty troops.

"We believe that without giving governors a greater voice, and without giving them a greater ability to bring all the assets of our government to bear, particularly in the immediate aftermath of any kind of incident, that we're putting our citizens and property and our economy at greater risk," Punaro said.

The panel outlined recommendations that would elevate the status of the Guard to become more of a partner with other military and homeland defense agencies. It would make the National Guard chief a four-star general and a direct adviser to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and his top commanders.

Shortages Threaten Guard's Capability (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Nearly 90 percent of Army National Guard units in the United States are rated "not ready" -- largely as a result of shortfalls in billions of dollars' worth of equipment -- jeopardizing their capability to respond to crises at home and abroad, according to a congressional commission that released a preliminary report yesterday on the state of U.S. military reserve forces.

The report found that heavy deployments of the National Guard and reserves since 2001 for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and for other anti-terrorism missions have deepened shortages, forced the cobbling together of units and hurt recruiting.

"We can't sustain the [National Guard and reserves] on the course we're on," said Arnold L. Punaro, chairman of the 13-member Commission on the National Guard and Reserves, established by Congress in 2005. The independent commission, made up mainly of former senior military and civilian officials appointed by both parties, is tasked to study the mission, readiness and compensation of the reserve forces.

"The Department of Defense is not adequately equipping the National Guard for its domestic missions," the commission's report found. It faulted the Pentagon for a lack of budgeting for "civil support" in domestic emergencies, criticizing the "flawed assumption" that as long as the military is prepared to fight a major war, it is ready to respond to a disaster or emergency at home.

From Virginia and the District of Columbia to Indiana and New Mexico, National Guard units lack thousands of trucks, Humvees, generators, radios, night-vision goggles and other gear that would be critical for responding to a major disaster, terrorist attack or other domestic emergency, according to state Guard officials.

The equipment shortage extends to Gulf Coast states such as Louisiana and Mississippi -- devastated in 2005 by Hurricane Katrina -- where Guard units have only a fraction of what they would need to respond to another large-scale disaster.

The Louisiana Guard, its gear depleted by Iraq and Katrina, is short of Humvees and trucks such as high-water vehicles critical for a major evacuation. "We are really concerned about vehicles," said Lt. Col. Pete Schneider, a spokesman for the Louisiana Guard. "We would have enough for a small-scale issue . . . maybe a Category 1 tropical storm we could handle -- an event that doesn't involve massive flooding or massive search and rescue," he said. But for bigger disasters, Louisiana would need help from other states.

Mississippi lacks trucks and is relying on contractors to fill gaps in engineering vehicles, according to the state Guard's assistant adjutant general, Maj. Gen. Ike Pylant. "We will make do with what we got," he said.

In the Washington area, Guard officials worry about a catastrophic attack. In the event of "a very large . . . chemical, biological or nuclear incident in the national capital region, I would need every truck I was authorized, and we don't have that," said Col. Robert Simpson, director of the joint staff for the Virginia National Guard. "We are definitely short trucks, all wheeled vehicles," as well as radios, bulldozers and other gear, Simpson said. The state Guard could handle ordinary contingencies such as "bad winter weather," he said.

Other state Guard leaders voiced similar concerns. "What keeps me up at night is, I think I am able to surge . . . for the normal disaster, but if I needed to deploy every bit of my soldiers and airmen, I know for a fact I do not have enough equipment," said Maj. Gen. R. Martin Umbarger, head of the Indiana National Guard.

Army National Guard units in the United States have on average about half of their authorized stock of dual-use equipment, needed both for fighting wars and for domestic missions, according to a recent Government Accountability Office report. The National Guard estimates that it would require $38 billion for equipment to restore domestic Army and Air National Guard units to full readiness. The Army has budgeted $21 billion to augment Guard equipment through 2011.

Since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the use of U.S. military reservists has risen from about 12.7 million days of service in 2001 to an estimated 63 million days in 2006. The current increase of U.S. troops in Iraq is expected to require the call-up of as many as four National Guard combat brigades beginning early next year.

But while the 830,000-strong selected reserves make up more than a third of the total military, they receive only 3 percent of equipment funding and 8 percent of the Defense Department budget, the report said.

In 2006, Army National Guard units preparing to deploy had to borrow on average one-third of their people and 60 percent of their equipment from a dozen other units, making for a less cohesive force, the report found.

National Guard units deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan have been required to leave large quantities of gear in the combat zone. Partly as a result, 88 percent of Guard units in the United States are now so poorly equipped that they are rated "not ready," according to Guard data and the report, which cited the National Guard Bureau chief, Lt. Gen. H Steven Blum . Forty-five percent of the Air National Guard is also "not ready," according to Guard data.

The commission called for granting governors more power to handle emergencies, including allowing them to command not only National Guard forces but also federal troops responding to emergencies in their states. The commission also called for the chief of the National Guard Bureau to be elevated one rank to four-star general.

In commenting on legislation known as the National Guard Empowerment Act, the commission disagreed with a proposal to make the head of the National Guard a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in part, it said, because it would complicate the chain of command. Lawmakers backing the act criticized the recommendations as tepid.

The report also said prospects for Guard recruiting and retention remain "highly problematic," despite successes last year. Fewer former active-duty military personnel have joined the reserves over the past 10 years -- they made up 38 percent of the Army National Guard recruits last year, compared with 61 percent in 1997. Polling data for youths and their parents also show that favorable views of service in the Guard and reserves have declined since November 2001, the report said.

The commission is scheduled to issue its final report in January.

The Silence That Kills (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

On Feb. 20, The A.P. reported from Afghanistan that a suicide attacker disguised as a health worker blew himself up near "a crowd of about 150 people who had gathered for a ribbon-cutting ceremony to open an emergency ward at the main government hospital in the city of Khost." A few days later, at a Baghdad college, a female Sunni suicide bomber blew herself up amid students who were ready to sit for exams, killing 40 people.

Stop and think for a moment how sick this is. Then stop for another moment and listen to the silence. The Bush team is mute. It says nothing, because it has no moral authority. No one would listen. Mr. Bush is losing a P.R. war to people who blow up emergency wards. Europeans are mute, lost in their delusion that this is all George Bush's and Tony Blair's fault.

But worst of all, Muslims, the very people whose future is being killed, are also mute. No surge can work in Iraq unless we have a "moral surge," a counternihilism strategy that delegitimizes suicide bombers. The most important restraints are cultural, societal and religious. It takes a village — but the Arab-Muslim village today is largely silent. The best are indifferent or intimidated; the worst quietly applaud the Sunnis who kill Shiites.

Nobody in the Arab world "has the guts to say that what is happening in Iraq is wrong — that killing schoolkids is wrong," said Mamoun Fandy, director of the Middle East program at the International Institute for Strategic Studies. "People somehow think that killing Iraqis is good because it will stick it to the Americans, so Arabs are undermining the American project in Iraq by killing themselves."

The world worries about highly enriched uranium, but "the real danger is highly enriched Islam," Mr. Fandy added. That is, "highly enriched Sunnism" and "highly enriched Shiism" that eats away at the Muslim state, the way Hezbollah is trying to do in Lebanon or the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt or Al Qaeda everywhere.

One result: there's no legitimate, decent, accepted source of Arab-Muslim authority today, no center of gravity "for people to anchor their souls in," Mr. Fandy said. In this welter of confusion, the suicide bombers go uncondemned or subtly extolled.

Arab nationalist media like Al Jazeera "practically tell bin Laden and his followers, 'Bravo,' " Mr. Fandy said. "The message sent to bin Laden is that 'You are doing to the West what we want done, but we can't do it.' This is the hidden message that the West is not privy to. Unless extreme pressure is applied on Muslims all over the world to come up with counter-fatwas and pronounce these men as pariahs, very little will happen in fighting terrorism."

DOJ_NMG_0138748

"The battleground in the Arab world today is not in Palestine or Lebanon, but in the classrooms and newsrooms," Mr. Fandy concluded. That's where "the software programmers" reside who create symbolic images and language glorifying suicide bombers and make their depraved acts look legitimate. Only other Arab-Muslim programmers can defeat them.

Occasionally an honest voice rises, giving you a glimmer of hope that others will stand up. The MEMRI translation Web site (memri.org) just posted a poem called "When," from a Saudi author, Wajeha al-Huwaider, that was posted on Arab reform sites like www.aafaq.org.

When you cannot find a single garden in your city, but there is a mosque on every corner — you know that you are in an Arab country.

When you see people living in the past with all the trappings of modernity — do not be surprised, you are in an Arab country.

When religion has control over science — you can be sure that you are in an Arab country.

When clerics are referred to as "scholars" — don't be astonished, you are in an Arab country.

When you see the ruler transformed into a demigod who never dies or relinquishes his power, and nobody is permitted to criticize — do not be too upset, you are in an Arab country.

When you find that the large majority of people oppose freedom and find joy in slavery — do not be too distressed, you are in an Arab country.

When you hear the clerics saying that democracy is heresy, but seizing every opportunity provided by democracy to grab high positions — do not be surprised, you are in an Arab country. ...

When you discover that a woman is worth half of what a man is worth, or less — do not be surprised, you are in an Arab country. ...

When land is more important than human beings — you are in an Arab country. ...

When fear constantly lives in the eyes of the people — you can be certain you are in an Arab country."

Sources: GOP Lawmakers Tried To Influence Federal Investigation (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor

McClatchy Newspapers, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - Sen. Pete Domenici and Rep. Heather Wilson of New Mexico pressured the U.S. attorney in their state to speed up indictments in a federal corruption investigation that involved at least one former Democratic state senator, according to two people familiar with the contacts.

The alleged involvement of the two Republican lawmakers raises questions about possible violations of House of Representatives and Senate ethics rules and could taint the criminal investigation into the award of an $82 million courthouse contract.

The two people with knowledge of the incident said Domenici and Wilson intervened in mid-October, when Wilson was in a competitive re-election campaign that she won by 875 votes out of nearly 211,000 cast.

David Iglesias, who stepped down as U.S. attorney in New Mexico on Wednesday, told McClatchy Newspapers that he believed the Bush administration fired him Dec. 7 because he resisted the pressure to rush an indictment.

According to the two individuals, Domenici and Wilson called to press Iglesias for details of the case.

Wilson was curt after Iglesias was "non-responsive" to her questions about whether an indictment would be unsealed, said the two individuals, who asked not to be identified because they feared possible political repercussions. Rumors had spread throughout the New Mexico legal community that an indictment of at least one Democrat was sealed.

Domenici, who wasn't up for re-election, called about a week and a half later and was more persistent than Wilson, the people said. When Iglesias said an indictment wouldn't be handed down until at least December, the line went dead.

So far no one has been charged.

Press aides for Domenici and Wilson wouldn't comment. Justice Department officials have denied hearing of any such interference and said they didn't fire Iglesias over it.

Iglesias said in an earlier interview that he regretted not reporting the contact to his superiors, and he said he didn't have evidence that it led to his firing.

Some Democrats are questioning whether the two lawmakers could be accused of ethics violations for inappropriate contact with an executive branch official.

Stanley Brand, a former federal prosecutor and former Democratic counsel to the House, said such interference could be a violation.

"There's a general ethical principle that members should not unduly interfere in adjudicative proceedings in front of courts or agencies," he said. "This happens to be a criminal prosecution. There would seem to be a special concern about reaching out to a U.S. attorney and asking about a pending case.

"The House and Senate have not taken much notice of these things," he said. "But they don't usually rise to this level."

The allegations also could give defense attorneys in the corruption case in New Mexico legal ammunition to attack an indictment, Brand said.

"Even if he (Iglesias) didn't submit himself to the pressure, if I'm a defense attorney, I'm going to scream bloody murder and say it looks like he did," he said.

The allegations have fueled a weeks-long controversy over whether the Bush administration forced out eight Republican-appointed U.S. attorneys because of partisan politics.

Justice Department officials have said that most of the firings were for "performance-related" issues and denied partisan political motives.

On Thursday, House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers, D-Mich., issued subpoenas to require Iglesias and three other ousted U.S. attorneys to testify before Congress.

The judiciary subcommittee on administrative law authorized the subpoenas by a 7-0 vote. The five Republican members of the subcommittee didn't show up for the vote.

The subpoenas require Iglesias, and former U.S. attorneys Carol Lam of San Diego, H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Little Rock, Ark., and John McKay of Seattle to appear before the subcommittee next week.

"The former U.S. attorneys are alleging very serious charges against the administration and we need to hear from them," Conyers said.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is sending letters to the same four asking them to testify voluntarily on Tuesday.

In the last several weeks, other U.S. attorneys have spoken out against the administration to dispute that they were fired because of how they handled their jobs.

The administration has said that politics played a part only in the firing of Cummins. Officials said he was removed to make way for Tim Griffin, a former aide to White House political operative Karl Rove.

Congress to subpoena fired U.S. attorneys

WASHINGTON — Sen. Pete Domenici and Rep. Heather Wilson aren't saying whether they contacted then-U.S. Attorney David Iglesias in the weeks leading up to the Nov. 7 elections about the pace of his corruption investigation of New Mexico Democrats.

Iglesias, whose last day on the job was Wednesday, says two members of New Mexico's congressional delegation pressured him to speed up the indictment of Democrats. Iglesias has refused to say who called him, but the three other members of the state's delegation say it wasn't them.

Domenici and Wilson, Albuquerque Republicans, have not returned phone calls from numerous news outlets asking for a response to Iglesias' allegations.

The former U.S. attorney is expected to be called before Congress to testify on his dismissal, which he says appears to have been politically motivated.

DOJ_NMG_0138750

A House Judiciary subcommittee was expected to issue subpoenas this afternoon for Iglesias and three other U.S. attorneys dismissed by the Bush administration to appear at a hearing Tuesday.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman John Conyers said the charge by Iglesias "is the most egregious allegation so far that the administration has allowed partisan politics to corrupt the selection and retention of U.S. attorneys."

In an interview with The Tribune on Tuesday, Iglesias said he did not know why he was ousted, but said it wasn't because of his job performance. "That only leaves one possibility," he said, "and that's politics."

He went further in an interview with McClatchy News Service, saying he believes his ouster was called for because he would not rush the indictments in a local kickback investigation.

"I believe that because I didn't `play ball,' so to speak, I was asked to resign," Iglesias said in the story published Wednesday. Iglesias said he was contacted directly by two members of Congress and "was appalled by the inappropriateness of these contacts."

At the time, Wilson was locked in a close re-election race with then-state Attorney General Patricia Madrid, whom Wilson had accused of neglecting corruption. Domenici has long been seen as Wilson's mentor in Congress.

The corruption investigation Iglesias was working on involves rumored kickbacks to powerful Democrats and other officials during the construction of Albuquerque's Metro Courthouse and several other buildings in Downtown.

A U.S. Justice Department official, Brian Roehrkasse, told McClatchy that Iglesias' claim "is flatly false."

"We had a lengthy record from which to evaluate his performance as a manager, and we made our decision not to further extend his service based on performance-related concerns," Roehrkasse said.

The Justice Department was unaware Iglesias had had conversations with members of Congress until Wednesday, Roehrkasse said. According to Roehrkasse, Iglesias should have reported the contact to department officials.

Roehrkasse would not say whether any member of the New Mexico delegation recommended that Iglesias be dismissed.

But Matt Farrauto, executive director of the New Mexico Democratic Party, on Wednesday called for Wilson to answer questions about Iglesias' dismissal, and whether she played a role in it.

"It's not much of a leap to believe that Heather Wilson pressured or personally instigated pressure for an indictment," Farrauto said. "This should be investigated, and she should be held accountable."

Sen. Chuck Schumer, a New York Democrat, said on the Senate floor Wednesday that Iglesias told members of his staff on Tuesday about being contacted by the two members of Congress, and Iglesias asked to be brought to Washington "under the power of subpoena to tell his story."

Iglesias is one of eight U.S. attorneys fired in December, but until Wednesday he had not been a central figure in the controversy. Democrats had focused on the firing of Carol Lamm, who successfully prosecuted former U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican, on corruption charges, and on Little Rock, Ark., U.S. Attorney H.E. Cummings, who was replaced by an associate of White House political chief Karl Rove.

"These new revelations are extremely troubling," Schumer said on the Senate floor. "They would show politics at its worst, and the long hand of the Justice Department reaching out to fire attorneys who would not do what was politically asked; at least that's a very real suspicion.

"So we must get to the bottom of this. And the only way to get to the bottom of this is to call before us the fired U.S. attorneys and hear their side of the story."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, a Vermont Democrat, today announced he will send letters to Iglesias and the other fired U.S. attorneys asking them to testify voluntarily. If they won't, he said the committee could vote March 8 on whether to issue subpoenas.

The president selects U.S. attorneys, who customarily resign with a change in administrations. However, it is unusual for an administration to replace someone it nominated in the first place.

"This is serious stuff," Schumer said. "When U.S. attorneys are fired for political reasons - fired to stand in the way of justice rather than promote justice - it puts a dagger into the heart of the faith that Americans have in their government and in their system of justice."

DOJ_NMG_0138751

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat, cited Iglesias' story Wednesday in proposing an amendment to a homeland security bill that would limit the president's ability to replace U.S. attorneys with interim appointees.

The amendment would still allow the president to fire U.S. attorneys, but states that no interim appointee could serve more than 120 days. In effect that would force the president to send the name of a permanent nominee to the Senate for confirmation.

Carl Tobias, a constitutional law professor at the University of Richmond, said the administration's decision to replace so many U.S. attorneys at once without a clear explanation for the moves appeared to be backfiring.

"Now it's going to be a mess," he said. "The question is, what was to be gained by doing this? There's not even two years left in the administration. What was the point?"

House Democrats Vote To Subpoena Fired U.S. Attorneys (AP)

By Jennifer Talhelm, The Associated Press

AP, March 2, 2007

A House committee is compelling four of at least eight U.S. Attorneys ousted from office in recent months to tell their stories under oath, after one prosecutor said he believes he was fired for political reasons.

Democrats on a House Judiciary subcommittee voted 7-0 Thursday to subpoena fired prosecutors Carol Lam of California, David Iglesias of New Mexico, H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Arkansas and John McKay of Seattle. No Republican members of the panel attended Thursday's meeting, which lasted less than five minutes.

The lawmakers said they are troubled that the Bush administration may be punishing prosecutors for being too effective at pursuing political corruption cases.

The House subpoenas are the first issued by the new Democratic-controlled Congress. The U.S. Attorneys are scheduled to appear at a Tuesday hearing with other witnesses, including a representative from the Justice Department.

The Senate Judiciary Committee asked the four prosecutors to testify before it the same day.

Democrats have alleged that the removals were politically motivated and point out what they say is a flaw in the antiterror USA Patriot Act that allows the president to sidestep Senate confirmation of U.S. Attorneys in some cases.

"Is this an effort to diminish the independence of the people who uphold our laws? It's very troubling to me that there seems to be this undercurrent here," said Rep. Linda Sanchez, D-Calif., chairwoman of the Judiciary Subcommittee on Commercial and Administration Law.

Iglesias this week said he believes he was dismissed because he resisted pressure by two members of Congress to rush indictments before last year's election in an investigation of an alleged Democratic kickback scheme.

The Justice Department has said that any suggestion that Iglesias was asked to resign because he failed to bring an indictment is false. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other top department officials also have defended their decisions to replace other U.S. Attorneys.

Sanchez said the conversations between Iglesias and lawmakers could represent an improper ex parte communication and violate congressional ethics laws.

Iglesias has refused to name the lawmakers who called him. He told The Associated Press on Thursday that he wouldn't give any more details until he testified. "I will identify the members if I am directly asked and they compel me to testify," he said.

House Panel Subpoenas Fired U.S. Attorneys (WP)

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Democrats issued their first major subpoenas yesterday since taking control of Congress, as a House subcommittee voted to compel testimony from four former U.S. attorneys who were part of a wave of firings by the Justice Department.

The Judiciary subcommittee on commercial and administrative law approved the subpoenas for former prosecutors in Arkansas, New Mexico, Seattle and San Diego -- all of whom will be required to appear for testimony at a hearing Tuesday. The Senate Judiciary Committee announced plans for a similar hearing on the same day.

DOJ_NMG_0138752

The moves mark the latest escalation in the battle between congressional Democrats and the Justice Department over the controversial dismissals of eight U.S. attorneys, at least five of whom were presiding over public corruption probes when they were fired.

"Are these people being removed for doing their job and for it doing it too well?" asked Rep. Linda T. Sanchez (D-Calif.), chairwoman of the panel, who called the subpoenas "a last resort."

The controversy, which has been simmering for two months, boiled over this week after departing prosecutor David C. Iglesias of New Mexico alleged that two unnamed lawmakers had pressured him to speed up the prosecution of Democrats before the November elections. Iglesias said he believed that complaints from the lawmakers may have led to his dismissal, an allegation the Justice Department has disputed.

The state's top two Democrats, Rep. Tom Udall and Sen. Jeff Bingaman, and Rep. Steve Pearce (R-N.M.) have denied calling Iglesias. Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) and Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) have not responded to requests for comment over the past two days and deflected questions from the Associated Press about the allegations.

"I don't have any comment," Domenici said. "I have no idea what he's talking about."

Wilson referred questions "on that personnel matter" to the Justice Department.

Sanchez said any such contacts by a member of Congress would likely be in violation of House and Senate ethics rules that restrict such "ex parte communications" during ongoing criminal investigations.

Iglesias's office was conducting a probe into allegations involving construction contracts and a prominent Democratic former state senator.

At the time of the alleged phone calls, Wilson, a close ally of Domenici's, was in a tight reelection battle with then-state Attorney General Patricia Madrid. Wilson won by fewer than 2,000 votes.

Iglesias said yesterday that he will identify the lawmakers only if compelled by a subpoena.

"I fear retaliation," said Iglesias, a Republican and former military defense lawyer who served as a model for a character in the movie "A Few Good Men." "This is a small state and there are not too many employment opportunities, and I fear they will blacklist me."

At least four of the other U.S. attorneys were presiding over probes targeting Republican politicians at the time they were notified of their firing.

Although a separate House subcommittee has compelled testimony in a little-noticed drug inquiry, the prosecutors case marks the first major use of subpoena power by the new Democratic majority.

Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said that the department has been "very forthcoming" with Congress about the dismissals and that any allegations that prosecutors were removed to interfere with investigations are "completely wrong."

Justice officials have said Iglesias and six others were fired for "performance-related" reasons and have denied that any were targeted to disrupt public corruption probes. Officials have acknowledged that an eighth prosecutor, Bud Cummins of Little Rock, was removed to make way for a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove.

Cummins and former U.S. attorney John McKay of Seattle said in interviews that they told lawmakers they will not testify unless subpoenas are issued.

"I wanted it clear that I wasn't volunteering to testify and I wasn't trying to affirmatively stir up trouble for everybody," said Cummins, who left in December. "If they would like to hear one of the few facts I have, I'm happy to tell them."

The other former prosecutor scheduled to testify, Carol S. Lam of San Diego, did not return a call seeking comment yesterday.

No Republicans showed up for the unanimous panel vote on issuing the subpoenas. The Judiciary Committee's ranking Republican, Rep. Lamar Smith (Tex.), later called the session "political grandstanding."

House Panel Subpoenas 4 Prosecutors Of 8 Ousted (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 1 — A House Judiciary subcommittee voted Thursday to issue subpoenas requiring testimony from four of the eight United States attorneys recently dismissed by the Justice Department.

The vote followed remarks this week in which one of the four, David C. Iglesias of New Mexico, said he believed that the motives for his ouster had been political. He and the three others subpoenaed — H. E. Cummins III of Arkansas, John McKay of Seattle and Carol C. Lam of San Diego — were chosen to give testimony because the circumstances of their dismissal are thought to be representative of those surrounding the removal of all eight, Congressional officials say.

The subpoenas order the four to testify at a hearing of the House subcommittee on Tuesday. The Senate Judiciary Committee has also invited dismissed prosecutors to testify that day and may consider issuing its own subpoenas if they do not. Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, a Democratic member of the committee who has led an investigation of the dismissals, said Thursday, "The U.S. attorneys will be coming, and now we will finally get to the bottom of this."

The House panel acted after the prosecutors privately told lawmakers that they would not testify voluntarily, not wanting to get in the middle of what has grown into a serious political embarrassment for the Justice Department, but that they would give testimony if compelled.

In floor speeches and at a hearing last month, Democrats have repeatedly attacked the dismissals as a politically motivated effort to replace independent-minded prosecutors with more pliable operatives of the Bush administration.

Several of the prosecutors had been engaged in politically sensitive cases involving Republicans, for instance Ms. Lam's continuing corruption investigation in the wake of a related guilty plea in 2005 by Representative Randy Cunningham of California.

Others had irritated Republicans in their state. Mr. McKay, for one, had decided against impaneling a grand jury to examine accusations of voter fraud in Washington State's 2004 election for governor, won by a Democrat, Christine Gregoire.

Justice Department officials have denied that any of the prosecutors, all appointed by President Bush in his first term, were removed for political reasons.

"We have been very forthcoming with members of Congress about personnel decisions related to U.S. attorneys, through hearings, multiple briefings, letters, other documents, and a D.O.J. official will again testify next week," said Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the department.

"We have never removed a United States attorney in an effort to retaliate against them or inappropriately interfere with a particular investigation, criminal prosecution or civil case," Mr. Roehrkasse added. "Any suggestion otherwise is completely wrong."

At a hearing last month, Paul J. McNulty, the deputy attorney general, said most of the dismissals had been related to job performance, an assertion that brought protests from the ranks of the ousted prosecutors.

Several said they had been given no reason for their removal. Most had received favorable job evaluations from the Justice Department in formal performance assessments based on interviews with judges, law enforcement agencies and members of the office staff.

House Panel Subpoenas Ousted U.S. Attorneys (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

Four of the prosecutors who say the White House forced them out for political motives are to appear Tuesday.

WASHINGTON — A House subcommittee voted Thursday to subpoena four recently replaced U.S. attorneys as part of a widening probe into whether the Bush administration was politicizing the appointment of top prosecutors around the country.

The action marked the first major use of subpoena power by the new Democratic-controlled Congress, and begins to fulfill a pledge of the Democratic leadership to scrutinize administration policies.

The prosecutors, directed to appear at a hearing Tuesday, were among at least eight who were abruptly removed in recent months by the Justice Department. Officials have said they dismissed the lawyers primarily because of concerns over their performance, as well as policy differences over whether they were pursuing department priorities such as cases of immigration fraud and child exploitation.

But the lawyers — all appointees of President Bush — have not gone quietly. They are publicly disputing the characterization the department has offered for their departures.

The result has been a political embarrassment for the White House and the Justice Department, and an odd spectacle of Democrats giving aid and comfort to Republican appointees.

The move by a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee came a day after the former U.S. attorney in Albuquerque said he believed he was dismissed for political reasons. David Iglesias said that two members of Congress had pressured him to bring corruption charges against a Democratic official in New Mexico before the November election but that he had resisted.

Also subpoenaed was Carol Lam, former U.S. attorney in San Diego, who oversaw the bribery case against former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of Rancho Santa Fe. Lam's office brought charges against two others in that case, including a former senior CIA official, two days before she left her job last month.

The other former prosecutors subpoenaed are John McKay of Seattle and H.E. "Bud" Cummins of Little Rock, Ark. The four prosecutors were first appointed by Bush in 2001 and 2002.

The subcommittee said all four had agreed to appear, and the Justice Department said it would send a top official to the hearing.

The vote to issue the subpoenas illustrated a partisan divide: Republicans boycotted the proceeding; the seven Democrats present unanimously endorsed the move.

"The former U.S. attorneys are alleging very serious charges against the administration, and we need to hear from them," said Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. "We want to hear their stories, and we want the administration to address the charges head-on."

Conyers said the subpoenas were to be issued Thursday night.

"We decided to issue subpoenas only as a last resort," said Rep. Linda T. Sanchez (D-Lakewood), who chairs the commercial and administrative law subcommittee, which authorized the subpoenas and will hold the hearing. "We need to get to the bottom of whether competency in upholding the law is being sacrificed for political ideology."

Democrats also fear that the Justice Department is trying to exploit a little-noticed change in federal law that gives U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales the power to appoint interim federal prosecutors through the end of the Bush administration without Senate confirmation.

The Justice Department has said that it had no intention of bypassing the confirmation process and would submit the names of replacements to the Senate for every vacancy that occurs. But legislation has been introduced in both houses to repeal the provision, which was included in legislation last year reauthorizing the Patriot Act.

Democrats also released a Congressional Research Service report surveying the reasons that U.S. attorneys did not serve out their terms. The report studied 54 cases of prosecutors who were appointed between 1981 and 2006. The bulk left to take other official positions such as judgeships or to pursue careers in private law practice.

The report identified five cases in which attorneys were forced to resign. The dismissed included a prosecutor in Florida who was caught on videotape grabbing a Jacksonville television reporter by the throat, and another Florida prosecutor who, the report said, allegedly "bit a topless dancer on the arm during a visit to an adult club after losing a big drug case."

Democrats Demanding Fired U.S. Prosecutors Testify (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt And James Rowley

Bloomberg, March 2, 2007

March 1 (Bloomberg) -- Democrats in Congress intend to question several fired U.S. attorneys to determine whether the Bush administration forced them out to influence politically sensitive criminal investigations.

A House Judiciary subcommittee voted today to compel testimony from four of the prosecutors. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy also announced plans to question the lawyers, who were among eight -- all Republican appointees -- that were informed last year of their dismissals.

DOJ_NMG_0138755

``This seems to be a wholesale Christmas Eve massacre," Leahy said today at a committee meeting. ``Some of them had the highest ratings of their performance but, coincidentally, they were in on some politically sensitive investigations."

The administration has said the firings were generally based on job performance, not politics. The 93 U.S. attorneys are political appointees who are confirmed by the Senate and serve at the discretion of President George W. Bush.

The prosecutors who were let go include one in San Diego who was supervising the influence peddling investigation into convicted ex-Republican Representative Randall ``Duke" Cunningham. Another in San Francisco oversaw a federal task force probing illegal backdating of stock options by company executives.

David Iglesias of New Mexico, who was also fired, recently told lawmakers he was asked to leave after receiving calls from two unnamed members of Congress inquiring about a corruption probe involving local Democrats. Iglesias told a press conference yesterday he assumed politics caused his firing.

Eager to Testify

Senator Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, said yesterday that Iglesias and other prosecutors were eager to testify.

``We have inquired of the fired U.S. attorneys," he said in remarks on the Senate floor. ``The overwhelming majority of them want to tell more but feel honor-bound not to do it, except if they were brought under the power of a subpoena."

Senators also said the job evaluations of some of the dismissed prosecutors contradicted Justice Department arguments that they were let go for poor performance.

Senator Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, said it is ``a bit distasteful" that the Bush administration is unfairly damaging the reputation of prosecutors it had installed.

Quality Performers

Formal evaluations show that the prosecutors ``were quality performers, that they did what they were requested to do," California Democrat Dianne Feinstein said in an interview.

Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said the agency has never removed a U.S. attorney in an effort to influence an investigation. On the Iglesias firing, Roehrkasse said the prosecutor served for more than five years and ``we made our decision not to further extend his service based on performance-related concerns."

In the House, the subpoenas are the first issued since Democrats took congressional control in January. The subcommittee, headed by Representative Linda Sanchez, voted 7-0 to compel the testimony with the panel's Republicans not participating.

All four prosecutors -- Iglesias, Carol Lam, who had headed the Cunningham probe, John McKay of Seattle, and H.E. ``Bud" Cummins of Arkansas -- will testify March 6 in front of the subcommittee, said Sanchez, a California Democrat. She said each had expressed a willingness to talk if they were subpoenaed.

Political Pressure

Democrats plan to ask them whether they were pressured on any cases, what the administration said when they were dismissed and whether they thought they were fired because of politics, Sanchez said.

``Part of the overall issue is, are the U.S. attorney positions being awarded to those that are ideologues within the president's party," she told reporters.

While the Justice Department said most of the prosecutors were asked to step down for unspecified performance problems, it acknowledged that Cummins was fired without cause. He was replaced on an interim basis by Timothy Griffin, a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove.

Griffin has withdrawn from consideration for the permanent position, citing the uproar over his appointment. Bush has nominated only three people to fill 13 vacant U.S. attorney positions, Democrats said today.

Democrats have also proposed legislation that would limit Attorney General Alberto Gonzales's authority to appoint temporary U.S. attorneys to 120 days. After that, they would be named by a federal judge.

The legislation, passed by the Senate Judiciary Committee, would repeal a provision of last year's USA Patriot Act renewal that gave the attorney general sole power to name interim U.S. attorneys. Democrats say the Patriot Act could let the Justice Department bypass the Senate confirmation process.

DOJ_NMG_0138756

``If we don't act, any president -- Democrat or Republican - - could simply have the attorney general hand pick the prosecutor," Leahy said. ``You could end up politicizing prosecutions and law enforcement."

U.S. Attorney Leaves Office With No Word On Successor (LVS)

By Sam Skolnik, Las Vegas Sun

Las Vegas Sun, March 2, 2007

U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden's last day in office came and went Wednesday with no word from the Justice Department about who will replace him.

Even though Bogden was told by a department official soon after he was fired from the job that his office would be given the name of a replacement by the time he left office - Wednesday at midnight - no one had called, at least as of 6 p.m.

"I've been sitting here, waiting for the call," said Bogden, the well-regarded Bush appointee who said he has spent the bulk of his last day packing up his office. "It would have been nice to have gotten some notice by now," he said during a late afternoon interview.

According to Bogden, federal statutes dictate that First Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Myhre would take over this morning as acting U.S. attorney, pending further word from Washington.

Bogden's last day as the top federal prosecutor in Nevada came as Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said she likely would be issuing subpoenas to the seven U.S. attorneys, including Bogden, who were fired by the Bush administration within the last few months.

Bogden had received positive notices and work reviews by his Justice Department bosses - as had all but one of the six other fired U.S. attorneys, according to media reports - begging the question as to why the prosecutors were fired. Justice Department officials said it was because of poor job performance, a notion vehemently rejected by the U.S. attorneys and their supporters.

In a statement Wednesday, Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., called the dismissal of Bogden and the others "unfair."

"Under his leadership, the U.S. attorney's office has prosecuted many dangerous criminals and resolved a number of important civil cases," Reid said. "Throughout his career, Dan Bogden has strived to make our communities safer, and I appreciate all the remarkable work he has done."

Tory Mazzola, a spokesman for Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., said his office was "in the process, working with the Justice Department to find a replacement" for Bogden. He referred questions regarding why no replacement had yet been named for Bogden to the Justice Department.

No one with the Justice Department's press office in Washington could be reached late Wednesday. Michael Battle, director of its Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys, also could not be reached.

Bogden said he would appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee if called by Feinstein - but only reluctantly.

"If subpoenaed, you've got to go, you've got to testify," he said. "But would I be eager to testify? No."

After 16 years with the Justice Department, including the last 5 1/2 as U.S. attorney, Bogden said testifying would be a difficult thing to do "even though I don't agree with their decision" regarding his dismissal.

Speculation has been rampant regarding the motives of U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and the Bush administration in the systematic purgings . Much of it has centered on politics: Democrats and other critics say they believe that the Bush White House is eager to have new prosecutors in place to steer investigations toward Democratic officials and away from Republicans.

Detractors also say the new crop of replacements, likely to include more politically minded appointees and fewer career prosecutors, are being groomed to run for congressional seats held by vulnerable Democrats.

Those theories were bolstered by a recent McClatchy Newspapers report, referred to by Feinstein on Wednesday, in which the U.S. attorney for New Mexico, David Iglesias, said two unnamed members of Congress called him in mid-October to inquire about the timing of an ongoing probe into an alleged kickback scheme.

Iglesias, according to the report, believed the congressmen were eager for an indictment to be issued on the eve of the November elections to benefit the Republican candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0138757

It is unclear who, in the end, will be named to replace Bogden.

The names of several officials inside Bogden's office have been floated, including Myhre and Assistant U.S. Attorneys Kurt Schulke and Dan Schiess, as well as Nevada Chief Deputy Attorney General Conrad Hafen.

Myhre couldn't be reached for comment Wednesday. Schulke, Schiess and Hafen declined to say whether they had been in touch with Ensign's office or the Justice Department about the post. Bogden said he didn't know who was in line for his job.

Bogden Questions Reason For Ouster (LVRJ)

By Adrienne Packer, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, March 2, 2007

Serves last day as U.S. attorney

Two high-ranking Department of Justice officials told outgoing U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden in December that his dismissal was unrelated to his job performance, and one of the officials indicated his firing was politically motivated, Bogden said Thursday.

"I was given an explanation that seemed to me to be political in nature, that had nothing to do with any issues with my performance or issues with the performance of my office," Bogden said.

He declined to elaborate on the discussion.

At least eight U.S. attorneys, including Bogden, 51, were abruptly removed in recent months by the Justice Department

On Feb. 6, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee and explained that the dismissals were "performance related."

"It's been difficult enough trying to accept the request that I step down; it's been a difficult time getting through it all," said Bogden, whose last day was Wednesday. "Then to hear the reason for the request to step down has something to do with some unrelated performance issues is just flat-out wrong."

Michael Battle, director of the Executive Office for United States Attorneys, called Bogden on Dec. 7 and asked him to step down from the post he had held since 2001. Battle could not provide an explanation, Bogden said, prompting him to call other officials within the Justice Department.

"I said you have to give me something more; you can't just throw this bomb into my life," Bogden said.

Bogden placed a call to an upper-level official at the Justice Department. He said he sensed from that conversation that his dismissal was politically motivated. During a second call to another official, his questions were more direct.

"I said, 'Look, did this decision have anything to do with my job performance or the performance of my office?' " Bogden said, relaying a conversation with an official he declined to name. The official responded: "That did not enter into the equation."

Bogden acknowledged he will have to divulge the officials' names if he is subpoenaed to testify before a congressional committee.

Bogden was not among four of the prosecutors a House subcommittee voted Thursday to subpoena to testify next week. The House Judiciary subcommittee said all four agreed to appear, and the Justice Department said it would dispatch a top official to the hearing.

U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., has suggested political gamesmanship on the part of the Bush administration, a claim she said was bolstered by the fact that the ousted attorneys were given positive performance evaluations.

"These reports (evaluations) only serve to fuel my concerns that the Department of Justice based its decisions to fire competent and successful U.S. attorneys because of a desire to put young politically connected lawyers from outside into these offices," Feinstein wrote in a letter to Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

Feinstein sponsored legislation that would require the Senate to confirm U.S. attorney appointments, restoring the process used prior to 2006. Feinstein and others have been angered by a little-noticed provision slipped into the Patriot Act last year that allows Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to appoint replacement prosecutors indefinitely.

"The problem is that this loophole in the Patriot Act allows the administration to put anybody they want into that position for an indefinite period of time," said Jon Summers, a spokesman for Reid's office. "Then you run into a situation where you have people who may not be the best fit in those jobs. There is a reason that things were set up the way they were and that was to make sure the best interest of the public was served. This loophole allows the administration to get around that."

Democrats have questioned whether the Bush administration was using the dismissals to reward political allies. McNulty conceded the Justice Department removed Arkansas prosecutor Ed Cummins without cause to make room for a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove.

David Iglesias, the U.S. Attorney for the District of New Mexico, said this week that he was fired because he failed to rush an indictment that might have boosted the Republicans during the 2006 election.

Bogden said he was never asked to back off investigating Gov. Jim Gibbons, a Republican. The probe is examining whether Gibbons accepted unreported gifts and payments from friend and businessman Warren Trepp in exchange for his help as a member of the House Intelligence and Armed Services committees.

Bogden said the Justice Department has never pressured him on any case.

Bogden worked for the Justice Department for 16 years. In 2001, he was asked to interview for the U.S. attorney position. Bogden said he was hesitant because he knew that new administrations choose their own U.S. attorneys and he would someday be out of a job.

Besides, the Ohio native said, he had reached his dream of being a federal prosecutor.

"I knew once I stepped up and took the U.S. attorney job, I would have forgone my career at the Department of Justice," Bogden said. "I knew I'd be sitting here in a position like this someday. I just didn't think it would be today."

Battle called Bogden and informed him of his dismissal the day after Bogden returned from a four-day U.S. attorneys conference in Washington, D.C. On Dec. 6, the night before Bogden was fired, McNulty delivered a speech to the gathering of the country's chief prosecutors.

"He called us the best group of U.S. attorneys ever assembled in the history of the country," Bogden said. "It was a nice speech, very touching. Now maybe I should look at it as my eulogy."

Bogden asked the Department of Justice whether he could stay until the end of February to help the office transition into new leadership. But as Bogden finished packing his office Thursday, the Justice Department still had not named a permanent replacement or an interim U.S. attorney.

First Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Myhre is serving as acting U.S. attorney.

Bogden said he is proud of his time at the helm of the Nevada office. During his tenure, the office was understaffed by about 15 attorneys.

"We have effectively, efficiently and successfully covered all of our national and district priorities despite being understaffed and under-budgeted," Bogden said.

Bogden plans to take time off to figure out his next career move. He is concerned that the Justice Department's comments that his firing was performance-related will hurt his chances of finding a new job.

Although he savors his career with the Department of Justice, he can't help having mixed feelings about the department for which he worked for nearly two decades.

"I'm plenty bitter," Bogden said. "Here's a job that you think you are doing in an outstanding fashion and suddenly to get a call like that with little or no explanation."

Reddit Ashcroft Cancels Pizza Party For Ex-Colleagues (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

U.S. News and World Report, March 2, 2007

Former Attorney General turned lobbyist John Ashcroft canceled the pizza party he was scheduled to host yesterday for the political appointees from his days heading the Justice Department.

The cancellation came after usnews.com reported that the department's ethics office had flagged the party as potentially troublesome in terms of appearance.

In an E-mail sent to the invitees, which Ashcroft's senior adviser, Juleanna Glover Weiss, provided to U.S News, Ashcroft said that he did not realize that "our sharing of a pizza and soft drinks might erode the high levels of integrity we worked so diligently to engender" when he was attorney general. Ashcroft added that he did not "believe for a second" that the invitees' integrity "could be compromised for a piece of pizza." But he said that "no fellowship over lunch" was "worth the sacrifice of any public confidence in the justice community." Instead, "Going back to my traditional brown bag lunch," wrote Ashcroft, "will not be too much of a challenge for me."

The Justice Department's ethics office had not prohibited invitees from attending but asked them to consider how their participation might be perceived. It has been two years since Ashcroft left the department and formed the lucrative Ashcroft Group lobbying and consulting firm. So he's past some of the restrictions imposed on former government officials from lobbying their old agency.

However, because the Ashcroft Group has big clients that have been sued by the department, in antitrust and other ongoing litigation, the invitation raised eyebrows.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Gonzales: 'Protecting Integrity Of Business' A Top Priority (SDDT)

San Diego Daily Transcript via Yahoo! News, March 2, 2007

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales touted the Department of Justice's commitment to combating corporate fraud and public corruption in a speech Thursday in San Diego.

Gonzales, making his first appearance here since becoming attorney general two years ago, addressed the American Bar Associations' national institute on white-collar crime.

His remarks came two weeks after Carol Lam was reportedly forced out as U.S. attorney in San Diego because she concentrated too much on white-collar crime and not enough on border smuggling and illegal immigration.

In his speech, Gonzales said reliability and transparency are needed for a successful economy.

"As attorney general, protecting the integrity of business and government is a top priority of mine," he said. "A free market cannot include the freedom to cheat, to defraud or to steal. Rules and enforcement are needed to protect the playing field itself and ensure fair competition."

The Justice Department established a corporate fraud task force in 2002, and it had obtained 1,100 convictions as of the end of last year.

Gonzales said the recent prosecutions involving Enron and WorldComm and the new restrictions imposed by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act have changed corporate America.

Stanford Law School reported a 38 percent decline last year in class-action lawsuits involving securities issues.

But the attorney general said he does not want the Justice Department's renewed oversight to hamper American innovation or prevent individuals from taking risks.

"The United States is the economic envy of the world," he said, "and we are dedicated to keeping it that way. That means we'll stand fast by the laws that keep the markets clean, but it also means we'll stay cognizant of the private sector's need for the oxygen that feeds innovation."

He also praised the government's "offensive against all types of white-collar crime."

"We have a strong record of prosecuting public corruption cases during my tenure as attorney general," he said. "As evidence of that commitment, we have added resources to this fight."

He noted the FBI added 200 new field agents last year to fight public corruption, and it has scored a number of significant convictions.

DOJ_NMG_0138760

Government prosecutors, Gonzales said, are also cracking down in the new area of backdating stock options. The Justice Department recently accepted guilty pleas from two executives of Comverse Technology Inc., including its general counsel and chief financial officer, involving backdating.

As recently as last month, Gonzales said, the general counsel of the recruiting firm Monster Inc. pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy and fraud arising from this involvement in a scheme to backdate options.

The attorney general also highlighted another success, a case he called "one of the first-ever extraditions for an intellectual property offense."

The indictment charged the leader of a Internet software piracy group with violating U.S. criminal copyright laws. Prior to dismantling, the piracy group was "estimated to have caused the illegal reproduction and distribution of more than $500 million worth of pirated software, movies, games and music," according to Gonzales.

The Justice Department's civil division, meanwhile, has obtained 57 felony convictions against business opportunity scammers -- companies that sell phony franchise businesses with the promise of great profits.

Gonzales said the government is combating environmental crime and tax crime as well.

He also explained how the Justice Department is coordinating with other countries to fight corruption globally.

"We send Justice Department employees to help train policemen, prosecutors and judges in countries around the world," he said. "And that includes assistant U.S. attorneys and FBI agents who have chosen to serve in Iraq and Afghanistan."

13 Charged In Big Insider Trading Scam (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Federal prosecutors unsealed criminal charges against more than a dozen people, including former executives at four of Wall Street's elite institutions, accused of engaging in thousands of improper trades in two schemes that netted more than $15 million in profit.

A grand jury in Manhattan indicted nine people on conspiracy, fraud and bribery charges. Among them were lawyers and officials responsible for protecting the integrity of the firms and the market, who instead became perpetrators, prosecutors said. They worked for such top-tier firms as UBS, Morgan Stanley, Bank of America Securities and Bear Stearns.

Four others, who agreed to plea bargains, helped investigators crack open the massive, six-year insider-trading plot and will provide testimony against their onetime associates, government officials said.

Together, the charges and guilty pleas mark one of the biggest and most prominent insider-trading busts since the era of Ivan Boesky and Dennis Levine, when handcuffed executives were marched out of investment firms two decades ago.

"It is particularly pernicious when Wall Street insiders . . . shamelessly compromise the markets' integrity and investors' trust for a quick buck," said Linda Chatman Thomsen, the enforcement chief at the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The six-month probe unearthed furtive meetings among the alleged conspirators, who used disposable cellphones and coded text messages to evade detection and paid kickbacks in the form of cash-filled envelopes. Investigators said they shook their heads at times as the case increasingly resembled the greed on display in the 1987 film "Wall Street."

The charges come as federal authorities are accelerating their efforts to stanch the improper flow of information among a select group of insiders on Wall Street -- a tactic that allows insiders to reap handsome profits at the expense of average investors.

Among those charged is Mitchel S. Guttenberg, a manager in UBS's equity research department, who prosecutors say tipped off traders to forthcoming upgrades and downgrades in specific stocks in exchange for a share of the profit. Guttenberg was arrested at home yesterday morning, said FBI official Teresa L. Carlson.

In 2001, as part of his job, Guttenberg gained access to a daily list of UBS analyst recommendations before it was distributed to the public, government officials said. He first exploited the information to repay a $25,000 personal loan owed to Erik R. Franklin, a former employee of Bear Stearns who has worked at three hedge funds in recent years, according to court papers.

DOJ_NMG_0138761

The pair initially met at New York's fabled Oyster Bar, in the bowels of Grand Central Terminal. But finding that arrangement nettlesome, they bought disposable cellphones and sent each other coded text messages before UBS analysts downgraded their ratings on such stocks as Allstate and CVS.

The scheme involved thousands of trades, according to SEC officials. Guttenberg and Franklin invited others to join them, including relatives and executives who had worked at Bear Stearns, regulators said. The men traded in their personal accounts as well as in Franklin's hedge fund accounts.

Brokers at the New York firm Assent discovered the scheme by monitoring an account that some of the participants used. Instead of reporting the problem to law enforcement officials, however, the Assent brokers "blackmailed" the traders for more than $180,000 in cash to keep quiet, U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia said at a news conference in New York.

"Each of the individuals we charged had a responsibility to protect investors and the integrity of the markets," said Scott W. Friestad, an SEC associate director of enforcement. "What's particularly insidious about this case is that the first instinct of each of these individuals was to try to find a way to personally benefit from the non-public information rather than to do the right thing."

A second alleged plot revolved around Randi E. Collotta, a former compliance unit officer at Morgan Stanley, who prosecutors say shared tips with her husband and other traders about coming corporate acquisitions involving bank clients from 2004 to 2005. Collotta, an attorney, violated Morgan Stanley policy by passing on word of Adobe Systems' looming acquisition of Macromedia and of UnitedHealth Group's purchase of PacifiCare Health Systems, among other deals, according to court papers.

The two rings converged with Franklin and another man, former Bear Stearns professional Robert D. Babcock. Babcock, who also processed trades for one of Franklin's hedge funds, received tips from a participant in the Morgan Stanley scheme. He allegedly shared that inside information with Franklin and others, authorities said.

SEC investigators found an avenue into the byzantine schemes more than six months ago after examining trades by Franklin's father-in-law in advance of a 2005 Morgan Stanley deal involving Catellus Development. SEC lawyers searched extensive trading records for patterns that led them to Franklin's doorstep.

In October, securities investigators flagged the issue for federal prosecutors and FBI agents in New York and expanded their probe from trades involving corporate mergers to transactions based on when UBS analysts had upgraded or downgraded stock ratings.

Franklin, who helped authorities unravel the scheme, pleaded guilty to conspiracy, securities fraud and bribery on Tuesday. Babcock pleaded guilty to similar charges a day later, but prosecutors kept both agreements secret until yesterday.

Eight of the defendants appeared in New York and another appeared in Florida for arraignment yesterday. Each pleaded not guilty, and all were released on bond.

Barry P. Barbash, a former securities regulator who now works at the law firm of Willkie, Farr & Gallagher, said the case reflects the fact that a generation of young professionals no longer recalls seeing Wall Street titans face perp walks and grueling trials for insider-trading crimes in the 1980s.

"This case is an unfortunate reminder to everybody in the business . . . It's sobering."

In recent months, prosecutors and securities regulators have focused on hedge funds and private-equity companies -- fast-growing investments designed for wealthy individuals and institutions -- that strive to gather bits of information to profit in advance of corporate announcements.

At a meeting yesterday in Texas with leaders of each of the SEC's regional offices, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox affirmed that policing possible insider trading by hedge funds would be a top regulatory priority over the next two years.

Feds Charge 13 With Inside Trading (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, March 2, 2007

NEW YORK — Federal prosecutors announced criminal charges Thursday against 13 people, accusing them of participating in the biggest network of inside trading on Wall Street since the days of Ivan Boesky.

DOJ_NMG_0138762

The criminal charges allege that traders from a handful of hedge funds and brokerages, acting on illegal inside information from some of Wall Street's biggest firms, netted $8 million in tainted gains from December 2001 to August 2006.

The Securities and Exchange Commission, which discovered evidence of the ring last year during a routine investigation, filed a parallel set of civil charges against 11 individuals and three hedge funds.

While the $8 million pales in comparison with the enormous sums misappropriated by Boesky and others in the 1980s, the scheme exposed Thursday was nevertheless shocking, said Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's director of enforcement.

The majority of inside trading cases involve an individual who comes across inside information and can't resist the temptation to make a quick buck. The difference here, Thomsen said, is that the inside trading ring operated for five years, involved hundreds of tips and thousands of relatively small trades. Worst of all, the inside information allegedly came from three "top tier" Wall Street firms: UBS, Morgan Stanley and Bear Stearns. "It's particularly pernicious when Wall Street insiders … shamelessly compromise the markets' integrity and investors' trust for a quick buck," she said.

Court documents filed by the SEC and Michael Garcia, the U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, allege that the ring leaders of the scheme were: Mitchel Guttenberg, an executive director at UBS; Randi Collotta, an attorney in Morgan Stanley's compliance department; and Erik Franklin, a former portfolio manager for a hedge fund at Bear Stearns. Franklin has pleaded guilty. Attorneys for Collotta and Guttenberg could not be reached.

The documents allege that the scheme was launched in 2001 when Guttenberg met with Franklin at the Oyster Bar, a well-known restaurant in Manhattan's Grand Central Station. At the time, Guttenberg owed Franklin $25,000.

According to the SEC, Guttenberg proposed to pay off the debt by giving Franklin advance notice of significant changes in the position of UBS analysts on stocks. For example, in December 2001 Guttenberg allegedly tipped off Franklin that UBS was about to downgrade Allstate from "strong buy" to "hold." Franklin shorted the stock through the Bear Stearns hedge fund where he worked, netting a quick profit of $10,100 when the downgrade was published.

Prosecutors alleged that Collotta, a former Morgan Stanley attorney, shared sensitive information about upcoming mergers and acquisitions with her husband and a trader in Florida. The three allegedly split the trading profits that resulted. The Wall Street banks say that they are victims of the crimes and are cooperating with the investigation.

13 Accused Of Trading As Insiders (NYT)

By Jenny Anderson And Michael J. De La Merced

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

It started in 2001 with two old friends meeting at the Oyster Bar in the basement of Grand Central Terminal in Manhattan, discussing a $25,000 debt.

It ended yesterday with federal authorities saying that they had exposed one of the most far-reaching insider trading schemes on Wall Street in decades, involving four investment banks and a web of hedge funds, day traders, lawyers and even a few supervisors, who upon discovering evidence of insider trading, blackmailed the traders to keep quiet about it.

Thirteen people were accused yesterday of taking part in the trading ring, including a former Morgan Stanley compliance official, a senior UBS research executive, three employees from Bear Stearns and a Bank of America employee.

Linda C. Thomsen, chief of enforcement at the Securities and Exchange Commission, described the scheme as one of the most “pervasive Wall Street insider trading rings since the days of Ivan Boesky and Dennis Levine.”

Nine of the defendants have been arrested, and four have pleaded guilty to charges ranging from securities fraud, conspiracy to commit securities fraud and bribery. The investigation, conducted by the S.E.C., the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the office of the United States attorney in Manhattan, has been under way for more than a year and is continuing.

The schemes described by federal authorities were unusual for their breadth and the seniority of the executives involved.

The tactics, however, were all too familiar: Wall Street executives tipping hedge fund traders about potential upgrades or downgrades of stocks, information sure to move a stock’s price; leaking information about pending mergers and acquisitions, and taking kickbacks to get access to hot deals. In the middle, authorities say, was a hedge fund manager looking for an edge.

DOJ_NMG_0138763

Federal authorities say that in 2001, Mitchel S. Guttenberg, a 41-year-old executive director in the stock research department of UBS, met a friend, Erik R. Franklin, then a hedge fund manager at Bear Stearns at the Oyster Bar. Mr. Guttenberg owed Mr. Franklin $25,000 and proposed paying that debt with information about stock upgrades and downgrades. He was a member of the firm's investment review committee, which reviewed and approved analyst recommendations.

Mr. Guttenberg provided hundreds of tips to Mr. Franklin about rating changes so that he could make quick trades in his hedge fund at Bear Stearns, Lyford Cay Capital. The two agreed to share the after-tax profits after the debt between them was settled. They exchanged cash at arranged meeting places — echoes of the Boesky case — and bought disposable cellphones and created codes to communicate with one another.

Lyford Cay was a small hedge fund overseen by Kurt W. Butenhoff, a senior managing director at Bear Stearns who is a top-producing broker and an equity derivatives specialist. Lyford Cay was made available to the firm's high-net-worth clients, a number of whom resided in the exclusive resort of the same name in the Bahamas, as well as senior Bear Stearns executives. The fund was closed down in 2004 because of poor performance.

Mr. Franklin reported to Mr. Butenhoff. In 2002, Mr. Franklin left Lyford Cay to return to Chelsey Capital, a hedge fund whose president once sought to buy the New Jersey Nets. Mr. Franklin joined forces with another portfolio manager, informed him about the UBS tips and the two traded on them, investigators say.

A spokesman for DSJ International, which operates as Chelsey Capital, said: "We are dismayed to learn of the actions of two former employees who left over four years ago. We are committed to continue cooperating in the investigation."

Mr. Guttenberg pleaded not guilty yesterday. His lawyer declined to comment. Mr. Franklin has pleaded guilty. His lawyer declined to comment.

Over five years, according to the S.E.C., Mr. Franklin made $5 million in illicit profits for his various hedge funds, his own personal accounts and an account in the name of his father-in-law, said the S.E.C.

But the ties went further than the two friends: each had his own network of tippees. The case was so complex that the United States attorney in Manhattan, Michael J. Garcia, yesterday used a large poster board to explain the inner workings. "Clearly greed is at work," he said.

According to court filings, some of Mr. Franklin's former Bear Stearns colleagues, including Robert Babcock, also worked with Lyford Cay and knew he was receiving, and profiting from, illegal information. After Mr. Franklin left Lyford Cay at Bear Stearns, Mr. Babcock continued to monitor Mr. Franklin's personal accounts and used the information to trade for Lyford, making $660,000 between late 2001 to 2003. Another Bear Stearns employee was accused of using information gleaned from Mr. Franklin's account to trade for his own accounts.

Mr. Babcock has pleaded guilty. His lawyer declined to comment.

"Actions described in the complaint are clear violations of our policies and procedures," said Russell Sherman, a Bear Stearns spokesman. "We have and will continue to cooperate fully with the investigation."

Mr. Guttenberg gave tips to other friends, including David Tavdy, a 38-year-old proprietary trader at Andover Brokerage, which was later acquired by Assent. Mr. Tavdy traded on information at Assent and then later at Jasper Capital. Mr. Tavdy ultimately made $6 million trading in illicit information, according to the S.E.C.

Mr. Tavdy pleaded not guilty. His lawyer did not return calls.

Two executives at Assent got wind of the illegal UBS information and the trading that was going on with it. Rather than turn the traders in, they demanded bribes of $150,000 between them to keep quiet, investigators say. The two executives face charges.

A UBS spokeswoman, Rohini Pragasam, said, "UBS is assisting the authorities to the fullest extent possible in their investigation into the alleged actions of a single UBS employee."

It was not the UBS scheme, however, that tipped off regulators but rather trading around big mergers that got the S.E.C.'s attention.

According to authorities, in 2004, Randi Collotta, a 30-year-old lawyer in the global compliance department at Morgan Stanley, teamed up with her husband, Christopher Collotta, to dispense information about Morgan Stanley's work on coming mergers to Marc Jurman, a high school friend of Mr. Collotta's. In return, authorities said they would receive a share of illegal profits.

Mr. Jurman traded on deals including Adobe Systems acquisition of Macromedia in 2005 and ProLogis's acquisition of Catellus Development. The information netted them about $600,000.

Mr. Jurman in turn tipped off Mr. Babcock, who passed on information to Mr. Franklin and his partners at Bear Stearns, closing a wide, and very lucrative, circle.

Unusual trading in Catellus tipped off the S.E.C. The trading led to an account in the name of Mr. Franklin's father-in-law. Over a year of investigation, the myriad connections became clear.

Mark Lake, a Morgan Stanley spokesman said, "We are outraged that a former employee allegedly stole confidential information from the firm, and we have cooperated and will continue cooperating fully with the authorities."

Mr. Garcia described Morgan Stanley and UBS as victims.

Mr. Jurman pleaded guilty. His lawyer, Lilly Ann Sanchez, said: "We aimed to resolve this case expeditiously. Mr. Jurman is a very minor player in the overall conspiracy."

The Collottas entered not guilty pleas yesterday.

Mr. Franklin had yet another scheme going to get inside information: between late 2005 and October 2006, Paul Risoli, a broker at Banc of America Securities, is accused of allocating shares of initial public offerings and secondary offerings to Q Capital, Mr. Franklin's hedge fund, netting the fund at least $160,000. Mr. Franklin is accused of paying Mr. Risoli $9,500 as part of the scheme.

Mr. Risoli pleaded not guilty. His lawyer could not be reached yesterday.

"We are aware of the situation and we are cooperating with authorities," said Shirley Norton, a spokeswoman for Bank of America.

For two counts of conspiracy to commit fraud and four counts of securities fraud, Mr. Franklin would face a maximum of 90 years in prison, but sentencing guidelines suggest he would more likely face about five years.

The S.E.C. complaint accused 11 people and 3 entities of making illicit profits totaling more than $15 million, while the criminal charges cite illicit profits of $8 million from 13 individuals.

A 'Brazen' Insider Scheme Revealed (WSJ)

By Randall Smith, Kara Scannell And Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

Mitchel Guttenberg was $25,000 in debt to Erik Franklin when the two friends got together in 2001 to settle the obligation. The scheme they allegedly concocted that day in New York's cavernous Oyster Bar restaurant grew into one of Wall Street's biggest insider-trading cases in years.

Mr. Guttenberg, now 41 years old, agreed to relay advance word of potentially market-moving stock analysis by the Wall Street arm of Swiss bank UBS AG, where he was a research executive, to Mr. Franklin, now 39, a hedge-fund manager in those days at Bear Stearns Cos., authorities said.

THE ADOBE LEAK

• On April 18, 2005, Adobe Systems announced it would buy Macromedia, sending Macromedia's stock up 10%.

• Before the news, Morgan Stanley's Randi Collotta learned the information. She and her husband, Christopher, passed it to Florida broker Marc Jurman. He bought (for himself and his father) "call" option contracts, betting on a rally in Macromedia and two other stocks. Profit: $30,000.

• Mr. Jurman also tipped Bear Stearns broker Robert Babcock on Macromedia and two other deals. He bought call options. Profit: $75,000.

Source: SEC complaint

Federal prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission yesterday unveiled insider-trading charges against the duo and eleven others, including three other former brokers at Bear Stearns.

DOJ_NMG_0138765

The participants in what the SEC called a "brazen" scheme allegedly earned about $15 million based on two strands of alleged inside information. The main one, from the UBS research, accounted for most of those gains. A second stemmed from leaks of takeover deals in the works at the blue-chip Wall Street firm Morgan Stanley.

The takeover-trading tips came from former Morgan Stanley lawyer Randi Collotta, 30, who was a compliance official responsible for monitoring adherence to securities rules, the SEC said. In a statement, Morgan Stanley said it was "outraged" and had cooperated in the probe and would continue doing so. Ms. Collotta pleaded not guilty in federal court.

UBS depicted itself as a "victim" of the scheme and said it is "committed to safeguarding the integrity of its proprietary information." Bear Stearns, whose employees allegedly traded on both the UBS and Morgan Stanley tips, said the actions described by regulators "are clear violations of our policies and procedures." Both UBS and Bear said they are cooperating as well.

The case suggests how easy it can be to get and trade on market-moving information before its public disclosure. Participants used disposable cellphones and coded text messages to cover their tracks and at times passed cash in a Doritos bag, people familiar with the case said. Along the way, some of the participants allegedly paid $150,000 to two defendants to keep their trading under wraps, payments U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia in Manhattan called "blackmail."

SEC enforcement director Linda Chatman Thomsen said the illegal trading in the case "shamelessly" compromised "the markets' integrity and investors' trust for a quick buck."

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

Speaking at a news conference2 in Manhattan, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia outlines federal charges in an insider-trading case involving 13 defendants from Morgan Stanley, UBS, Bear Stearns and Bank of America.

The SEC filed civil charges against 11 people, two hedge funds and one day-trading firm. Federal prosecutors also charged 10 of the 11 individuals, and three others, with criminal violations.

The alleged scheme, which stretched from late 2001 to last fall, was uncovered within the last six months -- after the SEC checked into suspicious trading by Mr. Franklin's father-in-law before news in June 2005 of an acquisition of Catellus Development Corp. involving Morgan Stanley bankers.

Four of those charged, including Mr. Franklin, have pleaded guilty to criminal charges including conspiracy, securities fraud and commercial bribery. Mr. Guttenberg was arrested at 6 a.m. EST yesterday at his home on the East Side of Manhattan. Wearing a dark blue long-sleeve T-shirt and jeans in court, he pleaded not guilty and was released on $500,000 bond. He declined to comment.

At UBS, Mr. Guttenberg was an executive director and institutional-client manager in the research department, serving since 2001 on its investment-review committee, the SEC said. The committee members got an advance look at midday of the next days' reports, some of them market-moving, by research analysts who rate stocks and forecast their earnings.

After their 2001 meeting at the Oyster Bar in the basement of New York's Grand Central Terminal, the SEC said, Mr. Guttenberg began feeding advance tips about UBS research to Mr. Franklin, who then managed a hedge fund at Bear Stearns with the tony name Lyford Cay.

The SEC said Lyford Cay earned $10,000 from advance word of a UBS downgrade of insurer Allstate Corp. in December 2001 by selling borrowed shares and quickly buying them back at a profit of about $1 a share. Mr. Franklin also traded ahead of new ratings on Lexmark International Group Inc., U.S. Bancorp and Union Pacific Corp.

After Mr. Franklin's profits on the trades were enough to repay the loan, the SEC said, he began making cash payments to Mr. Guttenberg at prearranged meetings.

Before Mr. Franklin left Bear Stearns in February 2002, the SEC said, some of his Lyford Cay trades were entered by another Bear Stearns broker, Robert Babcock, who also entered orders in Mr. Franklin's personal account at Bear Stearns.

Mr. Babcock, realizing that some of the Franklin trades were based on nonpublic information, began using them to trade stocks for Lyford Cay and for his own account and continued to do so after Mr. Franklin left, the SEC said -- netting the Bear Stearns hedge fund $600,000 in illicit profits from 2001-2003. Mr. Babcock has pleaded guilty, and his lawyer declined to comment. Two other Bear Stearns brokers who worked on the same desk as Mr. Babcock, Ken Okada and Andrew Srebnik, also piggybacked on Mr. Franklin's trades for their personal accounts in 2002, the SEC said. Mr. Okada pleaded not guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud and was released on bail of $100,000. Mr. Srebnik, who wasn't charged criminally, couldn't be reached.

After leaving Bear Stearns, Mr. Franklin joined another hedge fund, Chelsey Capital, where he provided UBS tips to portfolio manager Mark Lenowitz, garnering Chelsey $2 million in illicit profits and Mr. Lenowitz $325,000, the SEC said. In March 2003, Mr. Franklin opened a new hedge fund, Q Capital, with Mr. Lenowitz as a partner and investor -- netting another $300,000, the SEC said.

Mr. Lenowitz pleaded not guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud and was released on $250,000 bond. A spokesman for Chelsey, now doing business as DSJ International Resources Ltd., said it was "dismayed" and cooperating.

The biggest alleged beneficiary of UBS tips from Mr. Guttenberg was another friend, David Tavdy, who earned $6 million in illicit profits for himself, a friend and a relative at firms called Andover, Assent and Jasper Capital. At Assent, two employees who learned of the trading got $150,000 for their silence, the SEC said. Mr. Tavdy and those firms, one of which has closed, couldn't be reached.

In 2004 and 2005, the Morgan Stanley deal tips also found their way to Mr. Franklin and two of the Bear brokers, Messrs. Babcock and Okada, via a Florida broker, Marc Jurman, a friend of Ms. Collotta's husband, Christopher. They included advance word of acquisitions of Argosy Gaming Co., Macromedia Inc., and Pacificare Health Systems Inc.

Mr. Jurman pleaded guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud, and his attorney called him a "minor player" who earned only $30,000. Mr. Collotta pleaded not guilty, and his lawyer declined to comment.

US Charges 13 With Insider Trading (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

Thirteen people, including current and former employees of Morgan Stanley, UBS and Bear Stearns, have been charged with criminal securities fraud in what US authorities said on Thursday was “one of the most pervasive Wall Street insider trading rings since the days of Ivan Boesky”.

The ring capitalised on two key sources of inside information, according to US Attorney Michael Garcia.

Randi Collotta, a Morgan Stanley compliance officer, allegedly passed on news of pending mergers and acquisitions from 2004 to 2005. Mitchel Guttenberg, a UBS executive director, allegedly gave traders for several hedge funds advance warning of stock upgrades and downgrades for more than six years.

The stream of conspirators who passed on or used the inside information eventually grew to include 14 people, including eight Wall Street professionals, two broker-dealers and three hedge funds, including Lyford Cay, a Bear Stearns vehicle, the Securities and Exchange Commission said.

The SEC estimated that the participants netted more than $15m. If convicted, the defendants face potential maximum sentences ranging from 15 to 90 years, depending on their alleged level of involvement.

Four people – including Erik Franklin, 39, and Robert Babcock, 33, both former Bear employees – have pleaded guilty to criminal charges. Nine others, including Mr Guttenberg and Mrs Collotta and her husband, Christopher, were arrested early on Thursday.

“Insider trading is more than just peeking into your opponent’s hand in a friendly poker game. It’s not just unethical. It is a felony,” said Teresa Carlson, acting FBI special agent in charge in New York.

The two insider trading schemes were separate, but some of the same investors – including Mr Franklin and Mr Babcock – benefited from both, Mr Garcia said. His office also brought a third Wall Street case today, charging Paul Risoli, a Bank of America employee, with taking kickbacks in exchange for allocating initial public offering shares to Mr Franklin.

Morgan Stanley and UBS both said they were co-operating with the investigation. UBS said Mr Guttenberg had been placed on unpaid leave. Mrs Collotta left Morgan Stanley of her own volition more than a year ago.

“Some defendants may have thought they were flying ‘under the radar’ by making modest profits on individual transactions, secure in the knowledge that, over hundreds of tips, they would reap millions,” said Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC enforcement director, who also compared the schemes to those of Mr Boesky, a central figure in the insider trading scandals of the late 1980s.

Investigators Say They've Uncovered $15-million Insider-trading Plot (LAT)

By Walter Hamilton And Thomas S. Mulligan, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

NEW YORK — In 2001, Wall Street executive Mitchel Guttenberg sat down with his friend, Erik Franklin, in New York City's famed Oyster Bar to discuss repaying a $25,000 loan.

But instead of giving him cash, Guttenberg offered a currency that can be even more valuable on Wall Street: inside information about dozens of stock analyst recommendations at his firm, financial-services powerhouse UBS.

Thus began what regulators described today as the most pervasive insider-trading scandal to course through Wall Street since the days of Ivan Boesky and Dennis Levine in the late 1980s.

That scheme -- and another at Morgan Stanley that was also disclosed today -- encompassed 14 people, four major Wall Street firms, several hedge funds and more than $15 million in illicit profits over a four-year period, according to federal authorities.

"This involved people who should have known better and people who were making a great living," said Linda Thomsen, enforcement director at the Securities and Exchange Commission. "This is outrageous."

With insider trading, someone with advance knowledge of important events -- such as an analyst recommendation or a corporate merger -- trades on that information or passes it along to an accomplice.

Though it has receded from public view in the years since Boesky and others made headlines, authorities fear that insider trading is making a comeback on Wall Street amid the current bull market. In particular, they are worried that hedge funds -- private investment groups known for their aggressive styles -- are using such tips to make big profits.

In their case, Guttenberg and Franklin allegedly went to elaborate lengths to conceal their activity, using such dodges as disposable cell phones, coded text messages and clandestine meetings.

And, authorities said, there proved to be no honor among thieves, as several people who caught wind of the insider trading launched mirror trades of their own, and two people went so far as to blackmail the original perpetrators by threatening to expose them.

Taken together, the schemes also involved trading on initial public stock offerings and on red-hot mergers and acquisitions, including the 2005 buyout of California health insurer PacifiCare Health Systems Inc.

Two Lawyers, 11 Others Indicted For Roles In Insider Trading (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, March 2, 2007

Federal authorities Thursday announced the indictment of 13 people on insider trading charges, including a former Morgan Stanley compliance lawyer and her husband, also an attorney.

The Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney's Office claims the defendants participated in two overlapping insider trading rings. The larger of the two was allegedly fed by Mitchel Guttenberg, an institutional client manager in the equity research group at UBS Securities, who tipped off several Wall Street traders over the past six years about upcoming recommendations by UBS analysts.

The second ring was fed by Randi Collotta, a former member of Morgan Stanley's global compliance group who in 2004 and 2005 passed along non-public information about mergers and acquisitions transactions on which the investment bank was advising.

The recipients of her tips included her husband, Christopher Collotta, a Bohemia, N.Y., labor and employment lawyer, and his friend Marc Jurman, a Florida-based broker. Jurman in turn tipped off Robert Babcock, a Bear Stearns & Co. broker who also participated in the UBS ring.

DOJ_NMG_0138768

According to the Securities and Exchange Commission, which also filed a civil complaint in the matter yesterday, the UBS participants made at least $14 million in profits from trading on inside information. The Morgan Stanley scheme netted its participants at least $600,000.

Each defendant faces multiple securities fraud counts, each of which carries a maximum prison term of 20 years. They also face fines and disgorgement of trading profits. Four defendants, including Jurman and Babcock, pleaded guilty earlier in the week.

Guttenberg sold information directly for hundreds of thousands of dollars to two Wall Street traders, Erik Franklin and David Tavdy, who also have pleaded guilty to insider trading. Franklin managed two hedge funds, including one for Bear Stearns, while Tavdy was a proprietary trader for two small broker-dealers. The two passed along the UBS information to hedge fund manager Mark Lenowitz, day trader David Glass and three Bear Stearns brokers -- Andrew Srebnik, Ken Okada and Babcock.

The Southern District prosecutors also brought charges against two brokerage employees who helped conceal trading -- Samuel Childs and Laurence McKeever of Hoboken, N.J.-based Assent brokerage -- activity by Tavdy and Glass, as well as a Banc of America Securities broker who received a kickback for placing initial public offering shares with one of Franklin's hedge funds.

Among the inside information Guttenberg passed along was that UBS was going to downgrade the stocks of Caterpillar Inc. and Union Pacific and upgrade those of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and Whole Foods Market Inc. The tippees shorted those stocks to be downgraded and accumulated those that were to be upgraded.

Ms. Collotta's duties at Morgan Stanley, where she worked from 2003 to 2005, included ensuring that confidential deal information was maintained in accordance with both the firm's policies and federal regulations. She tipped off her husband and Jurman ahead of time about Penn National Gaming Inc.'s 2004 acquisition of Argosy Gaming Co.; Johnson & Johnson's unsuccessful bid for Guidant Corp.; Adobe Systems Inc.'s 2005 acquisition of Macromedia Inc.; and other deals.

Both Ms. Collotta, 30, and Mr. Collotta, 34, graduated from St. John's University Law School. He is an associate at the four-lawyer Long Island firm of Zabell & Associates. She most recently worked for The Garden City Group Inc., which provides administration services to large-scale litigations.

US Busts Wall St. Insider Trading 'Ring' That Pocketed Millions (AFP)

By Justin Cole

AFP, March 2, 2007

Federal authorities Thursday announced they had busted a major Wall Street insider trading ring of securities dealers, hedge fund traders and a corporate attorney, and had filed criminal charges against 13 people.

The defendants were accused of illegally amassing millions of dollars by stealing sensitive market information from major investment banks including UBS and Morgan Stanley, aided by members of the ring who worked at the two banks.

The Securities and Exchange Commission said it filed civil charges against the 13 plus one additional person.

The SEC claimed the ring had pocketed over 15 million dollars in "illegal insider trading profits on thousands of trades" dating to 2005.

Its members used inside information, on companies such as Caterpillar and Goldman Sachs, to executive favorable stock trades and net illicit gains, according to officials.

Those accused in the scheme could face prison terms of up to 20 years on some charges. They also could face hefty civil fines from the SEC.

"Today's action is one of the largest SEC insider trading cases against Wall Street professionals since the days of Ivan Boesky and Dennis Levine," said Scott Friestad, an associate director of enforcement at the SEC.

Boesky and Levine both served prison terms for well-publicized securities fraud and insider dealing cases on Wall Street during the 1980s. The movie "Wall Street" was based in part upon Boesky's illicit activities.

"Our action today is one of several that will make very clear the SEC is targeting hedge fund insider trading as a top priority," SEC chairman Christopher Cox said.

DOJ_NMG_0138769

The involvement of hedge fund traders in the ring is likely to spur calls for tougher oversight of the secretive capital pools whose financial muscle has grown rapidly in recent years.

One of the more senior professionals charged was Mitchel Guttenberg, 41, an executive director and institutional client manager at UBS' equity research department.

Guttenberg was charged with securities fraud and could face years behind bars if found guilty of the charges.

"UBS is assisting the authorities to the fullest extent possible in their investigation into the alleged actions of a single UBS employee. The US Attorney has described UBS as a victim of this alleged scheme," UBS said in a statement.

Officials said the ring went to exhaustive lengths to hide their improper trading activities from scrutiny.

Members of the ring met at Manhattan's famed Oyster Bar and also used disposable cell phones, secret codes and cash kickbacks to pull off their improper trades, according to investigators.

Others charged included Randi Collotta, 30, the lone woman in the group and a former Morgan Stanley lawyer who allegedly passed on market tips on deals to her husband Christopher Collotta, 34, another lawyer.

Christopher Collotta then passed his wife's tips onto other members of the ring, the SEC claimed.

Erik Franklin, 39, who worked as a manager at the Lyford Cay hedge fund and also for Bear Stearns in New York, was also charged along with other defendants, including at least two other former Bear Stearns dealers and other hedge fund traders. Franklin's defense lawyer could not be reached for comment.

Other hedge funds named in the charging documents included the Q Capital hedge fund and the Chelsey Capital hedge fund.

"Todays events should send a message to anyone who believes that illegal insider trading is a quick and easy way to get rich," said SEC enforcement chief Linda Thomsen.

"No matter how clever you are, no matter how hard you try to avoid detection, you underestimate us at your peril," Thomsen warned.

The Justice Department and the SEC, who were aided by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, said their probes were ongoing and that financial penalties against those involved were also being sought.

Judge Rejects SEC Suit Against Former Citigroup Execs (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, March 2, 2007

Charges by the Securities and Exchange Commission that two former Citigroup executives "aided and abetted" their company in a scheme to cheat mutual fund investors of almost $100 million have been dismissed by a federal judge.

Southern District of New York Judge Richard Conway Casey granted Thomas W. Jones and Lewis E. Daidone's motion for summary judgment, finding that the SEC's actions seeking civil penalties and an injunction against the executives were time-barred.

In Securities and Exchange Commission v. Jones, 05 Civ. 7044, the judge also held that the SEC's request for disgorgement was "not supported by sufficient facts."

The commission was successful in winning a $208 million settlement against Citigroup, which did not admit or deny guilt. It did not rule out an appeal of Judge Casey's verdict.

"We are disappointed with the decision and are reviewing our options," said spokesman John Heine.

Jones was chief executive of Citigroup's asset management division, and Daidone was treasurer and chief financial officer of the Smith Barney mutual funds in question.

The case involves the 1999 establishment by the company's asset management division of an in-house transfer agent service and its decision to employ First Data, a processing services provider, as the sub-transfer agent.

A transfer agent is responsible for keeping shareholder records and for issuing or canceling stock certificates when shares are bought and sold.

DOJ_NMG_0138770

Citigroup Trust Bank "would take over customer service functions and would maintain overall responsibility for the transfer agent function while sub-contracting First Data to perform transaction processing and all other customary functions of a transfer agent," Casey explained.

Rather than passing a substantial fee discount to the funds, the SEC said that Citigroup's divisions, through the transfer agent, took most of the benefit of the discount for themselves, netting nearly $100 million in profit over five years at the expense of fund shareholders.

The agency alleged that Jones and Daidone did not accurately inform the company's board members as to how much Citigroup stood to make from the arrangement, and the true reasons for picking First Data to serve as subcontractor.

"[They] did not disclose to the Funds' boards the benefits [Citigroup] would receive from the transfer agent arrangement or the revenue guarantee letter that allegedly motivated [the company] to accept First Data's offer," the commission said.

The board ultimately approved the transfer agent proposal, which was implemented in 1999.

In 2003, Irving David, a former Citigroup employee, informed the SEC that the transfer agent arrangement was "probably not in the best interest of the shareholders of the funds," and accused Citigroup of making money that could have been passed on as savings to mutual fund shareholders.

After investigating the allegations, the SEC in May 2005 ordered the disgorgement of more than $109 million plus prejudgment interest, and payment of an $80 million civil penalty.

The commission sued Jones and Daidone in August 2005, alleging that their actions violated §206 of the Investment Advisers Act.

Although the agency only stated one cause of action against the men, it sought three forms of relief: civil penalties, a permanent injunction and disgorgement.

NO 'GUIDEPOSTS'

Judge Casey held that the civil monetary damages and permanent injunction requests were subject to the five-year statute of limitations outlined in 28 U.S.C. §2462. He deemed the requested remedies to be penalties in accordance with this statute, and said that because the agency filed its lawsuit six years after the alleged wrongdoing, it was time barred.

The judge said that while Jones and Daidone's allegedly fraudulent acts of misrepresentation may not have been affirmatively disclosed to the SEC, "the record does not support a finding that they were incapable of being known."

"Irving David drew the Commission's attention to things that were not concealed," he said. "The Commission's conclusory assertion of self-concealing fraud is insufficient to sustain its claim for civil penalties."

Casey also said the commission had not demonstrated that the requested injunction was aimed at protecting the public from future harm, and said the agency had not "put forth any facts that would indicate that Jones and Daidone engaged in a pattern of securities law violations."

In reviewing the disgorgement request, the judge said the agency did not provide evidence that the two former executives made money as a result of their alleged misrepresentations or omissions.

"Among the hundreds of pages submitted as exhibits to the parties' summary judgment papers, the commission is unable to provide the Court with any guideposts for determining the proper amount of Defendants' compensation subject to disgorgement," Casey said.

He said the only evidence the commission offered in support of its disgorgement action against Daidone involved statements from his supervisors that his compensation was based on how he performed on "significant projects," that the transfer agent initiative was a large project, and that his compensation in 1999 "might have been affected by the initiative."

In support of its disgorgement action against Jones, Casey said the agency offered "even fewer facts." Jones had testified that his boss was a "very performance-oriented person, and had a reputation that if you did a good job, he paid you well."

Jones was represented by James R. Doty, a former SEC general counsel who is now a partner at Baker Botts.

George I. Terrell, Jr., Alex J. Bourelly, Rebecca A. Huddle, Lennette W. Lee, Jeffrey J. McNabb, Timothy Loper and Joshua Klein, also of Baker Botts, were involved in the case.

DOJ_NMG_0138771

"Tom Jones did absolutely nothing wrong," Terrell said in an interview. "While Judge Casey's opinion centers on the statute of limitations argument, I have to believe that he was persuaded of his innocence because 95 percent of the summary judgment briefing concerned exactly that."

Jones was forced to resign from Citigroup in October 2004 after an internal audit determined that he had been responsible for a breakdown of oversight in private banking in Japan. The banking giant agreed to pay him $5 million in cash and to invest $50 million in a hedge fund that Jones oversaw (NYLJ, May 11, 2006).

Daidone was represented by Richard J. Morvillo, Michael O. Ware and Peter H. White of Mayer Brown Rowe & Maw.

"We were bullish about our prospects at trial, but it is always gratifying to have a court agree with you that a trial is not necessary," Morvillo said.

Mark K. Schonfeld, Courtney C. Fennimore, Valerie A. Szczepanik and James M. McGovern represented the SEC.

Omnicom Ex-Executive May Aid In Suit (WSJ)

By Peter Lattman And Vanessa O'connell

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

New allegations by a former Omnicom Group Inc. executive could provide legal ammunition to claims in a four-year-old securities-fraud lawsuit that the ad giant created a sham entity, Seneca Investments, to improperly avoid taking write-downs on its Internet assets.

In an amended complaint filed last month in federal court in Manhattan, the former chief executive of Seneca says Omnicom controlled the entity and no other party contributed any assets to it. The ad giant created Seneca in 2001 to move ailing Internet assets off its balance sheet.

In the lawsuit, initially filed in December 2006, Michael Tierney, a former Omnicom executive who became CEO of Seneca, alleges Omnicom owes him stock options valued at roughly $1 million. Omnicom maintains the options never vested. Mr. Tierney left Seneca in March 2004. His amended complaint also raises questions about Seneca's independence from Omnicom, making allegations that match similar charges in the securities-fraud suit.

Omnicom lawyer Peter Wald said in a statement yesterday, "We ... strongly dispute Mr. Tierney's contention that Omnicom controlled Seneca."

Among possible evidence in Omnicom's defense is a 2001 deposition for an unrelated lawsuit. In that deposition, Mr. Tierney said that he was only employed by Seneca, and not Omnicom.

"The evidence clearly shows that Mr. Tierney and his management team have been responsible for the successful day-to-day activities of Seneca since May 2001," Mr. Wald said.

The securities-fraud suits were filed against Omnicom in 2002 after The Wall Street Journal ran a page-one article about Seneca and other accounting practices at Omnicom. In March 2005 a judge dismissed two of the lawsuit's three allegations, involving Omnicom's reporting of growth and liabilities. The remaining accusation involves Seneca. The case is pending in federal court in Manhattan.

Omnicom, the world's largest ad holding company, created Seneca in May 2001 with Pegasus Capital Advisors LLP, a Greenwich, Conn.-based private-equity firm, and put 16 ailing Internet assets into the entity. The main assets were stakes in three public Internet marketing companies -- Agency.com, Organic and Razorfish. Omnicom had originally acquired the investments during the technology boom.

But its Internet strategy faltered when the boom ended. Omnicom said in an early 2001 filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that the assets were still worth about what it had paid for them, but didn't disclose the price. An internal spreadsheet that surfaced later, in the securities-fraud lawsuit, says that it paid $128.1 million but that the stakes' value in March 2001 totaled $38.6 million. (Between late 2002 and mid-2003 Omnicom used its Seneca stock to buy back 100% of Organic and Agency.com, which have prospered as the Internet ad business has recovered in recent years.)

When it created Seneca, Omnicom said it had enlisted Pegasus to help turn around the dot-com businesses. The deal was structured so that Omnicom received preferred shares in Seneca, in return for the Internet assets and some cash. Pegasus received common stock in Seneca. Omnicom accounted for the Seneca deal as an asset sale without reporting a gain or loss. It says Seneca was structured as an independent entity, which allowed the company to avoid recording losses on the assets.

In his lawsuit Mr. Tierney says that Pegasus "contributed nothing, and was required to contribute nothing" to Seneca. He also says that Omnicom completely indemnified Pegasus and paid the private-equity firm roughly $6 million in "management fees" to induce Pegasus to be a Seneca shareholder.

"This guy is alleging that Pegasus is just an agent acting on Omnicom's behalf -- that's a common allegation in this sort of case," says Robert Willens, a tax and accounting analyst at Lehman Brothers. "The result of this being correct would be that Seneca would be a wholly owned subsidiary of Omnicom, and Omnicom would have to report Seneca's results," says Mr. Willens, who isn't involved in the lawsuit. "That would lead to a restatement no doubt, and almost certainly some sort of write-off, or write-down."

Omnicom argues that the dealings with Pegasus were arms' length. It said in a 2001 filing with the SEC that Pegasus contributed cash to Seneca and told its auditors likewise. But Seneca's tax return for 2001 doesn't report cash from Pegasus, according to court documents in the securities-fraud lawsuit.

Lawyers for Omnicom maintain in court filings in the securities-fraud lawsuit that the transfer of assets to Seneca was properly accounted for, as confirmed by two independent auditing firms -- Arthur Andersen and KPMG -- and that an informal SEC inquiry hasn't resulted in action.

"We certainly disagree with the characterizations of the factual allegations," adds Pegasus attorney Stephen M. Baldini, a partner at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld LLP. "This seems to be a dispute between an individual and Omnicom."

This isn't the first time Mr. Tierney, 54, has sued over compensation issues. In the early 1990s he filed a lawsuit to retrieve money from a former employer. His claim was rejected.

Mr. Tierney's lawsuit paints Seneca as an entity under Omnicom's control. "Omnicom often made major decisions regarding Seneca and its assets without informing" him, says the complaint. As CEO of Seneca, Mr. Tierney says he reported directly to Omnicom's Chief Executive John Wren and Chief Financial Officer Randall Weisenburger on a weekly basis; in addition, the complaint says he maintained all of his Omnicom benefits and received W-2s listing Omnicom as his employer.

Through an Omnicom spokesman, Mr. Wren declined to comment. Mr. Weisenburger didn't return messages yesterday seeking comment.

Omnicom altered its relationship with Mr. Tierney in 2003 as a result of the pending securities-fraud lawsuit, according to Mr. Tierney's lawsuit. The complaint says that Omnicom told Mr. Tierney that it was concerned that his continued work for Omnicom in any capacity would support the claims in the securities-fraud lawsuit relating to Omnicom's control of Seneca. Consequently, Mr. Tierney says Omnicom refused to pay him for options he had allegedly received under his original employment agreement with the company.

Once Again, Nortel Says It Must Restate Its Financial Results (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

OTTAWA, March 1 — Nortel Networks said Thursday that it would have to restate its results for the fourth time in four years, a move that will delay the filing of its 2006 annual report.

The latest restatement involves results from 2004, 2005 and the first nine months of 2006. The company said that the restatements were necessary to correct mistakes in recording income and because errors by an outside actuary firm caused pension liabilities to be misstated by $104 million over several years.

Over all, the company expects that the changes will raise revenue for the first three quarters of 2006 by about $24 million and increase earnings for the period by $15 million. That will be offset by reductions in the earlier years.

“Clearly, I’m not pleased that we need to restate,” the chief executive, Mike S. Zafirovski, said in a conference call with analysts. Mr. Zafirovski, a former Motorola executive, was hired by the Toronto-based company in 2005, in part to help it recover from its financial turmoil.

The first restatements stemmed from an accounting scandal that led to the firing of several top executives as well as criminal and securities investigations in both Canada and the United States.

The announcement Thursday was not expected. In recent public statements, Mr. Zafirovski has portrayed the company's accounting struggles as being behind it. Last month, when he announced that the chief financial officer, Peter W. Currie, would be leaving the company at the end of April, Mr. Zafirovski praised his work.

"Peter has successfully steered Nortel through many difficult financial issues and, in the process, has enhanced the company's governance," Mr. Zafirovski said at the time.

This will be the third time Mr. Currie has left Nortel. Previously he was chief financial officer from 1994 to 1997 and held other positions from 1979 to 1992.

In Thursday's conference call, Mr. Currie blamed the complexity of Nortel's business for the restatements.

Dean Mundy, a Nortel spokesman, said Nortel was still using the actuary firm, but declined to identify it.

Executives At Brokerage Leave Amid Investigation (BSUN)

By Paul Adams, Sun reporter

The Baltimore Sun, March 2, 2007

Ferris Baker Watts, the century-old investment brokerage with deep Baltimore roots, said yesterday that six executives and traders have resigned or taken temporary leave since federal officials and outside counsel began investigating the firm's trades for a former client accused of stealing millions of dollars.

The list of temporary and permanent departures includes several top executives in Baltimore and Hunt Valley, indicating the investigations have disrupted management at the firm more broadly than company officials disclosed two weeks ago.

The changes are fallout from a federal probe of an investment fund set up by a Cleveland man who, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission lawsuit, took in $50 million from investors and spent much of the money on stock trades placed through Ferris and other firms. Most of the money is missing. Ferris has stressed that neither it nor its clients lost money in the scheme and that it is cooperating with regulators and federal investigators.

Legal experts and former SEC enforcement officials say even the temporary absence of so many top people shows how seriously Ferris is taking the matter and suggests the firm faces a lengthy and costly probe of its internal controls designed to prevent fraud. Brokers are subject to extensive regulatory oversight and are required to police trading activity to ensure fairness in the market.

"Outside counsel is going to want to impress the SEC and impress the [Justice Department] ... that the company is doing everything it can to clean house, and on the other hand it's certainly par for the course that key folks might step aside so that there's no appearance of any influence on the investigation," said Charles Ross, a white-collar defense attorney in New York who has defended compliance officers, fund managers and brokers in securities cases.

Personnel changes Ted Urban, the firm's executive vice president and general counsel, took voluntary leave in November and subsequently opted for early retirement, effective yesterday. He has been replaced by Dana S. Gloor, an associate general counsel with Ferris since 2001.

Horace Usry, director of institutional sales, was put on leave Jan. 3 and resigned last week, a firm spokeswoman said. He has been replaced by Jeff Fowlds, a former Stiefel Nicholas managing director, the firm said yesterday. Usry did not respond to a phone message yesterday.

John Belgrade and Mark LaVerghetta, both institutional traders, are on temporary leave during the investigation, the firm said. Neither of the traders could be reached for comment yesterday.

Ferris confirmed on Feb. 12 that Louis Akers Jr., director of the firm's private client group, and Patrick Vaughan, director of retail sales, took temporary paid leave while outside counsel conducted its investigation. At that time, Robin Oegerle, a Ferris spokeswoman, declined The Sun's request to confirm that Usry, Urban, Belgrade and LaVerghetta also had stepped aside, citing the firm's policy of not commenting on personnel matters.

"We note that we are not a public company, so we are not subject to the disclosure requirements that would apply to a public company," she said yesterday.

Oegerle added that the firm brought in outside counsel to investigate what role, if any, the individuals on leave played in the supervision of the trading activity in question.

"It is common to ask individuals who may be close to the inquiry to step aside while the investigation takes place," she said.

The firm, which has dual headquarters in Baltimore and Washington, said previously that it expects the executives still on leave to return once the investigation has reached an advanced stage.

Gathering facts "Just because there's this internal investigation and people are evaluating what happened doesn't necessarily mean that people engaged in wrongdoing," said Kathleen M. Hamm, a former SEC enforcement official who heads the securities practice group for Promontory Financial Group in Washington.

"I would say this is just the process pursuant to which regulators and prosecutors confirm either that a broker-dealer was a victim of their client's misbehavior or eliminate the potential that someone at the firm knew more."

Hamm said outside counsel will often identify failures in internal controls and recommend how to strengthen fraud-prevention measures. But firms sometimes suffer damage to their reputations and incur great expense while the investigations play out, she said.

"They're incredibly costly, they're time-consuming and they certainly are disruptive," she said.

Ferris Baker's troubles can be traced back to David A. Dadante, the Cleveland man who the SEC says operated his IPOF investment fund as a Ponzi scheme. The SEC complaint says Dadante "misappropriated investor funds for his own use" and pursued an "undisclosed high-risk investment strategy." At least $28 million of investor money is missing.

Dadante diverted some of the funds to amass a 35 percent stake in Innotrac, a lightly traded company in Georgia that processes orders for companies that sell merchandise on the Internet. Some of the trades were placed through Stephen J. Glantz, a Ferris Baker broker who left the firm in 2005. Glantz has denied any impropriety, saying that while he handled Dadante's account, the fund manager's trades often went straight to Ferris' trading desk.

Ferris was one of at least six brokerage houses processing huge purchases of Innotrac stock for Dadante, according to Mark Dottore, the court-appointed receiver for what remains of IPOF. Dottore said Dadante made the trades through numerous accounts, similar to a prescription drug addict obtaining multiple prescriptions through several doctors without each doctor knowing about the others. Investigators are likely asking whether the brokerages sufficiently policed Dadante's activities, Dottore and other securities experts said.

"Some things happened all across the board at all of these different firms," Dottore said. He indicated that Ferris has been cooperative.

That several other firms also were apparently duped by Dadante could play to Ferris' favor, said Ross, the defense attorney. But it might come down to how much trading Dadante conducted through Ferris and how quickly and fully the company reported the problems to regulators once it discovered them.

Regulators also might look favorably on the firm's decision to remove key managers during the probe and to bring in outside counsel, he said.

Ferris said the management changes announced yesterday coincide with the start of the firm's new fiscal year. In addition to the appointments of Fowlds and Gloor, the firm promoted Adrian G. Teel, a Ferris board member and former director of the Maryland Port Authority, to chief operating officer.

Democrats Unveil Bill For CEO Pay Vote (FT)

By Jeremy Grant In Washington

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

The first US legislative effort for two years aimed at curbing excessive executive pay emerged on Thursday as Barney Frank, a top Democrat, introduced a bill that would require public companies to allow non-binding shareholder votes on pay packets.

The move comes as companies prepare for the annual meetings season, when executive pay promises to be an issue with shareholders.

DOJ_NMG_0138775

Last month, President George W. Bush warned company boards that they needed to "pay attention to the executive compensation packages that you approve".

Mr Frank, chairman of the House financial services committee, said his bill would require companies to include an advisory – or non-binding – vote in their annual proxies. The move borrows from the UK, where advisory votes have been routine for some years.

Public pension funds and unions have urged advisory votes as a way of allowing shareholders a way of expressing their view on whether CEO pay is commensurate with performance.

Mr Frank said: "I do not understand those who argue that the people who make up our stock markets are collectively very wise, but at the same time are somehow incapable of rendering a coherent opinion of what they should pay those they employ to run the corporations that they own."

Critics of moves to install new mechanisms for controlling executive pay argue that shareholders should wait to see how executive pay disclosure rules issued last year by the Securities and Exchange Commission work out. The SEC in July passed rules requiring companies to provide a single figure representing an executives' total compensation as well as a "narrative" explaining how compensation committees arrive at a pay package.

Mr Frank said the SEC had taken "a good step forward" with the changes. But he said the disclosure was "incomplete".

His bill would ensure that shareholders had "a say on their company's executive compensation disclosures, without micromanaging the business".

Mr Frank will chair hearings by the financial services committee on executive pay next Thursday.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Verdict Said To Be Unlikely This Week (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

Jurors in the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. seem unlikely to reach a verdict this week and will be allowed to end deliberations at 2 p.m. today to attend to personal matters, Judge Reggie B. Walton said. The judge said he realized that there would be no verdict yesterday, the seventh day of deliberations, because jurors "did not dress" for such an occasion. Six of the 11 jurors wore blue jeans.

Jurors In Libby Case Allowed To Leave Deliberations Early (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Jurors considering perjury charges against I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby signaled yesterday that they were still working to reach a verdict after seven days of deliberations and did not expect to arrive at one this week, according to a note they sent to the presiding trial judge.

The 11 jurors asked U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to release them at 2 p.m. today so some can attend to personal business. Walton said in court that he presumes jurors will continue deliberating into next week in the case against Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff.

"We the jury respectfully request to be excused at 2 p.m. on Friday, March 2, to attend to personal professional and medical obligations that can't be addressed during our weekend," jurors wrote to Walton in a note posted on the court's Web site late yesterday afternoon.

Walton called jurors into court about 4:30 p.m. on a separate matter, telling them they could not consult a dictionary, as they had requested. He said he would explain words they have trouble understanding, then promised they could leave at 2 p.m. today and sent them home.

Walton noted the jurors' casual clothing and said he "knew we wouldn't have a verdict today." He added, referring to the note he had just received: "And I assume they will not have a verdict tomorrow either." During their three-minute appearance in court, only the second since deliberations began, several jurors chatted amiably.

Monday would mark the ninth day of jury deliberations after a trial that lasted 14 court days.

Gregory Mize, a retired D.C. Superior Court judge now researching jury trials in state and federal courts, said there is no good way to judge the appropriate length of jury deliberations for a case.

"The time needed to reach unanimity depends on lots of things, such as the complexity of the case and the chemistry of the jurors in their relationship and communications during deliberations," he said.

The longest recent deliberation in this federal court was 29 days, in a 2002 case that resulted in the convictions of six members of a drug gang known as "Murder Inc."

Libby, 56, is charged with five felony counts alleging that in 2003 he lied to FBI agents and a federal grand jury investigating the disclosure of the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame.

Plame is married to former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, who in 2002 was sent by the CIA on a mission to Niger to explore reports that Iraq was trying to buy nuclear materials from the African nation. He concluded those reports were groundless and, months after the Iraq war began, publicly accused President Bush of distorting his findings to justify the invasion.

Prosecutors contend that Libby was part of a White House campaign to disclose Plame's identity to discredit her husband by implying that he was chosen for the Niger mission because she worked at the CIA.

Libby is not charged with the leak. His lawyers say he inaccurately remembered conversations with colleagues and journalists about Wilson and Plame because he had a bad memory and was overwhelmed by national security responsibilities.

Libby Jury Seems To Be Settling In (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — Jurors in the perjury trial of ex-White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby expect to deliberate into next week.

They asked U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton for a dictionary and more office supplies and asked to leave early today for the weekend. Walton denied the request for the dictionary but told jurors they could take off at 2 p.m.

"So I assume they will not have a verdict tomorrow either," Walton told lawyers Thursday as jurors finished their seventh day of deliberations.

Before bringing the jurors into court, Walton advised lawyers they "will not be happy about coming into court because they don't think they are dressed appropriately."

He said that was why they decided not to come into court Monday for a brief discussion and was how "I knew there wasn't a verdict" coming Thursday.

About half were wearing blue jeans. Most smiled broadly when Walton granted their request to leave early today.

It appeared the seven women and four men were making their own visual aids to help sort out the complicated case.

Jurors had asked for a large flip chart, masking tape, sticky notes and pictures of the witnesses almost immediately after beginning deliberations last week.

Late Wednesday afternoon, they emerged to ask the judge for easel-sized pages to stick on walls.

Walton said he denied the dictionary request — not an uncommon one for juries — because definitions of common words can have legal implications.

He told jurors that if they had questions, they could ask him directly.

Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is accused of obstruction of justice and lying to FBI agents and a grand jury investigating the 2003 leak of the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame, wife of a prominent Iraq war critic.

Study Draft Decries Execution Appeals Process (USAT)

By Richard Willing, Usa Today

USA Today, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — Death-sentence appeals take too long, traumatize victims' families and burden states with millions in extra costs for housing convicted killers, a draft of a new study commissioned by the Justice Department shows.

The study also found that death penalty cases are not hopelessly flawed by errors, as opponents of capital punishment have charged.

The study, which reviewed state death sentences issued in the 1990s, found that 26% were reversed during the first level of the appeals process. Most of those "direct appeals" were rejected because of sentencing errors. Some of the death sentences were later reinstated.

In only 11% of those cases did the appeals court find problems with the underlying murder convictions, says the unreleased study by Barry Latzer and James Cauthen, professors at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York.

The study challenges a 2000 report that concluded the capital punishment system is "broken" because 68% of all death penalty cases from 1973 to 1995 were eventually overturned. The report, by a team led by Columbia University law professor and death penalty foe James Liebman, also found 41% of cases were reversed during direct appeals.

The Liebman study provided a false picture of the death penalty because it included many cases from the 1970s and 1980s, when the U.S. Supreme Court rewrote death penalty rules and caused many sentences to be reversed, the Justice Department's report says.

Latzer and Cauthen tracked 1,676 death sentences issued in 14 "representative" states from 1992 through 2002. Among the report's other findings:

•Half of all death penalty appeals take nearly three years to be decided by state appeals courts. Federal review, which follows state appeals, can extend the process by years.

•Ohio, Tennessee and Kentucky were the slowest states, each taking more than three years to resolve appeals.

Death penalty supporters say the study shows that delays are part of a strategy to undermine a sentence that most Americans support.

"Opponents of the death penalty can't get an outright repeal anywhere, but are working to impede the process by slowing it down to a crawl," says John McAdams, political science professor at Marquette University in Milwaukee.

Capital punishment foes say the lengthy appeals process may in itself be an argument for abandoning the death penalty.

"If you like bureaucracy, you'll love the death penalty," says David Elliot, spokesman for the National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty.

The death penalty study was commissioned in 2005 by the National Institute of Justice, the Justice Department's research arm, to find ways to speed up the execution process.

Inmate Asks For Immediate Execution (AP)

By KELLY P. KISSEL, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 2, 2007

(AP) - LITTLE ROCK-A death row inmate who wants an immediate execution had his request rejected Thursday.

The Arkansas Supreme Court ruled the request was premature and said the man's U.S. lawsuit challenging the way the state executes prisoners is still pending.

But over the past three months, convicted murderer Terrick Nooner, 35, has tried to exit the federal lawsuit and has asked the court to order his execution.

Nooner suffers from severe mental illness and believes Arkansas prison officials are abusing him by implanting a device in his body that controls him, federal public defender Julie Brain wrote Jan. 3 in a motion challenging Nooner's attempt to drop his lawsuit.

She said Nooner also claims prison staff is contaminating his food.

DOJ_NMG_0138778

"His overriding goal is to seek redress for, and relief from, the physical harm that he perceives is being repeatedly inflicted on him," Brain wrote.

U.S. District Judge Susan Webber Wright has not ruled on Nooner's attempt to drop his lawsuit.

Nooner was convicted for the 1993 robbery and murder of Scot Stobaugh, 22, at a laundromat.

Nooner filed his lawsuit last May, saying lethal injection is unconstitutionally cruel and should be banned. Lawsuits nationwide claim the injections leave inmates in pain before they die.

The Arkansas prison system says its dose of a painkiller is strong enough to cause death, even before the subsequent injections of chemicals that paralyze the body and stop the heart.

Brain said in January she had spoken to Nooner and "to the limited extent that counsel is able to meaningfully communicate with" him, Nooner has no desire to hasten his execution. 2007 -

State, Feds Vow To Chase Predators (KENPOST)

The Kentucky Post, March 2, 2007

Kenton County Commonwealth Attorney Rob Sanders said his office will partner with the United States Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of Kentucky to aggressively prosecute child predators and gun-related cases.

As one of the first steps in that effort, Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney for Kenton County Laura Ward was sworn in Wednesday as a Special Assistant United States Attorney. Ward will help prosecute those types of cases at the federal level.

The new arrangement is part of the Department of Justice's Project Safe Childhood and Project Safe Neighborhoods initiatives, which are designed to coordinate efforts of local, state and federal law enforcement and officials, with a focus on prosecutions of child predators and gun violence.

"These initiatives can only be accomplished through the hard work and cooperation of law enforcement and prosecutors at every level," U.S. Attorney Amul Thapar said in a statement. "This partnership shows the commitment that not only our office has, but that Rob Sanders has as well, on making the community safer for our families and our children."

Sanders said crimes in neighborhoods must not go unnoticed.

"Our children deserve to grow up in safe neighborhoods," he said. "This partnership will help ensure that we are prosecuting cases with every resource available under state and federal law to take these criminals off the streets for as long as we possibly can."

Sanders said his office has launched local initiatives aimed at combating child predators and gun violence that mirror those of Project Safe Childhood and Project Safe Neighborhood.

U.S. Man Accused In Double Kidnapping Charged With Child Pornography (AP)

By Christopher Leonard, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 2, 2007

(AP) - ST. LOUIS-A man accused of kidnapping and molesting two boys was indicted Thursday on federal charges he took pornographic pictures and videos of one of the youngsters.

The indictment marked the first federal charges against Michael Devlin, 41, a former pizzeria manager from the St. Louis suburbs.

Devlin is charged with kidnapping and other offenses in the 2002 abduction of Shawn Hornbeck, who is now 15, and the January abduction of 13-year-old Ben Ownby. Both boys were found in Devlin's apartment Jan. 12.

U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway said four counts of the six-count indictment allege Devlin photographed and videotaped a minor engaged in sexually explicit acts between 2002 and this year. Two other counts allege he took the minor to Illinois and Arizona with the intent to sexually assault him.

Hanaway said all six counts involved the same child, identified only as "S," an apparent reference to Shawn. Authorities have alleged that Devlin held him captive from October 2002 until police found the boy in January.

It is The Associated Press' policy not to identify most alleged victims of sexual abuse, but the boys' stories have been widely publicized and their names are now well-known. Their families have also gone public, conducting media interviews.

DOJ_NMG_0138779

Besides the federal charges, Devlin faces 75 state charges, including forcible sodomy, kidnapping and armed criminal action. He has pleaded not guilty to all those allegations.

Devlin's attorney, Michael Kielty, said he had not seen the prosecution's evidence, but he acknowledged that most child pornography cases are "very emotional, very difficult."

"If there are photos and videotapes, that certainly would add some weight to the government's case," Kielty said.

Shawn Hornbeck knew the federal charges would be filed and was with family members for moral support Thursday, said the family's attorney Scott Sherman.

"It's tough," Sherman said. "These are really tough facts. It's the most intimate and the most personal of all the indictments we think," Sherman said.

Shawn is ready to testify in the case, no matter how painful it might be, Sherman said.

"Justice for he and Ben is a very important element in (Shawn's) recovery," Sherman said.

Authorities allege Devlin used a gun to abduct Shawn as the boy was riding his bike near his home. Prosecutors have said he sodomized Shawn at least once a month for the next four years.

Neighbors thought Shawn was Devlin's son and said the boy was free to ride a bike, hang out with friends and cruise the Internet.

When Ben was abducted soon after getting off a school bus in January, a witness got a description of a white pickup seen speeding away. The description matched Devlin's vehicle, leading to his arrest.

Devlin remains jailed on $1 million (â,¬760,000) bond. His federal trial won't begin until his three state trials have concluded.

Hired Truck Figure's Son Prison-bound (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, March 2, 2007

Daniel N. Katalinic, the son of disgraced political boss Daniel M. Katalinic, was sentenced in federal court Thursday to 10 years and 1 month in prison for robbing a Mt. Prospect bank last year.

With his father watching, Daniel N. Katalinic shook his head back and forth as U.S. District Chief Judge James Holderman announced the sentence, warning that people who commit such crimes will face stiff penalties.

Katalinic, 32, told the judge a long history of drug abuse led him to rob the Parkway Bank at 1590 S. Elmhurst Rd. with another man.

Daniel M. Katalinic is also a convicted felon, set to serve a year in federal prison for taking bribes in the city's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program. He received a reduced sentence because he became a key witness in the prosecution of Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich.

Former Developer Of Wisconsin Casino Indicted (CHIT)

By Dan Gibbard, Tribune staff reporter

Chicago Tribune, March 2, 2007

The former developer of Kenosha's proposed $808 million casino project was indicted Thursday on federal charges for allegedly funneling $100,000 in improper campaign contributions to Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle, who has final approval over Indian gaming in the state.

Dennis Troha, 60, of Kenosha, Wis., was charged with one count of fraud and one count of making false statements to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Attorney's office in Milwaukee said. If convicted, he could face up to 25 years in prison and a $500,000 fine.

The indictment alleges Troha used family members and businesses he controlled to send money to Doyle's campaign during the 2002 and 2006 campaigns. Troha would lend money to the family members, who would then write checks to Doyle's campaign, allowing Troha to circumvent the $10,000 cap on political donations by individuals. The money was only repaid early this year after federal investigators began looking into the case, the indictment said.

Prosecutors did not accuse Doyle, the first Democrat elected governor of Wisconsin in 16 years, of wrongdoing.

"The indictment does not allege a quid pro quo," said a spokeswoman for U.S. Atty. Steven Biskupic.

Doyle, in a statement, pledged to return the contributions if Troha is found guilty.

"My campaign was aware of nothing to suggest that the contributions received from Mr. Troha were in any way inappropriate or unlawful," Doyle said.

Wisconsin's Menominee tribe hopes to build one of the Midwest's largest casinos at the site of the Dairyland greyhound track, 10 miles from Illinois on Interstate Highway 94. To do that, the U.S. government must allow the property to be transferred into an Indian trust, because the site is not on the tribe's reservation.

Until last week, Troha was the tribe's developer and point man in Kenosha. On Feb. 23, after news of the investigation surfaced, he announced he had pulled out and sold his interest for an undisclosed sum to the Mohegan tribe of Connecticut.

The Mohegans, who operate one of the nation's largest Indian gaming casinos, were already working with Menominee on the Kenosha project.

The indictment's impact on the project is unclear. The project has cleared two major hurdles in recent weeks, say backers, who maintain its benefits outweigh the scandal.

Evan Zeppos, a spokesman for the project, acknowledged that Troha's troubles could bring new scrutiny but said the benefits should withstand criticism.

"Dennis' situation is obviously going to weigh on some people's minds, but we would just hope that they judge this on its merits," he said.

The main opposition to the project has come from the Forest County Potawatomi Band, which operates its own large casino in Milwaukee. The tribe says the Kenosha casino would hurt its operation and be disrespectful because the Potawatomi have stronger historical ties to the area.

The regional office of the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs recommended in January that the project be approved by the U.S. Department of the Interior. It's uncertain when Washington might issue a recommendation, but Zeppos said it could come as soon as summer.

If the U.S. approves the plan, it will be up to Doyle, who has not indicated a preference, to give the final OK.

That relationship makes the charges against Troha disturbing, said Jack Heck, director of the non-profit advocacy group Common Cause Wisconsin.

"The Troha family, with this interest in the casino in Kenosha, clearly they were trying to buy influence," Heck said.

Meanwhile, the charges are the latest blow to the once squeaky clean image of Wisconsin politics, where the influence of big money has only been felt in the last decade, Heck said.

"We're in a period of political turmoil and scandal like we've never seen in this state," Heck said. "It's a lot like Illinois politics now. It used to be very different."

11 Youths Arrested In Gang Stabbings (WP)

By Lori Aratani And Daniel De Vise

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Eleven young gang members, including a 12-year-old, are facing attempted murder charges in connection with a rampage in Wheaton and Aspen Hill on Saturday that ended with a mentally challenged Silver Spring man being beaten and stabbed, Montgomery County police said yesterday.

Two of them also are accused of a double stabbing that occurred earlier that evening at the Wheaton Metro station. All three victims survived, but the Silver Spring man is hospitalized in critical condition.

The suspects, all males ages 12 to 17, claim to be members of the "Hotboyz/Shoot 'Em Up" gang, police said. They have been charged with attempted first-degree murder, robbery and assault. Some of their parents reached yesterday evening said they are being falsely accused.

Montgomery police said the first stabbing occurred about 7 p.m. Saturday at the Metro station. The two young victims, both male, told police they believed the attackers were gang members.

Police said the second assault took place about 8:40 p.m., outside a party in the 3700 block of Bel Pre Road in Aspen Hill. Partygoers at an apartment complex spotted an unknown youth climbing inside a car belonging to a party host. They left the apartment to investigate and saw three teenagers standing by the car and 20 others near the building.

When one of the teenagers near the car displayed a gun, the partygoers went inside, except for the 31-year-old mentally challenged man. Police said the man, whom they did not identify, walked toward the suspects and was struck several times with the handgun, repeatedly kicked and then stabbed.

As Montgomery police conducted their investigation, they learned that Metro Transit Police were looking into the stabbing at the Wheaton Station.

On Monday, the father of one of the Metro station victims was approached at a shopping center on the 5500 block of Norbeck Road by two males claiming they were responsible for stabbing his son. The father called police, but by the time officers arrived, the suspects had disappeared.

A short time later, police investigating a disorderly conduct report arrested three teens in the 3800 block of Dunsinane Drive. After joint interviews by Montgomery and Metro Transit Police, investigators determined that the suspects were connected to both stabbing incidents, police said.

Police said that the Metro incident was gang-related and that the party assault took place because the man interrupted the suspects' attempt to break into the car.

Police arrested six suspects Monday and five Wednesday. All have been charged with first-degree attempted murder, armed robbery and first-degree assault.

The 12-year-old was charged as a juvenile and sent to the Alfred D. Noyes Children's Center before being released to family members. His name is not being released because he is a minor.

The 10 others are charged as adults. They are: Roger Ghonda, 14, and his brother Ony Ghonda, 16, of Silver Spring; Alansan Turay, 17, of Silver Spring; Dumisani Tembo, 17, of Silver Spring; Carl Thomas, 16, of Silver Spring; brothers Gilbert Wiche Oriji, 14, and Guyton Mecko Oriji, 16, of Rockville; Alexander Mulugeta Tewolde, 17, of Silver Spring; Wesley Alexander Ruiz, 16, of Silver Spring; and Pernell Ricks, 16, of Derwood.

Thomas and Turay also have been charged in connection with the Metro station stabbing.

Parents of the suspects last night defended their sons.

"He's unjustly charged," said Memunatu Turay, mother of Alansan Turay. "The police don't have any suspects, and they want to pin it on him and his friends. He's not involved at all, and the police know that."

John Wilkins, the father of Gilbert and Guyton Oriji, said his sons are honor students who were not involved in the assault on the mentally challenged man.

"There were three of them: One of them hit him with a gun, one of them hit him with a bat, and one of them stabbed him," he said, describing the sons' account of the assault. "When one of my boys saw a gun, my boys ran."

Hope Umana, attorney for Dumisani Tembo, said he was "a little concerned about the treatment the police have given to this boy. He has not been allowed contact with family members." Umana said his initial impression was that Tembo "had very tangential involvement, if any," in the crimes.

Trial Opens In Case Of Convicted Sex Offender Accused In Murder Of 9-Year-Old Florida Girl (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

MIAMI, March 1 — The drifter charged with raping and burying alive a 9-year-old girl on Florida's west coast in 2005 went to trial here Thursday, after intense publicity forced the case to be moved 300 miles from where the child, Jessica Lunsford, was murdered.

DOJ_NMG_0138782

The case provoked a nationwide crackdown on sex criminals, not least because the suspect, John E. Couey, was a convicted sex offender who had managed to skip required counseling sessions and move without telling parole officers. Many states have passed laws in Jessica's name, increasing minimum sentences for sexual offenses against children and requiring offenders to be closely tracked upon release.

Mr. Couey told detectives soon after his arrest in March 2005 that he had killed Jessica, even telling them where to find her body. But Judge Richard A. Howard of Circuit Court in Citrus County ruled the confession inadmissible because the detectives had refused Mr. Couey's requests for a lawyer.

Prosecutors say they have an airtight case nonetheless. In his opening statement, Ric Ridgway, a state prosecutor, told the jury that Jessica's fingerprints were found in Mr. Couey's bedroom and closet, her DNA was found in blood stains on his mattress and her body was found in a shallow grave in his yard. They are seeking the death penalty for Mr. Couey, who faces charges of first-degree murder, burglary, kidnapping and sexual battery.

"The evidence will show that the one man responsible for all these acts is sitting right there," Mr. Ridgway said, pointing to Mr. Couey, 48, who shifted nervously, covered his face with his hands and drew on a sketch pad during the proceedings.

Despite a vast search and the wide distribution of a photograph of Jessica, her body was not found until three weeks after she disappeared from her bedroom in the middle of the night. She had been buried in two garbage bags outside the trailer Mr. Couey shared with relatives near the Lunsford home in Homosassa.

Even though they cannot bring up the tape-recorded confession that Mr. Couey made to Citrus County sheriff's detectives, prosecutors told the jury he made incriminating statements to guards at the county jail, allegedly telling them that he did not mean to kill Jessica.

"He eventually told the story of what had happened," Mr. Ridgway said.

Daniel Lewan, a public defender representing Mr. Couey, told the jury there was no proof that his client had committed any crime and asked them to stay impartial despite the painful details of the case.

"Emotions, sympathies, prejudices, biases have no part here," Mr. Lewan said. "I want you to look at how this investigation was conducted."

Mr. Lewan also said the crime scene had not been properly secured, evidence had been lost and the guards who allegedly heard Mr. Couey make incriminating statements never entered them in log books. He also said Mr. Couey was mentally ill and mentally retarded, which could affect whether he gets the death penalty if convicted.

Jessica's grandmother, Ruth Lunsford, told the jury how the girl had gone to bed at 10 p.m. on Feb. 23 after eating dinner, attending a children's church group and watching television in her room. Her father, Mark Lunsford, testified that he had arrived home about 5:45 the next morning to hear Jessica's alarm going off in her room and discover she was missing from her bed.

Mr. Couey's sister, Dorothy Dixon, testified that she, her boyfriend and Mr. Couey shared crack cocaine the night Jessica disappeared. She said Mr. Couey had briefly emerged from his bedroom the next morning to watch the search going on in their neighborhood, but that she had barely seen him over the next few days.

His niece, Madie Secord, testified that she had bought Mr. Couey a bus ticket to Savannah, Ga., at his request a few days after Jessica disappeared.

Prosecutors also showed a videotape of Mr. Couey being interviewed by a detective in Savannah, where he was taken in for questioning after the authorities in Homosassa realized he was one of the town's registered sex offenders. He told the detective that he had been living at a different address in Homosassa — the one where parole officers thought he was — and that he had never worked at a school. In fact, Mr. Couey had worked in construction at Homosassa Elementary School, which Jessica attended.

Mr. Couey had been registered as a sex offender after he was convicted in 1991 of exposing and fondling himself in front of a 5-year-old girl.

Mr. Lunsford's lawyer, Mark Gelman, questioned after the proceedings why Mr. Couey had not pleaded guilty given the evidence against him.

"If he had a decent bone in his body," Mr. Gelman said, "he would not be making the family go through all this today."

Exclusive | Gang Tied To Killing Of Toddler (TSSC)

By Adam Beam

The State (SC), March 2, 2007

A 2-year-old Swansea girl killed in a shootout in January was the victim of an attempted robbery by the Gangsta Killer Bloods, according to an FBI agent's courtroom testimony Thursday.

The testimony connects for the first time one of the Midlands' most heinous crimes with the highly organized gang, which has national ties.

The FBI detailed the gang's violent and sophisticated drug trafficking business in documents filed last month as part of an extensive federal investigation.

The girl's death is the first homicide — and at least the fifth violent crime — connected to the gang, whose members allegedly speak in code to hide their crack cocaine distribution network.

At least two of the three people charged in connection with the Jan. 22 shooting that killed Jalah Peeples were GKB members, FBI agent Michael Stansbury said in federal court. They reported directly to Torrean Sims, a now-jailed muscleman for the GKB and leader of one of its two subsets, Stansbury testified.

Miquel Robinson, 26, also known as "Q," and Tucson Jones, 24, also known as "Luck," would speak in code while discussing planned robberies with Sims, Stansbury said.

Sims, who has not been charged in the Swansea incident, was one of the subjects of a secret FBI investigation of the GKB in Columbia. Fourteen of the gang's members have been arrested in an alleged drug conspiracy. The men were indicted by a federal grand jury last week.

Stansbury said Jalah's death is "very significant" to the ongoing investigation, and more charges are expected.

FBI agents intercepted thousands of phone calls on Sims' phone during a court-approved, 30-day wiretap operation that ended Jan. 26. In those calls, agents say, they overheard Sims discussing with Robinson and Jones at least nine robberies of other drug dealers.

Stansbury was in court Thursday in a detention hearing for Sims. Stansbury said he has no evidence that Sims coordinated the Jan. 22 attempted robbery in which Jalah died or that Sims knew it would happen. However, he said Sims discussed the shooting after it happened.

Sims was denied bail Thursday.

According to a police report, Laura McMichael, Jalah's mother, was stopped at her car at about 6 a.m. Jan. 22 by two masked men who were looking for Jalah's father, James Peeples Jr.

McMichael took the men to her upstairs apartment, where there was a shootout in the doorway. Jalah, who was in her mother's arms, was struck during the gun battle, police said.

Lexington officials have not determined who fired the shot that killed Jalah. James Peeples was one of those who fired a weapon during the attempted robbery.

Authorities confiscated powdered cocaine, crack cocaine and about $3,000 in cash from the apartment. No charges have been filed in connection with the drugs.

Jones, of Orangeburg, is accused of being one of the shooters during the attempted robbery, according to police. He was arrested on weapons charges last month in New York City. The earliest he could return to South Carolina would be March 26, police said.

Robinson, who was arrested in early February, was waiting in the getaway car, according to police.

Stansbury testified Lexington County sheriff's detectives listened to the wiretaps after the shooting to aid in their investigation.

Lexington County Sheriff James R. Metts declined to comment because the investigation is active.

Acting Swansea Police Chief Clif Hayes said he did not know about the gang connection. Eleventh Circuit Solicitor Donnie Myers, who is prosecuting the case, declined to comment.

Federal documents accuse the Gangsta Killer Bloods of operating a lucrative crack cocaine distribution ring.

DOJ_NMG_0138784

The Gangsta Killer Bloods are part of the United Blood Nation, which is the East Coast cousin of the infamous Los Angeles street gang, the Bloods. The GKB had two subsets operating in Columbia.

According to the most recently filed search warrant documents, agents recovered more than $320,000 from the homes of gang members or gang associates, including nearly $250,000 in cash buried under the house of Javis McKenzie, allegedly one of the gang's main suppliers, who also was charged in the drug conspiracy.

The FBI used the wiretaps and undercover informants fitted with hidden video and audio equipment to bring the charges.

The wiretap on Sims' phone also included a conversation with a gang member in New York, Stansbury said. In that conversation, Sims told the man he was the "big homie" in the "met," meaning he was the leader of the gang in the Columbia metropolitan area.

"He said they were very organized and that they had it all together," Stansbury said. "He was pretty proud of the fact that he was moving up."

Sims lived with his mother. Agents did not find anything illegal in the house when they searched it. Agents did find a "book of knowledge," which they said is the blueprint of the gang's code, symbols and behavior. Stansbury said several sheets had been photocopied for possible recruiting purposes.

FBI agents were monitoring Sims' phone up until the minute of his arrest, Stansbury said. When FBI agents stopped Sims' girlfriend and told her Sims was wanted, Sims girlfriend called Sims and spoke to him in code, telling him to take their baby and run.

Stansbury said Sims took his 2-month-old daughter and ran outside in the 30-degree weather across a golf course. Sims turned himself in after an FBI agent spoke to him on his girlfriend's cell phone and told him he would arrest his girlfriend if Sims didn't surrender.

Baltimore Man Indicted In Alleged 'Ponzi' Scheme (AP)

By Ben Nuckols

AP, March 2, 2007

Federal prosecutors say more than 900 investors bilked out of $8 million

A man who previously served prison time for fraud bilked more than 900 investors out of $8 million in a Ponzi scheme, the U.S. attorney's office said today.

David McDowell Robinson, 56, of Baltimore, has been incarcerated since last March for violating the terms of his supervised release in the earlier case by running a business, said Joseph L. Evans, his federal public defender. He was arrested again today, a day after a federal grand jury indicted him on wire fraud and mail fraud charges.

According to the indictment, Robinson was sentenced to eight years and 10 months in federal prison after pleading guilty in 1996 to charges of mail fraud arising from three different schemes. He also served prison time following 1989 convictions in Anne Arundel County for fraudulent misappropriation by a fiduciary and misconduct in public office.

Robinson was released from federal prison in April 2003. Prosecutors allege that he launched a new company, Liberty Trade International Inc., the next year and began scamming investors again.

The company solicited investments of up to $10,000 and promised returns of up to 30 percent, saying it would provide short-term "gap financing" to homebuyers or to people refinancing their homes to generate the returns.

Robinson instead paid investors with funds received by other investors, creating a classic Ponzi scheme, prosecutors said. A Ponzi scheme is when an initial group of investors get huge returns and promote the investment opportunity to others, whose investments allow the extraordinary returns to continue to be paid until the scheme collapses.

Robinson maintains his innocence, said Evans, who declined to comment on the facts of the case because Robinson may hire a different lawyer.

Robinson faces five counts of wire fraud and 14 counts of mail fraud. If convicted, he faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine for each charge.

He had an initial court appearance today and was ordered detained pending a hearing Friday. That hearing may be postponed if Robinson retains a private attorney, Evans said.

LTI was a scam from the start, according to the indictment. The company began accepting investors in September 2004, offering a 20 percent return over 60 days on a $2,500 investment; a 25 percent return over 90 days on a $5,000 investment; and a 30 percent return over 120 days on a $10,000 investment.

"Robinson made these representations even though Robinson knew that LTI was a new and untested company with no track record of investment success, no significant cash reserves and no realistic expectations of being able to invest funds itself at the necessary rates of return of 90 percent to 120 percent annually required to pay its investors the returns it advertised," the indictment said.

LTI allegedly used e-mails, faxes and mailings to communicate false information to investors. Robinson also is accused of using Financial Destination Inc., a marketing company that provides members with information about investment opportunities, to spread lies about his company through a voicemail message service and FDI's Web site.

Among what prosecutors describe as Robinson's false claims: that he has a doctorate; that he was a licensed attorney and that he had over 30 years' experience in real estate transactions. He did not mention his convictions or prison time, and prosecutors say that although he is a law school graduate, he does not have a law license.

According to the indictment, when LTI's assets were frozen in March, a court-appointed receiver found that the company had assets of $1.4 million and owed its investors more than $7 million. The amount owed was accruing at a rate of more than $600,000 a month.

LTI began running out of money in late 2005, and between December 2005 and January 2006 alone, the indictment says, Robinson solicited more than $4 million in new investments.

Among Robinson's alleged victims were residents of the Mississippi Gulf Coast who endured Hurricane Katrina. The indictment says he sent an employee to Gulfport, Miss., in January 2006 to make a presentation about LTI, and the company received about $80,000 in investments.

The indictment alleges that Robinson spent $600,000 of his investors' money on personal items, including jewelry and furs for a girlfriend, and down payments and lease payments for luxury cars.

Feds: Man Bilked 900, Including Katrina Victims, In Ponzi Scheme (BALTOEX)

Baltimore Examiner, March 2, 2007

BALTIMORE - Federal prosecutors are accusing David McDowell Robinson, 56, of Baltimore of engaging in a Ponzi scheme that defrauded more than 900 investors, including victims of Hurricane Katrina, of more than $8 million.

A grand jury indictment against Robinson was issued Wednesday and unsealed Thursday upon his arrest.

“The indictment alleges that David Robinson perpetrated an $8 million Ponzi scheme that victimized innocent investors, including Hurricane Katrina victims who were induced to invest their money in a worthless venture,” said Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod Rosenstein.

Robinson could not be reached for comment.

From April 2003 until March 2006, Robinson was the sole shareholder, president and chief executive officer of Liberty Trade International Inc., according to the 19-count indictment.

During that time, the grand jury alleges, he solicited investors throughout the country — offering huge returns on investments, promising a 20 percent return on $2,500 in 60 days; a 25 percent return on $5,000 in 90 days; and a 30 percent return on $10,000 120 days.

With the promises, Robinson’s company received more than $8 million in funds from more than 900 investors and used funds from other investors to pay the promised rates of return, prosecutors said.

The indictment further alleges that starting in November 2005, Robinson dispatched an employee to Gulfport, Miss., who made a presentation to victims of Hurricane Katrina. Liberty Trade International received about $80,000 in investments from residents of the Mississippi Gulf Coast area as a result of that presentation, prosecutors said.

Robinson faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine on charges of wire and mail fraud.

He is scheduled to have a detention hearing today at 2:30 p.m. before U.S. Magistrate Judge Susan Gauvey.

Probes Exposing Trenton Tradition (PHI)

By Jennifer Moroz And Elisa Ung

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 2, 2007

TRENTON - In Trenton, as it is in the nation's capital, tradition is under fire.

For years, legislators at the state and federal levels have slipped grants for pet causes and hometown projects into the budget at the last minute.

In New Jersey, they're known as Christmas tree ornaments. In Congress, they call them earmarks.

In both places, you'll hear them referred to as "pork." And in both places, they have become key to keeping constituents happy.

But now the longheld political practice, which typically plays out behind closed doors, is coming under major attack amid calls for greater government transparency and accountability.

In Washington, where one spending watchdog estimated that earmarks ballooned to a record $29.3 billion last year, lawmakers have passed proposals to shed light on the grant-making process, including a requirement that they attach their names to funding requests.

In New Jersey, where federal investigators have swarmed the Statehouse, demanding information about Christmas tree grants from the Legislature and Gov. Corzine's office alike, legislative leaders have vowed to similarly change how they add funds to the budget.

At the same time, they warn that the grants, which usually are funneled to causes and districts championed by the majority party, and can add hundreds of millions in spending to the budget should not necessarily be given a bad name.

Ingrid Reed, director of the New Jersey Project at Rutgers University's Eagleton Institute of Politics, agreed.

"The practice in general may now be under the spotlight but the real question is are those grants going to do good work or are people who should be acting in the public interest acting in their own self interest?" she said.

The federal investigation, which appears to focus on whether lawmakers personally benefited from grants they secured, stems from a probe of State Sen. Wayne Bryant, a Camden County Democrat. Bryant, who presided over the budget process as chairs of the powerful Senate and joint budget committees, has not been charged with any crime, but faces allegations that he was paid by the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey to steer millions in extra state funding to the school.

As part of its growing investigation, the U.S. Attorney's Office has since demanded a wide range of documents about the last-minute grants, dating back to 2004, from the Legislature, governor's office, Treasury and Department of Community Affairs.

Assembly Speaker Joseph Roberts (D., Camden) said he welcomed both the investigation and public scrutiny into the grant-making process.

"Legislators have a right, if not a responsibility, to fight for projects in their districts," he said. Like Senate President Richard J. Codey (D., Essex), Roberts said many of the last-minute additions, both by governors and legislators, were for "very worthy causes" such as hospitals, libraries, the Boys and Girls Club, and municipal aid to help relieve the property-tax burden on homeowners.

"These revisions to the budget are by and large defensible," Roberts said, "but the process that has been used in Trenton forever, namely that these decisions are made at the last minute, is not a good process, and I'm committed to reforming that."

Roberts and Codey have both promised to make the process more open, requiring that legislators attach their names to funding requests and note any potential conflicts of interest. Those requests would have to be submitted much earlier in the budget process, so the public and process have time to review them.

"We have an obligation that the public has confidence in the process and right now, I don't think they do," Roberts said.

DOJ_NMG_0138787

Investigators appear to be looking at whether legislators steered money to causes or projects in which they or relatives have a financial interest.

Besides Bryant, who has secured state funds for several employers other than UMDNJ, it is unclear what lawmakers, if any, have been singled out. But there are certainly others whose employers or family members have benefited from state grants.

Several North Jersey hospitals and other groups employing lawmakers and their relatives have received funding. And in South Jersey, Assemblywoman Nilsa Cruz-Perez, another Camden County Democrat, acknowledged in a 2005 interview that she pushed for a $50,000 grant to the Puerto Rican and Latino Culture and Arts Center in Camden. At the time, the center was paying a $26,000 salary to her sister, Ivette Cruz-Nieves, and it was run by her brother-in-law, then-Camden City Councilman Israel Nieves.

Cruz-Perez said in 2005 that her advocacy of the grant had nothing to do with her sister's job.

In a statement yesterday, Cruz-Perez said, "like many other organizations, the Puerto Rican Culture and Arts Center applied for state funding and there is nothing improper about assisting nonprofit groups that improve the lives of our constituents."

She said she and Roberts, who together represent the Fifth Legislative District, "consistently supported many nonprofit groups" and "we will continue to assist those groups in need as long as we hold public office."

Legislative leaders and the governor's office have vowed to comply with the slew of subpoenas that have landed in the statehouse during the last few weeks. Some legislative offices have hired outside attorneys to guide them through a process that to many here is new. Meanwhile, legislative staff yesterday were printing out e-mails and boxing up documents to be carted away to investigators.

Jeff Tittel, who spends much of his time in the State House lobbying legislators as director of the New Jersey chapter of the Sierra Club, said it was like watching rats run around.

"Everyone's scurrying," he said. "Every time you think things are turning back to normal, some new crisis hits. Here we go again, Trenton is under the spotlight."

U.S. Attorney Says Corruption Fight Goes On (AP)

By TOM HESTER Jr., Associated Press Writer

AP, March 2, 2007

TRENTON, N.J. -- A day after sending subpoenas to Gov. Jon S. Corzine's office, U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie on Thursday vowed to continue combating public corruption no matter where it might be found.

"I do not believe that any public corruption in the state of New Jersey by any public official is acceptable," Christie said. "So whether it is a zoning board member in Monmouth County or whether it's someone high up in state government, and everything in between, no public corruption is acceptable and we're going go after whatever we can find and we can prove beyond a reasonable doubt."

Christie's office has delivered seven subpoenas to the administration as part of an investigation into how the state budget has been developed since 2004, including subpoenas delivered Wednesday to Corzine's office and his chief counsel's office. Corzine's office has said it would cooperate fully.

The grand jury subpoenas request documents relating to grants that have typically been placed in the budget without public review just before the spending plan is adopted. Christie declined to detail the inquiry Thursday, but said, "I think the public already knows everything it needs to know about the integrity of the budget process."

Corzine's office defended the budget process under his administration.

"Gov. Corzine has spent 15 months seeking fiscally sound budgets that are transparent," said the governor's spokesman, Anthony Coley. "He does not tolerate criminal conduct of any form _ whether part of the budget process or elsewhere. From last summer through last week's budget address, the governor has made suggestions on how to transform the budgeting process; he intends to see these reforms to completion this year."

Christie has also subpoenaed budget documents from Democratic and Republican legislative leaders and their staff offices.

DOJ_NMG_0138788

He's also sought documents about Sen. Wayne Bryant, the former Senate budget chairman. Bryant resigned his chairmanship after a federal monitor reviewing the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey alleged Bryant received a no-work job at the school while helping steer state funding to it.

Christie, after attending a news conference in Lawrence Township to help announce drug arrests, said the public can take comfort that his office, when it does investigations, will do them right.

"And we will take whatever actions are necessary to protect the public from public officials who put themselves ahead of the public interest," Christie said.

The grants, commonly known as "Christmas tree items," are originated by lawmakers, but the governor approves them when signing the budget legislation.

The current $30.8 billion state budget, adopted last July, contained numerous last-minute add-ons. Corzine allowed them after a budget dispute that closed state government for a week and resulted in $1.8 billion in tax increases.

"We believe (government) should operate honestly and with integrity, first and foremost, and that the other thing that I've said repeatedly is that everyone has a responsibility to that," Christie said.

Christie has prosecuted more than 100 public corruption cases since becoming U.S. attorney in 2002, and he hasn't lost any of them. But he cautioned against prejudging any subpoena.

"Our job is to do our job the right way," Christie said. "When we do our job the right way, I think you'll notice that most of the time people plead guilty."

Senate President Richard J. Codey agreed with Christie's take on the budget, but noted he initiated _ before Christie's inquiry _ reforms that will require lawmakers to publicly request budget changes.

"Whether it's Republicans in power or Democrats, that's the way it's done, and I'm not saying that anybody did anything wrong, but it's going to always be criticized because of the way it's done and let's change it," said Codey, D-Essex.

Assembly Budget Committee Chairman Lou Greenwald said the newly implemented rules will make it more difficult for lawmakers to insert last-minute add-ons into the budget.

"I believe that is a productive byproduct of this process the U.S. Attorney has initiated," said Greenwald, D-Camden.

Alleged Madam Threatens To Sell List Of 10,000 Clients (WP)

By Paul Duggan

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

A woman accused of running a prostitution service catering to men in hotels and homes in the Washington area was indicted on federal racketeering charges yesterday in a case with a twist: She has threatened to peddle "the entire 46 pounds of detailed and itemized phone records" of her clients to raise money for her defense.

Working out of her California home, Deborah J. Palfrey, 50, did business in Washington under the name Pamela Martin and Associates. On a Web site seeking donations to her legal defense fund, the company is described as "a high-end adult fantasy firm which offered legal sexual and erotic services across the spectrum of adult sexual behavior."

But federal authorities say it was a thriving call-girl service, begun in 1993, that dispatched college-educated women in their 20s to male clients in the Washington area who paid $275 to $300 per sexual encounter. The prostitutes kept half of the fees and mailed the rest to Palfrey in money orders, authorities allege in an affidavit filed in federal court.

The indictment says that in 13 years, the service employed 132 women and generated about $2 million in income "through prostitution related activities."

From January 2000 to September 2006, "Palfrey received and deposited over $750,000 in money orders from various prostitutes" into bank and investment accounts, according to the affidavit. It also says that Palfrey was convicted of operating a prostitution service in California in 1991 and was jailed for 18 months. She "started her current illegal prostitution business while still on probation," the affidavit says.

Palfrey is scheduled to make her initial appearance in the criminal case at the D.C. federal courthouse next Friday. She had no comment on the charges yesterday, said her attorney, Montgomery Blair Sibley. He is representing Palfrey in a civil asset-forfeiture case brought against her last year by federal authorities in the investigation of the alleged prostitution service.

Sibley said his client's "legal escort service" was almost exclusively a cash business. He said that the women who worked for Palfrey were given 1099 tax statements each year, listing their earnings as independent contractors, and that Palfrey accurately reported her yearly income on federal tax returns prepared for her by H&R Block.

Palfrey has been warring with prosecutors since they raided her home in Vallejo, Calif., in the San Francisco Bay area, in October. Sibley said they seized about $1 million worth of real estate and $500,000 in cash and stocks and began the forfeiture proceedings.

"Ms. Palfrey adamantly disputes the government's claims of illegal behavior," according to her legal defense Web site, where she began seeking donations after the government took her assets.

"It is an unfortunate fact of life that funds will need to be generated to counteract the present injustice," the Web site says. As a result, "consideration is being given" to selling Palfrey's phone records dating to 1993, including the phone numbers of about 10,000 clients in the Washington area who used what Palfrey asserts was her legal escort service.

Palfrey sent an e-mail to prosecutors this year that warned of the disclosure. "I simply cannot emphasize to you the terrible and quite unnecessary ramifications this case (civil and/or criminal) will set off if permitted to advance," she wrote. "The press will have a field day. . . . I can state with unequivocal certainty this situation will be a very long and unpleasant one."

The U.S. attorney's office in the District, which is prosecuting the case, said it had no comment on the client list or the possibility that Palfrey will make it public.

The indictment charges Palfrey with violating the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act and with three counts of interstate travel in aid of racketeering and one count of conspiracy to launder money.

Authorities said Pamela Martin and Associates advertised in the D.C. Yellow Pages but did not have an address here. They said callers seeking to use the service were connected to Palfrey or someone working for her in California.

"Palfrey hires women who are at least 22 years of age, possess some college education and have employment outside of their prostitution activities," according to the affidavit, filed by an Internal Revenue Service agent last year in the forfeiture case.

Authorities said she placed ads recruiting women in the Washington City Paper, on the Internet, in the student newspaper at the University of Maryland and elsewhere.

"Palfrey personally interviews the women by telephone and has them mail an application with a photograph" to Palfrey's post office box in California, IRS agent Troy A. Burrus said in the affidavit. "The women tell Palfrey the days that they will be available, but Palfrey encourages them to work at least three nights a week."

He added, "After a woman is hired as a prostitute, she is sent to a 'screening' appointment, and is required to engage in sexual activity, without payment, with a male designated by Palfrey." The women had sex with the male "testers," authorities said, "so that Palfrey can ensure that none of her employees are law enforcement officers."

Burrus said "the prostitutes reside in Virginia, Maryland and Washington, D.C., and travel to locations in these three jurisdictions. . . . Palfrey tells the prostitutes where they should go, the time of the meeting with the customer, and the customer's name."

Escort Business Owner Indicted (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

A California woman was indicted yesterday on federal charges she ran a multimillion dollar prostitution ring in the District.

Deborah J. Palfrey, who is considering selling customer records to pay for her legal defense, faces racketeering and money-laundering charges under a federal indictment issued yesterday in federal court in the District.

Prosecutors said Miss Palfrey ran Pamela Martin & Associates as a prostitution ring in the District from her home in California since 1993.

According to the indictment, the prostitution business involved 132 women who were hired primarily through local newspaper ads, with money split between the prostitutes and Miss Palfrey. She was paid through money orders sent to her California post office box, prosecutors said.

The indictment, which also accuses Miss Palfrey of arranging sex for money in Virginia and Maryland, occurred months after authorities seized Miss Palfrey's bank accounts, stocks, real estate and gold coins in connection with the investigation.

Last fall, the U.S. Attorney's Office filed court papers to seize Miss Palfrey's assets. The civil forfeiture proceedings were ongoing.

The Washington Times first reported Feb. 21 that Miss Palfrey told federal authorities she would "make life miserable" for former customers and employees unless her case is dropped. The Times reported that government attorneys said Miss Palfrey had threatened to "harass potential witnesses whose identifies remain secret ... through calculated public disclosures of former customers' and former co-workers' identities."

On Wednesday, an attorney representing Miss Palfrey in the forfeiture proceedings said his client would sell customer records over the Internet to raise money for her legal defense.

Attorney Montgomery Blair Sibley said Miss Palfrey will be "selling selected records of Pamela Martin and Associates, which will include contact information on all of the 'customers' of the service -- over 10,000 individuals -- from its entire 13-year operational history."

Last week, Mr. Sibley told The Times that Miss Palfrey did not intend to disclose former customers' identities or to make "a circus" out of the case.

Yesterday, he said his client's plan to sell records was "a last resort" to raise money for a legal defense.

Government attorneys have accused Miss Palfrey of threatening to use civil discovery to harass potential witnesses.

"Shockingly, claimant's 'civil' counsel threatened further public embarrassment of former customers," Assistant U.S. Attorney William R. Cowden stated in a court filing earlier this week in the forfeiture case.

In a recent e-mail to the U.S. Attorney's Office, Miss Palfrey warned of repercussions if prosecutors did not drop her case.

"I cannot emphasize to you the terrible and quite unnecessary ramifications this [civil and/or criminal] case will set off, if permitted to advance for both sides," Miss Palfrey wrote.

The indictment filed yesterday charges that Miss Palfrey placed ads seeking escorts in the Washington City Paper and the University of Maryland's Diamondback student newspaper.

Authorities said Miss Palfrey hired women who were at least 22 years old and required that they mail her an application and photo before being employed.

The women also underwent a screening process in which they were required to engage in sexual activity without being paid to ensure that they were not law-enforcement officers, authorities said.

The prostitutes worked about three nights a week, charging as much as $300, authorities said. Half the money went to Miss Palfrey, who used the funds to pay for her mortgage, car lease and stocks, prosecutors said.

In civil proceedings, Miss Palfrey has denied any wrongdoing.

Mr. Sibley, in court records filed last month, said trying the case would require testimony and documents pertaining to 100 escorts and hundreds of customers.

2 Consecutive Life Sentences In Murder Of Racing Icon, Wife (LAT)

By Charles Proctor, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2007

A Pasadena judge today sentenced Michael Goodwin, convicted in January of murdering racing legend Mickey Thompson and his wife, to two consecutive terms of life in prison without parole.

Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Teri Schwartz earlier rejected defense motions for a retrial and to dismiss the charges. Deputy Public Defender Elena M. Saris said she would appeal.

Goodwin, 62, called Thompson's death a tragedy, but insisted on his innocence. FOR THE RECORD:

Goodwin: In an earlier version, Michael Goodwin's age was given as 61. He is 62. —

"I can't apologize because I'm not guilty," he said before the sentence was read.

Collene Campbell called her brother Mickey "a true man, an icon, and he is missed beyond what any words could describe."

She then began crying as she read from a statement in the courtroom during the sentencing. "I have received calls from around the world from those distressed and impacted by the murders," she said.

The Thompsons' killings became a legendary Southern California mystery, the subject of nearly two decades of police investigation and several national television shows.

Thompson and his wife, Trudy, were gunned down in the driveway of their eastern Los Angeles County home on March 16, 1988 by a pair of hooded assailants, who then escaped on bicycles. Prosecutors said the gunmen shot Thompson repeatedly but kept him alive to watch his wife's murder before they shot him in the head. The gunmen were never identified.

Prosecutors always considered Goodwin, a former business partner of Thompson, the prime suspect in plotting the killings, even though no evidence linked him to the scene.

They alleged that the circumstances -- the killers didn't touch the $4,000 the Thompsons were carrying or the $70,000 worth of jewelry in the house -- showed the murders were motivated by revenge. And they argued that Goodwin was the only person who could want Thompson dead that badly.

Thompson, the first American to reach 400 mph in a piston-driven vehicle and the holder of numerous speed records, joined Goodwin in the mid-1980s to promote motor sports in Southern California.

Their relationship soon deteriorated. Thompson won a $514,000 judgment against Goodwin that was pending at the time of the killings. Goodwin declared personal and business bankruptcy as a result of the judgment, which was never paid.

Prosecutors in Orange County — the location of much of the dispute between Thompson and Goodwin — charged Goodwin with the slayings five years ago. But an appeals court threw out the charges in June 2004, citing a lack of evidence that Goodwin had planned the crime there.

Within days of the appeals court decision, Los Angeles prosecutors filed murder charges against Goodwin.

Witnesses testified that they had heard Goodwin threaten Thompson's life, and one key witness said he saw Goodwin scout out the Thompsons' neighborhood in the gated community of Bradbury.

The defense countered that the passage of time and the "Hollywood" treatment of the case in the media called the veracity of witness testimony into doubt.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Local Officials Have Not Heard From FBI About Civil Rights Cases (MONNST)

Monroe News-Star, March 2, 2007

Local and area law enforcement officials said today they have not been contacted by the FBI regarding investigating cold civil rights cases in the area.

FBI Director Robert Mueller said at a news conference Tuesday that the agency is investigating about a dozen cold civil rights cases in an effort to seek justice for victims of racially motivated killings.

FBI officials declined to identify the cases they are working to reopen. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said making that information public could hinder the investigations.

He also said the FBI will help local law enforcement authorities prosecute cases in which federal charges aren't applicable.

Mueller said the FBI and local authorities have made 10 to 12 cases a priority, but as many as 100 could be investigated.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Urban League and the Southern Poverty Law Center are assisting the effort.

The center has a list of 127 race-related killings between 1954 and 1968 — a number it concedes could be much higher.

Area cases on the center's list are:

? Frank Morris, Ferriday. In 1964

Morris, who owned a shoe store, was killed when a gas stove exploded during an arson. Morris, who lived in a room adjoining the store, was ordered to return to his room by the men who started the fire. An extensive Justice Department investigation was conducted, but the outcome is unclear.

? Albert Pitts, David Pitts, Marshall Johnson and Ernest McPharland, Monroe. In 1960 a white employer was arrested and then released in the shooting of five of his employees. Four of them died. The victims were accused of making threats. The employer was never charged.

? Robert Wilder, Ruston. In 1965

a white policeman was accused of Wilder's death, and a coroner's jury ruled the slaying was justifiable homicide.

In Concordia Parish, Kathleen Stevens, public information officer for Sheriff Randy Maxwell, said she was not aware of any contact about the Ferriday case from federal investigators.

Stevens, like Ouachita Parish investigations Maj. Royce Toney, said the only people who have inquired about the cases were reporters, who asked about contact or requests from federal investigators.

Lt. Curtis Hawkins with Ruston Police could not be reached.

Since 1989, authorities in seven states have re-examined 29 killings from the civil rights era, leading to 28 arrests and 22 convictions.

In one recent prosecution, 71-year-old reputed Ku Klux Klan member James Seale, has pleaded not guilty to kidnapping and conspiracy to commit kidnapping in connection with the May 2, 1964, abduction, beating and drowning deaths of two black teens — Henry Dee and Charles Moore — in Mississippi.

Justice Department officials also were helping state officials in Mississippi reopen the Emmett Till case. Till, 14, of Chicago, was killed in 1955 after he reportedly wolf-whistled at a white woman. But a court official in Leflore County, Miss., confirmed Monday that a grand jury has decided not to indict anyone in Till's killing.

However, federal prosecutors have won convictions in other high-profile civil rights cases. They sent former Klansman Edgar Ray Killen to jail for 60 years for his role in the killing of three civil rights workers in Mississippi in 1964.

Congress has tried for several years to establish a "cold case" unit for civil rights crimes in the Justice Department. Bills sponsored by Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., and Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., would authorize $11.5 million a year to create such a unit.

Gonzales said he would welcome any help from Congress, but he denied the congressional push to reopen investigations into old civil rights crimes prodded the Justice Department to act.

EDITORIAL: Focusing On Cold Cases (NOTP)

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 2, 2007

Washington Parish Sheriff's Deputy Oneal Moore was murdered 42 years ago, but the FBI says that it hasn't given up on the case, one of about a dozen unsolved civil-rights era murders that are getting renewed attention from the agency.

When these crimes took place decades ago, African-American victims had little hope of getting justice. Now, investigators will have to deal with the damage time itself has done to the cases.

But that's all the more reason to act quickly, and the FBI's decision to aggressively pursue cold cases that they believe were racially motivated is encouraging.

Deputy Moore and his partner, Creed Rogers, were the first African-American deputies to work for the Washington Parish Sheriff's Office. They were hired to help quell racial tension in Washington Parish, but they ended up being victims of racial violence when they were ambused on Louisiana 21 by a group of white men and shot. Deputy Moore was killed; his partner lost an eye.

The murder led to further violence. A year later, Clarence Triggs, another African-American man, was shot to death after attending a demontration to protest the lack of progress in the Moore case.

Jim Bernazzani, special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans office, says the Moore case, while difficult, has never been closed. In 1990, authorities dug up a slab in hopes of finding the murder weapon and convened a grand jury. Two years later, the FBI told the deputy's widow that it had new information and offered a $40,000 reward.

Now, Special Agent Bernazzani says that the FBI has some "very hot leads" in the case, and that sounds promising.

There have been some notable successes in pursuing old civil rights cases, including the 1994 conviction of Byron de la Beckwith for the murder of civil-rights leader Medgar Evers. In Mississippi, authorities recently arrested James Ford Seale in connection with the 1964 abduction and murder of Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee. Mr. Seale will be tried on charges of kidnapping and conspiracy next month.

It remains to be seen whether this new push will bring justice for the slain Washington Parish deputy or closure for his family. But these cases must not be forgotten, and it's only right that the FBI and the Justice Department make every effort to see them solved.

Bending Toward Justice, Finally (BN)

The Birmingham News (AL), March 2, 2007

THE ISSUE: A new cold case initiative may help solve suspicious death cases from the civil rights era.

If justice delayed is justice denied, what is justice ignored? A national disgrace.

Too many times, civil rights-era murderers got away with their crimes. Too many times, law enforcement officials covered up cases, failed to investigate them fully and even wrongly classified some murders as accidental deaths. Too many times, there was no justice for the loved ones of victims, just grief and anger.

Fortunately, the U.S. Justice Department has decided to reopen investigations into nearly 100 suspicious death cases from across the South during the civil rights era to see if they were racially motivated murders that can be solved and prosecuted.

The FBI and Justice Department on Tuesday announced partnerships with the NAACP, Southern Poverty Law Center and National Urban League, which have referred the cases to the federal agencies. Eight of the 76 cases SPLC referred to law enforcement were unsolved cases from Alabama. Ten to 12 of the nearly 100 cases are under active investigation with new developments, according to FBI Director Robert Mueller.

The Civil Rights Cold Case Initiative was inspired, at least in part, by the successful prosecutions of Thomas Blanton in 2001 and Bobby Frank Cherry in 2002 for the 1963 murders of four girls in the heinous Sixteenth Street Baptist Church bombing in Birmingham. Mueller on Tuesday mentioned those and other recent, successful prosecutions of old cases, such as the 2005 conviction of Edgar Ray Killen for his role in the 1964 murders of three civil rights workers in Philadelphia, Miss.

"These successes have restored our hope and renewed our resolve," Mueller said. "Justice has been delayed, but we are determined justice will not be denied."

In many of these cases, that may prove easier said than done. Perpetrators and witnesses alike may no longer be alive. Memories may have faded and evidence could be lost. In some cases, there may be no federal jurisdiction. And guilty consciences don't necessarily compel people to tell what they know, as Birmingham lawyer Doug Jones, who prosecuted Blanton and Cherry, found out.

"If there was ever a case for people to step forward to do some reconciliation or right a wrong, it was one when four innocent girls were killed in a bomb in a church," Jones told News staff writer Mary Orndorff. "And guess what? We didn't have anybody like that."

Still, looking to uncover "a few burning embers" in cold cases, as SPLC President Richard Cohen put it, is the moral and right thing to do.

If cases can be prosecuted and convictions won, it will bring a measure of justice where there has been none. Grieving families and friends of the victims who have carried deep emotional wounds for decades, knowing that killers had gotten away with their crimes - and sometimes knowing who those killers are - may find some small relief.

The Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. famously said, "Let us realize the arc of the moral universe is long, but it bends toward justice."

Recent convictions of civil rights-era crimes have bent that long arc toward justice. Tuesday's announcement bent it just a tiny bit more.

Navy Chaplain Is Discharged (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, March 2, 2007

Lt. Gordon J. Klingenschmitt, a Navy chaplain, has lost a three-year battle to stay in the chaplain corps after superiors warned him about delivering sectarian Christian prayers and sermons at a sailor's memorial service and other events attended by religiously diverse audiences. Lieutenant Klingenschmitt, who spent 16 years in the military, became a hero to religious conservatives, but was court-martialed last year for wearing his uniform at a political protest in front of the White House. He received an honorable discharge.

Bush Administration's Quiet Campaign Against Religious Bias (TENN)

By CHARLES C. HAYNES, Columnist

Nashville Tennessean, March 2, 2007

Here's one of the best-kept secrets about the Bush presidency: Over the past five years, the U.S. Justice Department has quietly, but vigorously, enforced civil rights laws designed to protect religious freedom.

Now Attorney General Alberto Gonzales wants to get the word out. On Feb. 20, he announced an initiative called the First Freedom Project to carry out "even greater enforcement of religious rights for all Americans."

Since presidents aren't shy about their accomplishments, I'm not sure why we haven't heard more about this before. Maybe we're so busy shouting past one another about church-state conflicts that we overlook threats to free exercise of religion.

Lest we forget, there are two religious-liberty provisions in the First Amendment: no establishment and free exercise. Establishment-clause battles over "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance or the Ten Commandments in the courthouse grab the headlines. But free-exercise problems — discrimination against religious practice and expression in the workplace, schools, land use and elsewhere — have a real impact on the lives of millions of Americans.

The new report documents the Bush administration's efforts to take religious discrimination seriously. After establishing the first-ever Special Counsel for Religious Discrimination early in the administration, the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division dramatically increased enforcement of federal statutes protecting religious rights.

In education, for example, the department reviewed 82 cases and conducted 40 investigations 2001-06. Compare this with the 1995-2000 time period, when the department reviewed one case and made no investigations.

Investigations involving religious discrimination in employment went up from 16 in 1995-2000 to 31 cases 2001-06. Similar increases occurred in housing and public accommodation.

Administration critics aren't impressed. "Expecting the Bush administration to defend religious liberty," says Barry Lynn of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, "is a little like asking Colonel Sanders to baby-sit your pet chicken."

Interfaith Alliance President Welton Gaddy calls the Justice Department project "a scam that weakens religious freedom for all Americans."

Lynn and Gaddy are veterans of church-state battles with the Bush administration over everything from faith-based initiatives to school vouchers. They argue that the current Justice position on establishment-clause issues undermines religious liberty. But the debate over "no establishment," as important as it is, shouldn't keep us from finding some common ground on the need for "free exercise" protections.

As Judge Judy would say, these are real cases about real people. From attacks on houses of worship to incidents of discrimination at school and work, the Justice Department over the past five years has investigated scores of cases involving religious rights of Christians, Jews, Muslims, Sikhs, Native Americans and others.

However much we disagree about the relationship between religion and government, surely we can agree that freedom of religion should mean freedom from religious discrimination.

ANTITRUST:

EU Threatens Microsoft With New Fines (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0138795

BRUSSELS -- New European Union charges against Microsoft Corp. that threaten the company with as much as $1 billion in fines highlight an increasingly fierce industry battle over how to sell business software.

European regulators launched formal charges yesterday against Microsoft -- for the third time in three years -- accusing the tech giant of trying to overcharge competitors for information to make their products work well with Microsoft's ubiquitous Windows operating system.

The charges stem from a 2004 EU decision that Microsoft abused its near-monopoly position as the producer of Windows. Microsoft has already racked up close to $1 billion in fines in the case.

The EU's latest move goes to the heart of a growing battle between Microsoft's traditional fee-based software business and challenges from International Business Machines Corp., Red Hat Inc. and Oracle Corp., which offer free or nominally priced "open source" software.

Microsoft's competitors say they believe the company has structured its proposed charges for the programming information in such a way as to undermine their business models.

The March 2004 EU decision requires Microsoft to offer licenses for the programming information on "reasonable and non-discriminatory terms" to software rivals who need it. No companies have licensed the information yet.

The 2004 decision ordered Microsoft to help rivals write software linking back-office server computers with employees' Windows-driven desktop computers for a narrow range of functions, including the accessing and printing of documents and logging onto password-protected company systems.

"The current view is that there is no significant innovation" in the programming information to warrant the price Microsoft is charging, EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in a statement yesterday.

But Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, said in an interview he was surprised by the aggressive new charges. "I feel we need a more constructive approach to address very complicated and technical issues in a way that is going to make progress," he said.

Microsoft has appealed the original 2004 decision against it, and a decision from a European court in Luxembourg is expected this year.

The background to the current dispute is an effort by IBM, Red Hat, Oracle, Sun Microsystems Inc. and other companies to best Microsoft in the lucrative market for business software. The rivals' strategy is to hawk open-source software to companies, at little or no price.

Any programmer is free to alter these open computer programs as he likes or make improvements available to others via online downloads -- hence the term open source. The Microsoft rivals then make money by selling service contracts to companies to maintain and upgrade their software.

Microsoft's software, by contrast, is protected by fee-based licenses that don't allow alteration or sharing of its computer code.

Microsoft proposed a complex system requiring its rivals to pay "per-unit royalties," or a fee every time the competitors' customers use software that incorporates parts of the disputed Microsoft programming information.

Although the EU case only concerns a relatively small part of the overall business market, critics say this pricing system is part of a strategy to stymie open-source-software providers.

"It would be fundamentally inconsistent with their business model," which doesn't track the number of end users of its products or how they use the products, said Thomas Vinje, a lawyer for an industry group including IBM, Oracle, Red Hat and Sun Microsystems.

Mr. Smith of Microsoft said the disputed programming information is covered by 36 technology patents and that an additional 37 patents are pending. "It's hard to see how the commission can argue that even patented information must be made available for free," he said.

Mr. Vinje countered that many software patents are granted incorrectly and are often reversed upon challenge.

The EU has fined Microsoft twice. In 2004, regulators ordered the company to pay more than $600 million after finding Microsoft had exploited its near-monopoly in operating systems for personal computers to muscle aside competitors.

DOJ_NMG_0138796

In July, regulators hit Microsoft with a further €280.5 million fine ($371.2 million) for failing to compile the disputed programming information in a usable manner. Microsoft later fixed that problem.

The "statement of objections" sent to Microsoft yesterday is a formal charge outlining how regulators believe the company hasn't complied with EU orders. Microsoft has four months to answer the charges and can also request a closed-door oral hearing.

After weighing Microsoft's defense, Ms. Kroes will decide whether to level the fine and, if so, the amount of the penalty. Microsoft can then appeal the fine to the European court in Luxembourg.

Brussels Threatens Microsoft With Further Antitrust Fines (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

Microsoft was yesterday dealt a serious setback in its long-running antitrust battle with the European Commission, when Brussels threatened to impose yet another massive fine on the US software group for failing to comply with a landmark competition ruling handed down almost three years ago.

Europe's top antitrust regulator yesterday issued a new set of charges against Microsoft, a step that is likely to result in another ruling and a new fine against the group. Since the Commission opened its probe against the world's largest software maker more than eight years ago, Microsoft has been fined close to €780m (£526m) for abusing its dominant market position and failing to respect the regulator's ruling.

The Commission refused to comment on the size of any new fine that could arise from yesterday's charges. However, Brussels could - in the worst-case scenario for Microsoft - hit the group with a penalty in excess of €800m.

The Commission accused Microsoft of demanding excessive royalties from companies wishing to license technical information about its Windows operating system. The order to make such information available to rivals formed a key plank of the Commission's March 2004 ruling against the group.

The Commission stressed that Microsoft was the first group to be accused of ignoring a European Union antitrust ruling. "This is a company which apparently does not like to have to conform with antitrust decisions," said the spokesman for Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner.

Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, rejected the Commission's allegations. He said Microsoft's proposed pricing scheme would be 30 per cent cheaper than comparable licensing fees.

Under the terms of the 2004 ruling, Microsoft has to make available "interoperability" information to other software makers so that rivals can design server software that functions smoothly with Windows-driven computers and servers.

The Commission said yesterday it had found "no significant innovation in the interoperability information".

It also claimed that companies were being asked to give Microsoft 35 per cent of the net operating profits they made by selling products designed with the help of the licence.

The original 2004 ruling is under appeal in front of an EU court, which is expected to issue its ruling in the next six months.

EU Threatens New Fines Against Microsoft For Not Abiding By Antitrust Ruling (AP)

By Raf Casert, Associated Press

AP, March 2, 2007

BRUSSELS, Belgium -- The European Union threatened Microsoft Corp. on Thursday with fines as high as $4 million a day, claiming the software company was still not offering a fair deal to rivals seeking to make their products more compatible with Windows.

Microsoft said the EU Commission's demands were not reasonable. "We believe we have been fair in setting" prices for the information, said Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith.

"It is hard to see how the Commission can argue that even patented innovation must be made available for free," he said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0138797

The EU complained that three years after a landmark antitrust ruling to open up the market, the world's largest software maker still refused to cooperate. "This is a company which apparently does not like to have to conform with antitrust decisions," said EU Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd.

Under a 2004 antitrust ruling by the European Union, Microsoft had to disclose complete and accurate interface documentation on reasonable and nondiscriminatory terms, allowing its competitors to interoperate with Windows PCs and servers.

Under a so-called "statement of objections" released Thursday, the EU's executive Commission said there was "no significant innovation" in the requested information. It also rejected 1,500 pages of submissions by Microsoft over the past three months and said Microsoft's price proposals were unreasonable.

"I am therefore again obliged to take formal measures to ensure that Microsoft complies with its obligations," EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in a statement.

Smith complained Microsoft had asked for feedback half a year ago and only on Thursday received a reply thinly veiled in a threat.

"We're disappointed that this feedback is coming six months later and in its present form, but were committed to working hard to address the Commissions Statement of Objections," said Smith.

He added "the findings appear to be an attempt to regulate the pricing of our intellectual property rights on a global basis" something which would go beyond the jurisdiction of the European Commission.

Microsoft has four weeks to reply to the Commission after which the EU could impose fines going as high as 3 million euros ($4 million) a day, Todd said.

Work group servers are designed to let numerous users share and exchange information on projects so that groups of workers located near or far from their offices can collaborate on joint projects.

"The royalty demands are intended to force every competitor out of the market," said Simon Awde, the chairman of the European Committee for Interoperable Systems, a group of Microsoft rivals.

At a hearing last year, EU regulators used evidence from IBM Corp., Novell Inc., Oracle Corp. and Sun Microsystems Inc. on systems compatibility. None of those companies are currently involved in the legal battle, although they are members of two broad industry coalitions -- ECIS and the Software & Information Industry Association -- that back the Commission.

Microsoft is challenging the EU's original 2004 antitrust order at the EU's Court of First Instance. The 2004 antitrust order found the company broke competition law for abuse of a dominant position and fined the software maker a record euro497 million (US$613 million).

"It is the first time we have been confronted by a company which has failed to comply with an antitrust decision," said Todd. "We are in unknown territory."

"We don't want to be in a situation where ten years after an antitrust decision, they still are not in compliance," said Todd, adding the "vast majority of the information" provided to the software competitors, was "not innovative."

To remedy Microsoft's antitrust abuse, the EU ordered the company to sell a copy of Windows without its media player software and told it to share communications code and information with rivals to help them develop server software that worked smoothly with Microsoft's ubiquitous Windows desktop operating system.

EU regulators fined Microsoft another 280.5 million euros ($371 million) last July for failing to supply the "complete and accurate" interoperability required.

Brussels Needs More Time To Rule On Sony BMG (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

The music industry faces a prolonged period of regulatory uncertainty after the European Union's top antitrust regulator said yesterday it needed another four months to scrutinise the merger that created Sony BMG.

DOJ_NMG_0138798

The European Commission waved through the original tie-up in 2004, arguing that the merger would not undermine competition in the market. However, its ruling was challenged and - in a rare move that shocked the music industry - a top European court decided last year to overturn the Commission's clearance decision.

For Sony BMG, the ruling meant it had to resubmit the merger to the Brussels watchdog for approval and a fresh investigation.

The Commission said it had completed an initial one-month assessment of the Sony BMG merger, but now needed more time to examine whether the deal "strengthens or creates a dominant position in these relatively concentrated markets". Brussels added it would take into consideration factors such as "the growing sales of online music" .

But the Commission said it would also examine whether the merger had created a "collective dominant position", which means a situation in which a small number of big companies can effectively control a market and keep smaller companies from challenging their power.

The Commission said it had until July 2 to make a final decision on the merger. Brussels can either block the deal, wave it through in return for concessions such as asset disposals or approve the deal without conditions - which it did in 2004. Should the regulator block the tie-up, Sony BMG would have to break apart.

Icahn's Move On Motorola Lifts Stock (FT)

By Paul Taylor In New York

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

Shares in Motorola rose in early trading yesterday after the world's second largest mobile phone maker revealed that Carl Icahn, the billionaire Wall Street raider, was seeking to lift his stake in the company to about 6 per cent by acquiring another $2bn in stock.

If completed, the proposed stock purchase would lift the stake in Motorola acquired last month by Mr Icahn from 1.6 per cent, and turn him into the company's second biggest investor behind Barclays Global Investors. Barclays had a 6.82 per cent stake in Motorola at the end of December.

Mr Icahn's demand that Motorola use the bulk of its $11.6bn in cash to accelerate share buy-backs has helped prop up its share price in the wake of a series of setbacks.

The company reported weak financial resultsearlier this year reflecting a fierce mobile phone price war and a lack of blockbuster products.

Profit margins in Motorola's core phone division shrank to 4.4 per cent in the fourth quarter from almost 12 per cent in the preceding three months as the company slashed prices in order to retain market share and remain competitive with Finland's Nokia, the world's largest mobile phone maker.

Late on Wednesday, Motorola said Mr Icahn and Icahn Partners had each filed for approval to buy between $119.7m and $500m in Motorola stock. In addition, Motorola said it had received a notice under the Hart-Scott-Rodino antitrust act that two other Icahn entities had also each filed to buy more than $500m worth of shares. If all four entities each buy $500m of stock, it would lift the Icahn stake to about 6 per cent.

*Nortel Networks, the Canadian telecommunications equipment maker, surprised investors yesterday with yet another restatement of earnings, but said its fourth-quarter results would not be affected by the move. Nortel has struggled to shore up its profitability and investor confidence following restatements related to accounting problems.

China Builds Commerce Codes (WSJ)

By Andrew Batson

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

BEIJING -- China's leadership is stepping up its efforts to build a legal system that can handle the demands of a complex, market-driven economy, as managing the fast-growing nation becomes increasingly challenging.

That program will take the spotlight when China's legislature opens its annual session on Monday. The National People's Congress is scheduled to consider, and most likely pass, two crucial pieces of economic legislation. One would give private property new protections of unprecedented force and detail for China; another would require foreign and domestic companies to pay the same rate of tax.

The property-rights law will be a symbolic milestone for the still nominally Communist nation, even though it falls far short of what more liberal reformers had initially advocated. For foreign businesses, the tax law will put them on a more-equal footing with local competitors, as it gradually brings an end to most of the special breaks offered in the past. Several other important laws will also be discussed at the meeting for passage later this year, including the country's first antitrust legislation and a measure that would give workers more say in contracts with their employers.

All of these are the building blocks of the legal infrastructure that underpins the daily functioning of a market economy, although the country's legal code is still in its infancy and legal redress can be difficult to come by. Many of these laws have been in the works for years, and have provoked sometimes heated debate. They are coming to fruition this year as a consensus grows that the new legislation can fill some gaping holes and rectify obvious inequities in the current system.

"China is, step by step, going down the road of the market economy," said Sheng Jiemin, an expert on antitrust legislation at Peking University. "The government had to revise many laws after China joined the World Trade Organization. And other necessary measures are being regularly issued."

The annual meeting of the National People's Congress, when nearly 3,000 delegates gather in Beijing, is one of the few occasions when China's leaders discuss their policies in public. Given the turmoil in China's stock markets this week, as fears spread that a government crackdown on speculation was imminent, this year's meeting is likely to be particularly closely watched for signals on financial policy, as well as progress in lawmaking.

China's economy has been changing much faster than the legal system that is supposed to govern it. Huge numbers of Chinese now own their own homes and run their own businesses, but it is difficult to settle precisely who owns what and what they are allowed to do with it.

Private-property rights, in the abstract, have been recognized in China's constitution through a series of amendments, the earliest in 1988. But those vague principles are of little help in handling specific cases, such as the government's frequent confiscation of land for development. That is a big reason for passing the property-rights law, which details the scope of different types of rights and sets rules for how to change or transfer them.

"The property-rights law tells you what is yours and what is his, and how it can be obtained or transferred. Without that, it's impossible to solve property disputes," said Mei Xiaying, a professor at the University of International Business and Economics in Beijing. Businesses in particular will welcome the clarification of property rights, which should make it easier to buy and sell major assets such as land, he said.

The legal overhauls have been controversial: The proposed property-rights law, in particular, attracted vocal opposition from leftist scholars who worry that it will pave the way for the accelerated privatization of state companies and widen the gap between the wealthy and the poor.

The draft antimonopoly law, under discussion for more than a decade, has also been held hostage by disputes among policymakers. Some want to use it to break open still-closed parts of the economy, while others see giving the government new antitrust powers as a way to strengthen its control over businesses -- particularly powerful foreign companies that have dominant market share in China.

Though its laws aren't subject to popular vote, the Chinese government does usually try to build a consensus among its officials before pushing through a major policy change. The property-rights law had been scheduled for passage at last year's meeting before a critical backlash took it off the agenda, and even the less-sensitive tax overhaul has been held up for years. Changes were made to the draft laws last year to address the criticisms.

With those laws having now been declared ready for passage, 2007 is shaping up to be a landmark year for legislation governing the economy -- after several technical measures, including China's first code for corporate bankruptcies, were passed in 2006. As all these new laws fall into place, scholars say, China's commercial code is finally getting close to completion.

The new measures will reinforce China's shift toward relying on law and legal processes, rather than government dictates alone, to manage the economy -- an ideal that has been endorsed by the highest levels of the leadership.

In a major speech late last year, the Communist Party's top law-and-order official, Luo Gan, said the government needs to "get better at using legal methods to harmonize economic relationships." If the legal system can help citizens settle their problems with employers, schools, and hospitals, he said, that promises to "fundamentally reduce social conflicts triggered by the conflict of interests."

Mr. Luo also appeared to recognize the importance of fairness in encouraging companies and individuals to turn to the legal system to resolve their disputes, saying it should "protect equally the legal interests of all types of market participants, [and] eliminate the appearance of bias in law enforcement." In practice, court decisions are heavily influenced by the government, and it is often difficult for individuals to use the legal system to counter official government actions.

All that doesn't mean Mr. Luo and other leaders endorse the idea of an independent judiciary. Party leaders say their goal is to "rule the country according to law." The idea is for the Communist Party's to exercise its power through the legal system, not just arbitrary commands, but it doesn't mean the party's authority is itself subject to the judgment of the law.

Legal Makeover To Underpin China's Market-Driven Economy (WSJ)

By Michael Connolly

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

With China's economy changing much faster than the legal system that is supposed to govern it, Beijing is moving quickly to create a system that can handle the demands of a complex, market-driven economy just as events like this week's Chinese market turmoil underscore how challenging managing the fast-growing nation has become.

The annual session of China's legislature, the National People's Congress, which begins Monday, is to consider and likely approve two significant pieces of economic legislation, one giving private property new protections of unprecedented force and detail for China, the other requiring foreign and domestic companies to pay the same rate of tax. DETENTE WITH KIM: Increasing diplomatic softening between the Washington and Pyongyang could lead to more stability in East Asia and bring North Korea out of its economic isolation. After having long taken a hard line on North Korea, the Bush administration has begun to backpedal on the major dispute for the past five years -- that Pyongyang violated the spirit of a 1994 disarmament deal with the U.S. by secretly developing nuclear weapons with highly enriched uranium. The pact explicitly covered only weapons using plutonium, a more common material for nuclear devices.

In testimony to congressional committees during the week, diplomatic and intelligence officials have expressed doubt about the amount of progress North Korea made in researching or developing uranium-based weapons. The U.S. national intelligence director's mission manager for North Korea, Joseph DeTrani, said the U.S. categorized its belief in North Korea's uranium-production program "at the midconfidence level," meaning it lacked corroboration. That was a step down from the previous categorization of "high confidence."

As Evan Ramstad reports, the move represents a big change in U.S. policy, and creates a smoother atmosphere for further discussions with North Korea on the uranium issue. It also lowers expectations in case international inspectors enter North Korea and find no facilities for uranium-based weapons. Bet that Pyongyang's President Kim Jong Il is beaming.

MORTGAGE IMPACTS: As falling home values can deprive homeowners of equity used to finance new vehicle purchases and increase loan defaults, the toll in the U.S. subprime mortgage market may explain General Motors Corp.'s decision Thursday to delay filing its 2006 annual report.

While in the midst of a massive restructuring of its North American operations, GM continues to wrap up issues related to past accounting problems. Meantime, GMAC Financial Services -- in which GM sold a majority stake during the fourth quarter to a consortium of investors led by Cerberus Capital Management -- continues to work on finishing its financial statements for the fourth quarter and all of 2006. The auto maker still owns 49% of the lending unit and relies on its health because GMAC backs GM's major incentive programs by offering attractive leasing and financing terms. GM and Cerberus are still negotiating the book value of GMAC following the completion of the sale.

Nonetheless, GM surprised Wall Street by reporting a 3.7% increase in monthly light-vehicle sales to 308,411 vehicles for February as sales to retail custoimers surged. Analysts had expected its sales would be flat or decline. Ford Motor Co.'s February sales, meanwhile, fell nearly 14%. But Toyota Motor Corp. posted a 12% jump in U.S. auto sales.

Mr. Buffett didn't disclose what he would pay, and, while he is taking resumes, isn't planning on leaving soon. Political Energies (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

As corporate dramas go, few can match the long-running Endesa takeover story. But the latest plot twist, in which Italian utility Enel entered the scene, may have the Spanish electricity giant's shareholders feeling like they're watching a farce. As usual when it comes to Europe and energy, politicians appear to be the ones making a mockery of the market.

A new chapter began Tuesday, when Enel bought a 9.9% stake in Endesa -- just three weeks before Endesa's shareholders were to consider bylaw changes that would allow Germany's E.On to move forward with a €41 billion purchase of the company. Yesterday Enel made arrangements to boost its holding to 17% -- Spanish law requires a regulatory review before an investor can buy more than 10% of a utility -- and said it would ask permission to keep buying up shares until it had nearly one-fourth of the company, at which point it would have to bid for the entire firm.

E.On's bid, which just last week seemed like a reasonably safe bet, is now in real danger. Spanish conglomerate Acciona owns 21% of Endesa and has indicated it won't sell to the German utility. Spain's public holding company owns 3%, so if Enel refuses to sell to E.On -- so far the Italians are being coy on that question -- the German company would have to win over almost all of the other shareholders to take control of Endesa. Even then, the large minorities might prove to be a thorn in E.On's side.

This saga might have been all to the good for Endesa shareholders -- competing bids can't be bad, right? -- if this were a true competition. But that's not the case. As it stands, smaller shareholders probably won't get the chance to weigh E.On's offer.

Investors who bought Endesa stock over the past year and a half, during which time the share price has doubled, may still have a chance to recoup handsome rewards -- if there are any takers still out there.

So why did Enel jump into the fray? There's plenty of reason to believe that the motivation was in part political. After failing to marry Endesa with Barcelona-based Gas Natural, Spanish Prime Minister José Luis Rodíguez Zapatero has been laboring for months to keep the company out of E.On's hands.

Last week, Mr. Zapatero had a summit with his Italian counterpart, Romano Prodi. Both governments insist the two leaders didn't discuss Endesa, only "reciprocal investments." So perhaps it's truly a coincidence that a few days later Enel, which is more than 30% state-owned, made its move for Endesa.

If, however, government meddling did occur, it is the last thing Europe needs in a sector that's already highly politicized. Rising oil prices, Russia's natural-gas games the past two Januarys and what the French call patriotisme économique have frustrated EU attempts to open the energy industry.

There are of course business reasons for Enel to buy into Endesa. Like E.On, Enel has been sitting on a pile of cash reserves and has few options for making acquisitions. Paris caught wind of a possible Enel-Suez deal last year and forced the latter into a tie-up with Gaz de France instead -- to the ire of the Italian government. Endesa is the only big fish available in Western Europe, and it's available only because the European Commission has spent the past year badgering Madrid for its protectionism. Yet the payoff for buying only a minority stake isn't clear.

Brussels deserves credit for its persistence in the Endesa case, even if Enel may negate much of that good work. Still, the difficulty it's had in enforcing cross-border competition here shows that the balance of power still lies in national capitals. Recognizing this, EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes is threatening to break up energy companies into suppliers and distributors in order to boost energy-sector competition.

We think it's too early for such a drastic and largely irreversible step. But Madrid, Rome and Paris aren't doing themselves, their utilities or their citizens any favors by indulging in these power plays.

XM-Sirius Merger Provides Little Airtime For Antitrust Issues (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell, The Deal

The Deal, March 2, 2007

The brand-new House Committee Antitrust Task Force took up the proposed merger between the nation's two satellite radio companies Wednesday, discussing technology, economics and personalities. Antitrust law, which will weigh big in the deal's ability to win government approval, received very little airtime.

Sirius Satellite Radio Inc.'s CEO Mel Karmazin was the headliner at the standing-room-only event as he pitched his company's merger with rival XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. He did his best to express his willingness to work with regulators and Congress to get the deal approved. But if the deal is ultimately rejected, he said, both XM and Sirius would be able to go on as separate and viable businesses.

But David Rehr, president and CEO of the National Association of Broadcasters, repeatedly told the room that the merger would be a "government-sanctioned monopoly," and that allowing the combination "portends great potential harm to the American public and to the many benefits of free local radio broadcasting."

Representatives invited one antitrust lawyer not involved with the deal to shed light on how the Department of Justice would examine the merger. Charles Biggio, a partner at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, testified that the DOJ's antitrust division would likely issue a second request for information on the deal in order to adequately tackle the various issues.

"The ultimate question the antitrust division will ask in reviewing the XM-Sirius transaction is whether the transaction will create or enhance market power; that is, whether it will cause prices to go up, output to go down, or quality or technological development to deteriorate in a relevant market affected by the transaction," Biggio said.

The analysis, he continued, would look at advertising, distribution via retail outlets and car manufacturers, content purchases and consumer subscriptions. Only after evaluating the effects in those areas would the staff lawyers at the DOJ consider the benefits of the deal, which have been estimated to be extensive, since the combined company would cut costs by better utilizing its satellite spectrum.

DOJ_NMG_0138803

After his prepared testimony, however, lawmakers had virtually no questions for Biggio.

A number of the representatives acknowledged they, or their family members, are current subscribers to one or the other satellite service.

Rick Boucher, D-Va., said that satellite radio companies may compete more with terrestrial radio stations than Rehr was willing to acknowledge, given a report released this week by international media and marketing research firm Arbitron Inc. That report said a survey of satellite radio users indicates that only 3.4 percent of radio listeners use satellite radio. Satellite radio listeners on average listened to far more radio, and actually listened to more terrestrial radio than satellite radio, according to the survey.

Several representatives told the witnesses they were keeping an open mind about the merger and would look forward to further information.

FTC Clears Carlyle's Philosophy Buy (AP)

AP, March 2, 2007

Federal Regulators Approve Carlyle Group's Acquisition of Skin Care Company Philosophy

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Federal antitrust regulators approved Carlyle Group's purchase of cosmetics and skin care company philosophy inc., according to a notice issued by the Federal Trade Commission Thursday.

The FTC cleared the sale without requiring any changes.

Carlyle, a private equity group, announced the purchase Jan. 31, but did not disclose terms of the deal. Philosophy sells through retailers and television shopping channels and was the top beauty brand on QVC in 2006, Carlyle said.

Carlyle also said in announcing the deal that it was its third consumer and retail acquistion in 11 months, after its purchase of Dunkin' Brands in March 2006 and Oriental Trading Co. in July 2006.

FTC Clears Purchase Of Mirant Plants (AP)

AP, March 2, 2007

Federal Regulators Approve $1.4B Purchase of Mirant Power Plants by Private Equity Firm

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Federal antitrust regulators approved the $1.4 billion sale of six power plants by Mirant Corp. to LS Power Equity Partners, according to a notice issued Thursday by the Federal Trade Commission.

The FTC cleared the sale without requiring any changes.

Mirant said when announcing the sale in mid-January that it expects net proceeds of $1.32 billion, after paying off $83 million in debt.

The plants, all in the U.S., produce a total of 3,619 megawatts of power. Mirant is selling its Michigan Zeeland plant, its West Georgia plant, its Shady Hills plant in Florida, its Sugar Creek plant in Indiana, its Bosque plant in Texas and its Las Vegas-based Apex plant.

LS Power Equity is part of private equity firm LS Power Group.

Shares of Mirant rose 72 cents, or almost 2 percent, to $37.91 in late afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

FCC Sides With Cable Phone Firms (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, March 2, 2007

In a move that's expected to bring new discount phone services to millions of rural Americans, the Federal Communications Commission ruled Thursday that local phone companies cannot block cable providers' rival Internet-based phone offerings.

"The commission must promote competition," FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said.

In an FCC petition last year, Time Warner Cable complained that rural carriers in South Carolina and Nebraska refused to set up connections so users of the company's Voice over Internet Protocol (VoIP) service and rural phone customers can exchange calls. The carriers also would not provide local phone numbers and 911 services.

DOJ_NMG_0138804

Time Warner typically leases these services from MCI and Sprint, which, in turn, lease them from the rural phone companies.

The rural carriers claimed a federal law promoting competition doesn't require them to provide the services because MCI and Sprint would not serve residents directly. They also noted VoIP has not been labeled a telecommunications service. State regulators in South Carolina and Nebraska sided with the rural carriers. Similar battles are playing out in other states.

But FCC staff said wholesale providers are entitled to the same network-leasing privileges as retail companies and that VoIP's classification is irrelevant.

Cable companies have lured millions of VoIP customers from local phone giants in major cities but largely have been shut out of less-populated markets, many of which have no land-line phone alternative. "This will enable Time Warner Cable to deploy its digital phone service to areas that have been denied the benefits of competition," the company said in a statement.

VoIP requires a broadband line and sends calls over the Internet.

Analyst Jessica Zufolo of Medley Global Advisors says the ruling should let cable companies "fully penetrate these rural markets."

But Dan Mitchell of the National Telecommunications Cooperative Association, which represents rural companies, says the FCC should have first resolved how much VoIP providers must pay local phone companies to connect calls. They now often pay very little.

"They're imposing costs on our networks and not paying for it," Mitchell said. "From our perspective, that's unfair competition."

FCC Grants Internet Phone Access (WP/BLOOM)

By Molly Peterson

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Rural telephone companies must allow carriers such as Verizon Communications to use local lines to connect Internet-based calls, U.S. regulators said yesterday.

The Federal Communications Commission ruling, in granting a petition filed by Time Warner Cable, "will enhance consumers' choice for phone service by making clear that cable and other [Internet phone] providers must be . . . allowed to put calls through to other phone networks," FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin said in an e-mailed statement.

AT&T and Verizon, the two biggest U.S. phone companies, supported Time Warner Cable's petition.

The FCC order overrides rulings by state regulators in South Carolina and Nebraska that barred certain carriers from connecting calls using voice-over-Internet protocol, or VOIP, to traditional local phone lines. The South Carolina regulators said Verizon had no right to route Internet-based phone calls through lines owned by rural-phone companies as part of a wholesale service it sells to Time Warner Cable, a unit of Time Warner Inc.

The state rulings would have impeded phone competition, the commission said in its decision. They also would have hindered the deployment of high-speed Internet access, the FCC said.

Cable companies have invested more than $100 billion on broadband networks "to offer consumers a wide array of new services, and this action will speed the rollout of digital voice service in many more markets," said Kyle McSlarrow, president of the National Cable & Telecommunications Association.

Oracle Adds Business-Intelligence Firm Hyperion (WSJ)

By Vauhini Vara

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

Oracle Corp.'s roll-up of smaller software concerns continues to roll on, with a twist in emphasis.

The deal announced yesterday -- a tender offer for Hyperion Solutions Corp. for $3.3 billion, or $52 a share -- highlights the business-software giant's shift from buying head-on rivals in maturing markets to snapping up players in fast-growing niches. Hyperion specializes in business-intelligence software, a hot field where Oracle has been a relatively minor player to date.

The transaction, which sent Hyperion's shares up 20% and moved the stocks of other companies in the sector, would be Oracle's largest acquisition since it acquired Siebel Systems Inc. for $5.85 billion in 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0138805

In the past two years, Oracle Chief Executive Larry Ellison has spent upward of $20 billion on buying more than 25 software firms. Early on, Oracle used big bids for major rivals such as PeopleSoft Corp. and Siebel to build itself into the No. 2 maker of applications for business tasks, such as finance and human resources, after German rival SAP AG. Those deals significantly beefed up Oracle's own applications business and customer list, while creating opportunities to increase profit by laying off employees in duplicate positions.

But lately, the company has focused on smaller acquisitions in areas such as security and content management, as well as firms focused on specific industries.

DEAL JOURNAL

1 • Read the Journal's new daily take2 on the high-stakes world of deal making, and see more in our new Deals & Deal Makers page3.

The Hyperion acquisition is the latest reflection of that plan. The company focuses on programs that help companies collect, analyze and share data about how their businesses are performing -- an increasingly important field as businesses seek to extract more usable knowledge from their growing troves of business data.

Forrester Research found in a recent survey that 13% of businesses plan to make first-time purchases of business-intelligence software this year -- more than in any other area of application software.

"In applications, [Oracle's] strategy has been to gain critical mass," UBS analyst Heather Bellini said. Now, the company is using its cash to drive revenue growth, not just cost savings, she said.

Where Oracle cut the former sales teams of PeopleSoft and Siebel, for example, it plans to squeeze cost savings from other parts of Hyperion.

"They've got a sales force," Safra Catz, Oracle's chief financial officer, said on conference call. "We're keeping it intact."

Oracle expects the transaction to be accretive to Oracle's earnings on a non-GAAP basis by at least one cent per share in fiscal year 2008 ending in May of that year and by at least four cents per share in fiscal 2009. The deal, subject to customary conditions, is expected to close next month.

Oracle had been in talks for months with Hyperion, of Santa Clara, Calif., and with rivals in the field that include Cognos Inc. and Franco-American Business Objects SA, according to people familiar with the matter. Oracle, Redwood Shores, Calif., was looking for a purchase that would fit with its own business-intelligence software and liked Hyperion because there was little overlap between the companies' products.

Analysts say they expect Oracle to focus, going forward, on similar types of deals in other niches. Major rivals, such as SAP, could now decide to snap up the other business-intelligence specialists, they suggested.

A spokesman for SAP, however, emailed a statement that appeared to question the wisdom of trying to grow through large deals. "This latest acquisition only further muddies Oracle's already cluttered application landscape," he wrote.

The latest deal sent Hyperion shares up $8.73 to $51.57 as of 4 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Oracle shares rose 34 cents, or 2.1%, to $16.77, also on Nasdaq, where Cognos shares rose 95 cents, or 2.5%, to $39.06, and Business Objects' American depositary shares fell 98 cents, or 2.7%, to $35.12.

Hyperion has ridden a wave of demand for software that helps companies analyze corporate data, counting 91 of the Fortune 100 companies as customers. Its revenue rose 9% to $765.2 million in its 2006 year ended June 30.

Hyperion has had to make acquisitions of its own as the software industry consolidates. Most recently, it announced in January that it would acquire, under undisclosed terms, closely held Decisioneering Inc., which makes software to help companies predict how they should run their business.

Separately, Oracle is making changes in its product-development organization, having fewer executives report to John Wookey, senior vice president of applications development, according to people familiar with the matter.

Edward Abbo, a senior vice president in charge of customer-relationship-management products, will take on broader responsibilities for Oracle's existing product lines, these people said. Mr. Abbo reports to Mr. Wookey.

Some of the other executives who reported to Mr. Wookey will now report to Mr. Abbo, these people said.

Oracle To Buy Hyperion Solutions In $3.3 Billion Deal (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0138806

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, March 2, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — Oracle bagged Hyperion Solutions for $3.3 billion on Thursday, renewing a furious shopping spree to unseat business-software leader SAP.

The cash deal, if approved by regulators, gives Oracle the keys to Hyperion's line of software used by corporate executives to track their company's performance — software that is also widely used by SAP customers.

The Hyperion acquisition is Oracle's biggest since it snapped up Siebel Systems for $6.1 billion last year. Oracle has spent more than $20 billion on almost 30 acquisitions in the past two years.

Oracle will pay $52 per share for Hyperion, a 21% premium above the most recent closing price of Hyperion's stock. Hyperion shares soared 20%, to $51.57, after the deal was announced Thursday. Oracle shares edged up 2%, to $16.77.

AMR Research analyst Bruce Richardson says Canada-based Cognos could be a takeover candidate for IBM, and France-based Business Objects may be courted by SAP. Hewlett-Packard might also sniff around for a purchase, he says.

"I would be surprised if something doesn't happen in 60 days. This is one of the last virgin markets," he says.

Business Objects is "keen" to remain independent and court Hyperion customers wary of the Oracle takeover, says Keith Gile, a senior adviser for Business Objects.

"We see this deal as a positive for us in eliminating Hyperion as a competitor," Gile says.

The purchase of 2,700-person Hyperion continues an aggressive expansion plan by Oracle CEO Larry Ellison to bolster his company's business-applications software, which automates a wide range of administrative tasks. Most of Oracle's revenue comes from its flagship database-software franchise, but growth in that market has slackened.

The Hyperion deal "beefs up" Oracle's business-intelligence software, David Hilal, managing director of Friedman Billings Ramsey, said in a report Thursday. "Unlike the acquisitions of PeopleSoft and Siebel, where there was meaningful product overlap, this deal is more complementary," he said by phone.

SAP still commands a healthy lead in the $56.4 billion market, but Oracle has chipped away by snapping up software makers such as PeopleSoft and Siebel. About 55% of Hyperion's 12,000 customers are also SAP customers, according to AMR Research.

Oracle expects a jump in sales and "some very significant (cost) efficiencies" because of Hyperion, Chief Financial Officer Safra Catz said on a conference call with analysts Thursday.

Hyperion earned $63 million on revenue of $765 million in its last fiscal year.

$8.6 Billion Acquisition Of Qantas OK'd (AP)

AP, March 2, 2007

(AP) - SYDNEY, Australia-The proposed $8.6 billion acquisition of Qantas Airways Ltd. by an investor group cleared a hurdle Thursday when the Australian competition watchdog said it will not oppose the sale.

The Australian Competition and Consumer Commission, or ACCC, said while market inquiries during a comprehensive review of the proposed acquisition had revealed a range of potential competition issues arising from the interests of the bidding consortium members, it ruled the deal is "unlikely to substantially lessen competition" under federal trade laws.

Qantas' board has recommended shareholders accept the bid by Australia's Macquarie Bank, Forth-Worth based Texas Pacific Group, Canada's Onex Corp. and others, which was first announced mid-December. It would be one of Australia's biggest-ever corporate takeovers.

ACCC chairman Graeme Samuel said while the regulator has closely reviewed whether Macquarie Bank's "partial direct and indirect interests" in Qantas and Sydney Airport could lead to discrimination in favor of Qantas by Sydney Airport management, it appeared there are "not clear incentives" for the bank to do this.

The ACCC found there is not likely to be a substantial lessening of competition across a range of aeronautical services, domestic and international air passenger services, aircraft parts and leasing, airline catering and ticketing services.

DOJ_NMG_0138807

In a statement, the bidding consortium Airline Partners Australia said it welcomes the ACCC ruling and has worked with the regulator to "address all relevant issues in relation to our bid."

The government's Foreign Investment Review Board is due to report to Treasurer Peter Costello next week on whether the bid breaches foreign ownership laws. Costello can block the sale if he believes it would not be in the national interest.

Costello said that a Senate inquiry announced Thursday into the sale would not delay his decision.

Qantas Buy-out Plan Clears Hurdle (FT)

By Raphael Minder

Financial Times, March 2, 2007

A proposed A$11.1bn (US$8.7bn) buy-out of Qantas, the Australian airline, yesterday cleared a big hurdle when the country's antitrust regulator ruled the takeover was unlikely to strangle competition. Graeme Samuel, chairman of the Australian Competition and Consumer Commission, said the watchdog's review had identified some potential issues of concern, in particular relating to Sydney airport.

But he said the concerns were not enough to suggest the deal could lead to "a substantial lessening of competition". Australia's leading airport is controlled by Macquarie, the investment bank that has spearheaded the buy-out offer for Qantas.

Peter Costello, Australia's treasurer, is expected in the next few days to receive a report from the Foreign Investment Review Board to determine whether the deal would run against the "national interest".

The consortium, which also includes Texas Pacific Group and Sydney-based Allco Equity Partners, has structured the deal so that foreign investors own only 39 per cent of the equity.

The Senate, the upper house of parliament, is also preparing to conduct a separate review of the deal.

ENVIRONMENT:

Md. To Investigate Dumping On Site In Rural Montgomery (WP)

By Miranda S. Spivack

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

Two Maryland agencies are investigating a two-acre pile of debris that has been dumped by a landscaping firm for the past eight years on a secluded site near the Patuxent River, a source of drinking water for the region.

The dump sits on property owned by Pepco in northeastern Montgomery County and rises 20 feet in places. It contains yard and construction waste, including cable, concrete and closed canisters, said government officials who have inspected the site. At one point last year, the debris pile was smoldering and emitting steam.

County officials have been aware of the dump since early 2006, but they did not order removal of the debris or issue fines to Pepco or Kollins Landscaping, the Brinklow firm dumping on the site. The dumping stopped a year ago after a frustrated neighbor obtained a court order. Not until last month did county officials begin examining the dump's contents more closely to assess its toxicity.

Log entries made by a county investigator who examined the site in early 2006 indicate that Pepco knew about the dumping and allowed it to continue.

"Through my conversation with Pepco it is clear that they are aware that Kollins Landscaping is placing materials at this location and that they have let it go on. However this still constitutes an illegal transfer station," said a log entry written in early 2006 by Peter R. Dilima, an inspector with the county's Department of Environmental Protection. Dilima did not respond to requests for comment.

"I don't know the inspector or how accurate or inaccurate he might have been with his notes and recollections," Boland said yesterday. "We don't permit anything like this. As soon as we became aware of it, we addressed it, and the county inspector thought it had been addressed," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0138808

The county's inspector general, Thomas Dagley, whose office is independent of the executive branch, referred the matter to the state attorney general's office and the state Department of the Environment last month. Both agencies have sent investigators to the site in Ashton, state and local officials said.

Dagley said the site, a few hundred feet from the Patuxent River, needs to be examined further to determine whether the dump is toxic. The river is used not only for drinking water but also for fishing and recreation.

"For allegations involving environmental crimes, it is important to the county and state investigators to coordinate," Dagley said. "Unless there is fact-finding at the state level, no one can answer the question of 'Is this an isolated dump on a Pepco site or one of many?' "

County officials said they are focusing on removing the material and pointed out that County Executive Isiah Leggett (D), who took office in December, had inherited the situation.

"We want to work with Pepco to clean it up," said Timothy Firestine, the county's chief administrative officer. "Our position is it needs to be cleaned up. It has been going on for a long time. Wrongs have certainly occurred."

Firestine said county officials estimate that 120 truckloads of debris need to come out. He said efforts are underway to ensure that the removal of the debris does not cause environmental damage.

Dilima's log indicates that several officials in the county's environmental and permitting agencies were told of the debris in early 2006. But dumping continued even as Pepco worked to distribute the waste on the site to try to speed decomposition, Dilima's log indicates.

Last March, a neighbor, Steve Kanstoroom, obtained a court order to stop dump trucks from using a nearby road to reach the site. Even so, one load was dumped there in June, records show.

Dilima's log, which Kanstoroom obtained through a public records request, indicates that the inspector initially urged the removal of the debris but that he agreed to allow most of the material to remain after a Pepco forester proposed spreading it around the site.

According to the log, Pepco forester David Paduda, who patrols the area, told Dilima that he and "others from his office" had a plan to remove some material and leave some to decompose on the site. The log says Paduda also told Steve Pullum of Montgomery's Department of Permitting Services and Paul Kolanowski of Kollins Landscaping of his plan.

Dumping such material legally would be expensive: The county transfer station in Shady Grove charges about $300 to $500 for a truckload of solid waste. Dumping natural wood waste is generally less expensive.

Illegal dumping, a misdemeanor in Montgomery, is punishable by six months in jail and a $1,000 fine. Unauthorized storage of solid waste on private property carries a fine of $500 a day.

Because the Ashton dump is near a stream that feeds into the Patuxent River, fines also could be imposed under federal environmental laws.

In mid-March 2006, the dump began giving off steam and possibly smoke, officials said, and it smoldered for several weeks under Pepco's overhead electrical transmission wires. Boland, the Pepco attorney, said yesterday the company did not believe the heat from the dump posed a danger.

Firefighters, inspectors and a state forester arrived to examine the site, but no one tested the dump's contents, according to Dilima's log. Officials agreed to leave the material alone and let it burn out on its own, the log says. Elizabeth Brigham, who lives nearby and is related to Paul Kolanowski, owner of the landscaping firm, was assigned to monitor it, the log says.

"Something is terribly wrong when the county refuses to take enforcement action against corporate polluters . . . and private citizens are left trying to protect their property by acting as a private attorney general," Kanstoroom said.

Kanstoroom said he became aware of the dump several years ago. He said he spoke to Kolanowski about it and thought the dumping had stopped. In early 2006, Kanstoroom began seeing Kollins Landscaping trucks carrying debris into the area and driving out empty. Kanstoroom said he asked Kolanowski to stop it, but the dumping continued. He said he then reported his observations to several county agencies and sent Pepco and county officials a video that showed the dump and the trucks.

Kolanowski declined to comment other than to say the dispute over the dump "was resolved over a year ago."

DOJ_NMG_0138809

A few days after Kanstoroom sent out the video, he said, he visited the site and noticed that someone had bulldozed the debris, covered it with dirt and pushed some of it toward a stream that leads into the Patuxent, where much of it remains. Several weeks later, Kanstoroom filed suit in Circuit Court.

County Council member Marc Elrich (D-At Large), whom Kanstoroom approached for help, said the case shows a fundamental breakdown in the county's enforcement of environmental regulations.

Elrich said: "We are trying to ask the county, 'Why were you not able to deal with this? . . . Why was nobody cited? Was it an administrative process with a bottleneck? Or is the law so unclear that you feel you couldn't deal with this? I have met with every department involved."

He added, "Nobody should have to go through this again."

The Climate-Change Precipice (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, March 2, 2007

The scientific debate about whether there is a global warming problem is pretty much over. A leading international group of climate scientists reported last month that the evidence for global warming is "unequivocal" and that the likelihood it is caused by humans is more than 90 percent. Skeptical researchers will continue to question the data, but this isn't a "call both sides for comment" issue anymore. For mainstream science, it's settled.

The question now is what to do about global warming. This is a political problem more than a scientific one. The solutions (if we can agree on any) will require political will and imagination -- and also pain. That was my only reservation about the Oscar night celebration of Al Gore's leadership on this issue. The gowns and black ties and the celebrity back-slapping made it look like dealing with global warming will be fun, a walk down the red carpet. But it's more likely to be about catastrophe and how to share the pain.

These issues come into focus in a startling new report by futurist Peter Schwartz. He turns the usual discussions upside down: Rather than starting with detailed estimates of climate change (how much temperatures will increase; how much sea levels will rise; what new diseases will be spawned), he looks instead at systems that already are vulnerable to such stresses.

What Schwartz discovers with his stress-testing makes climate change even scarier: The world already is precarious; the networks that maintain political and social order already are fragile, especially in urban areas; the dividing line between civilized life and anarchy is frighteningly easy to breach, as the daily news from Iraq reminds us. We look at the behaviors of butterflies and migratory birds as harbingers of climate change. But what about early effects on human beings? "The steady escalation of climate pressure will stretch the resiliency of natural and human systems," writes Schwartz. "In short, climate change pushes systems everywhere toward their tipping point."

Schwartz's report, "Impacts of Climate Change," was prepared by his consulting group, Global Business Network, for a U.S. government intelligence agency he doesn't identify. The text of the report is available at the online discussion forum PostGlobal (http://www.washingtonpost.com/postglobal). Here's a brief trek through the ravaged landscape Schwartz describes.

A first set of disasters waiting to happen involves stressed ecosystems. Human actions -- deforestation, overfarming, rapid urbanization -- have created special vulnerabilities to catastrophic natural events that are likely as the climate changes globally. In an interview, Schwartz cited the example of Haiti, which because of deforestation and loss of topsoil is "an ecosystem at the edge." A prolonged drought or a devastating hurricane could tip Haiti over that threshold -- and produce a refugee crisis of tens of thousands of boat people fleeing a devastated country.

Or take the problem of rising sea levels: Climate scientists are uncertain how fast the icecaps will melt and the seas will rise. But in Bangladesh, where millions of people live at or near sea level, even a small increase could produce a catastrophe. In a severe monsoon, 60 million to 100 million people could be forced to flee inundated areas, Schwartz warns, producing "the single greatest humanitarian crisis we have ever seen."

Lack of water may be as big a problem as flooding. Schwartz notes that more than 700 million people now live in arid or semi-arid areas. Climate change could tip this balance, too, producing severe water shortages and even "water wars." Tens of millions of people may become water migrants. The world's feeble political systems can't cope with existing migration patterns, let alone this human tide.

And finally, there is the problem of maintaining social order in a stressed world. You don't have to go to Baghdad to see how quickly the social fabric can be shredded; just look at New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina. The stresses come in part from rapid urbanization. Schwartz notes that in 1900, one in 20 people lived in cities; today it's about half, and the percentage is rising fast. Without strong and supple governments, this could become a world of vigilantes and militias, desperate to control scarce resources.

The big problems in life aren't the ones that hit you by surprise but the ones you can see coming. That's surely the case with climate change: We can measure it, we can imagine its catastrophic effects. But can we do anything to stop it? If we let ourselves visualize how bad it could get, as Schwartz does in this report, will we make changes that might reduce the disaster? That's the real stress test: It's coming at us. What are we doing about it?

Uncle Sam's Greenhouse Gases (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 2, 2007

Stop the presses: Senator Barbara Boxer of California has a good idea. Ms. Boxer, who heads the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, suggested last week that a first step in reducing greenhouse gases would be to require that federal buildings use more efficient light bulbs, and ask federal bureaucrats to turn off their computers at night.

"Don't you think it's time the federal government were a model of energy efficiency?" she asks. We warmly agree, not least since the United States Government is the largest single consumer of energy in the United States.

It's also one of the most inefficient energy users. According to a 1999 report by the Alliance to Save Energy, the "federal government, consumes about 32% more energy per square foot than the nation's building stock at large." This inefficiency costs taxpayers an estimated $1 billion a year. In Al Gore's phrase, Uncle Sam's leaving one giant "carbon footprint."

Of course, it follows from all this that the best way to make the federal government more energy efficient would be to undertake a government-wide policy of . . . lights out, permanently. Save the environment; kill a federal program.

Start, needless to say, with the Department of Energy, operating at an annual cost of $22 billion. The U.S. Government Accountability Office reports that from 1980 to 1996 Energy frittered away more than $10 billion on programs that were "terminated before completion." On behalf of combating climate change, America could live without DOE's Energy Hog Webgame for kids, which cost taxpayers $325,000.

The Senate Government Reform Committee has identified more than $200 billion of budget savings, enough to easily balance the budget, by eliminating redundant and wasteful federal activities. They'd have to open that nuclear-waste dump at Yucca Mountain to bury all the turned-off lightbulbs and computers. At this rate, Barbara Boxer might eclipse Al Gore as the Democrat who saved the planet. The key to success is one wonderful word -- "efficient."

Feds Target Gang Gun Connection (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune staff reporter

Chicago Tribune, March 1, 2007

The arrests of 19 people in Chicago and Mississippi in a gun-trafficking conspiracy offer a snapshot into the illegal gun trade in which gang members here end up with high-powered weapons, federal authorities said Wednesday.

A loose organization made up of relatives, their friends and associates allegedly arranged for the purchase of more than 100 guns in Mississippi, where laws are relatively lax, and transport here for sale to gangs such as the Gangster Disciples.

About three dozen weapons eventually were recovered at Chicago crime scenes, including a shootout last year in which two people were killed and a police officer wounded, investigators said.

"When you add illegally obtained heavy-caliber firearms to the already volatile mix of gangs and drugs on the streets of Chicago, the result to say the least is an unacceptable level of violence," said Gary Shapiro, first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago.

Three people were in custody in Chicago and 15 in Mississippi after a team of agents from the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and officers from the Chicago Police Department and Illinois State Police cracked down on the group early Wednesday.

Shapiro said gun-running operations like the one dismantled Wednesday contribute significantly to crime in the city.

It "threatens not only those who try to enforce our laws, but also the law-abiding citizens who only wish to live their lives in the neighborhoods that the gangs are trying to dominate," Shapiro said.

Recovered guns included two assault rifles and several high-powered handguns, Shapiro said.

Authorities said gun brokers in Chicago worked with traffickers, who recruited buyers in Mississippi. Those buyers made what are known as "straw purchases" at a group of three pawn shops and a gun store in Clarksdale and Tunica, Miss., falsely claiming that the guns were for them.

An ATF affidavit filed in the case outlines when weapons were purchased by alleged conspirators and when those guns turned up in Chicago.

On July 30, 2005, one of the buyers, Percy Strong, 54, of Jonestown, Miss., bought a 9mm handgun at Krosstown Trade and Pawn in Clarksdale, according to the affidavit Last October, Chicago police trying to thwart a gang hit in Humboldt Park pulled over a car full of New Breeds gang members who were on their way to shoot a rival.

The gang members pulled out an assault weapon and the pistol Strong had bought at Krosstown, authorities said. A shootout ensued that left two of the gang members dead and a police officer shot in the hand.

In December 2003, Strong bought another 9mm pistol from Krosstown. That weapon was recovered by Chicago police in the South Side bedroom of a convicted felon, along with a stash of drugs, according to the affidavit.

On Sept. 1, 2003, Strong bought a .45-caliber pistol at the same business, the affidavit states. Less than two months later, the gun was recovered after a Gangster Disciple street gang member used it to shoot someone in the 5700 block of South Wabash Avenue.

Another buyer, James Jiles of Clarksdale, bought a semiautomatic rifle at Mega Pawn in that town. Police executing a search warrant on the South Side in 2004 found the weapon in the possession of a member of the Mafia Insane Vice Lords, the affidavit states.

ATF leaders said they began to crack the network by analyzing gun data, discovering that between 2001 and last fall, 300 guns recovered by law enforcement in Northern Illinois came from the Clarksdale and Tunica shops. Records from those businesses were then used to identify the purchasers, who were questioned by investigators and who blamed others in the network.

Strong told the ATF he was recruited by Eddie Nesby, 25, of Chicago, who was among those charged. Nesby paid him $250 cash in addition to the cost of the gun, authorities said, but other buyers were paid as little as $20 or $50.

Many involved in the scheme knew where the guns were headed, investigators said, and attempted to destroy the serial numbers on many of the weapons. Most of the guns remain on the street and unaccounted for.

Other Chicagoans arrested and charged in the conspiracy in addition to Nesby were Julius Statham, 37, who allegedly bought some of the weapons in Chicago; and Antonio Brunt, 30, who along with Statham was accused of using a relative to obtain firearms in the South.

Attorneys for the men could not immediately be reached for comment.

Andrew Traver, special agent in charge of the Chicago ATF, said the case is a good example of how firearms-trafficking works. Traver called it a growing problem that involves more-sophisticated groups moving deadlier firearms.

"Back in the late '80s and early '90s, it was generally one person with a trunkful of guns who would drive up and sell them," he said. "Now we have these groups of people, where they recruit family members or associates in states that tend to have more lenient gun laws than Illinois."

Officials Break Up Gunrunning Operation (JCL)

By Andrew Nelson

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, March 1, 2007

Purchasers would buy weapons in Miss. because of lax firearm laws and send them to Chicago brokers

Nineteen people suspected of putting more than 300 Mississippi-purchased firearms in the hands of Chicago street gang members were arrested Wednesday, most in the Delta town of Jonestown in Coahoma County.

At least one of those guns is believed to have been used in a shootout with police in November that left an officer wounded and two alleged gang members dead.

At a news conference in Chicago following the arrests, prosecutors displayed a table of weapons similar to those confiscated in the crackdown, including AK-47s, Tech-9s, MAC-10s and an assault-style shotgun, The Associated Press reported.

"They just weren't your regular handguns," Monique Bond, a spokeswoman for Chicago Police Department, told The Clarion-Ledger. "These were assault-type weapons - heavy artillery."

According to Bond, brokers in Chicago arranged to have guns purchased in Mississippi because of the state's "lax gun laws."

Purchasers were recruited to buy the weapons at three different pawn shops in Clarksdale and Tunica, Bond said. Those purchasers knew the guns were going to be used illegally, she said.

The sellers have cooperated with authorities and are not suspected of being involved, said Senior Special Agent Austin Banks of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. He would not identify the shops.

After the weapons made it to Chicago, they were used in crimes, Bond said.

One 9 mm pistol is believed to have been used in November by members of the New Breeds gang in a gunfight with police on the city's west side.

Many of the members of the group are related, Banks said. The Mississippians arrested all had family or friends in the Chicago area.

The 15 arrested in Mississippi are expected to be arraigned Thursday in Oxford, Banks said. The four arrested in Chicago will be arrainged there.

Each charge carries a sentence of five to 10 years. Some of the suspects face multiple charges.

Weapons Crackdown Nets Feds 19 Arrests (AP)

By Mike Robinson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, March 1, 2007

CHICAGO -- Nineteen people have been charged with taking part in gun-running operations from Mississippi to Chicago that provided high-powered weapons to street gangs, federal prosecutors announced Wednesday.

"When you add illegally obtained firearms to the already volatile mix of gangs and drugs on the streets of Chicago the result is an unacceptable level of violence," said Gary S. Shapiro, the first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago.

At a news conference, prosecutors displayed a table of weapons similar to those confiscated in the crackdown, including AK-47s, Tech-9s, MAC-10s and a sinister-looking, assault-style shotgun.

Fourteen of those accused were charged in a complaint unsealed in Chicago on Wednesday. Three of those charged were arrested in Chicago Wednesday, and 10 were arrested in Mississippi. One other was already in jail, authorities said.

Five others were charged by federal officials in Mississippi.

Prosecutors said 301 guns confiscated by police and agents in Chicago over five years were traced to federally licensed gun dealers at four shops in Tunica and Clarksdale, Miss.

They said typically, so-called straw purchasers with clean records would buy the guns under orders from brokers who would then have them taken to Chicago and sold to members of the Gangster Disciples and other gangs.

DOJ_NMG_0138813

Often, the serial numbers were obliterated in an effort to hide the origin of the guns from police and federal agents, authorities said.

The investigation was conducted by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives along with the Chicago Police Department and the Illinois State Police.

Police say they confiscated well over 10,000 guns in Chicago last year, which they said was a fairly typical year. Officials said that indicates that the guns recovered in the latest investigation are only a small part of the weapons being brought into Chicago, where individuals may not buy guns.

Feds Charge 19 In Mississippi Gun Pipeline (CHIST)

By Frank Main, Crime Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, March 1, 2007

Weapon from gang shoot-out came from state

A 9mm handgun recovered last year in a Chicago Police standoff that left two gang members dead was one of hundreds of guns smuggled here from Mississippi, officials said Wednesday.

Federal prosecutors unsealed gun-trafficking charges against three Chicago men and 16 others from Mississippi. Members of at least four Chicago gangs bought the smuggled weapons from the traffickers, federal prosecutors said.

"The violent activities of these gangs have been disrupted," Chicago Police Deputy Supt. Hiram Grau said.

Could be hundreds more The Chicago defendants include convicted felons Eddie Nesby, 25, Julius Statham, 37, and Antonio Brunt, 30.

Nesby allegedly told investigators he recruited Percy Strong of Mississippi and others to buy guns for him there. Strong could buy guns because he was not a felon, officials say.

In 2005, Strong bought a 9mm Hi-Point pistol at a Clarksdale, Miss., pawn shop. The Hi-Point was recovered last October in the 3200 block of West Augusta after officers stopped a car containing gang members getting ready to shoot a rival, police said. The gangsters pointed the Hi-Point and an AK-47 at officers, who opened fire and killed two of them, police said.

Chicago Police, State Police and the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives have been investigating the Mississippi-to-Chicago gun pipeline since 2001. The defendants named Wednesday were allegedly responsible for 39 Mississippi guns recovered by law enforcement officials in Chicago. Authorities have not found 117 other Mississippi guns distributed in Chicago by the defendants, officials said.

Investigators are looking into whether about 200 other Mississippi guns recovered in Chicago were smuggled by the same defendants.

One gun bought in Mississippi was used in a crime in Chicago just five days later.

Smugglers change tactics In recent years, gun traffickers have been selling powerful, expensive weapons such as 9mm and .40-caliber pistols -- and assault weapons such as AK-47s -- through smuggling networks, said Andrew Traver, head of ATF in Chicago. In the past, traffickers worked alone and sold cheap, easily concealed low-caliber pistols out of their cars, he said.

"The face of firearms trafficking has changed dramatically," Traver said.

19 Arrested In Gun-running Ring (WLS)

By Stacey Baca

WLS-TV, ABC 7, Chicago, February 28, 2007

Federal agents and Chicago police teamed up to take down a gun trafficking ring that ran high-powered weapons from Mississippi to Chicago.

The guns -- a collection of AK-47s, Tech-9s, MAC-10s and a sinister-looking, assault-style shotgun --were reportedly purchased illegally in Mississippi and sold to gang members in Chicago.

"When you add illegally obtained firearms to the already volatile mix of gangs and drugs on the streets of Chicago the result is an unacceptable level of violence," said Gary S. Shapiro, the first assistant U.S. attorney in Chicago.

Out of the 14 arrested, 10 were taken into custody in Mississippi. Three were in Chicago and one was in jail.

Five others were charged by federal officials in Mississippi.

Prosecutors said 301 guns confiscated by police and agents in Chicago over five years were traced to federally licensed gun dealers at four shops in Tunica and Clarksdale, Miss.

"A majority of these firearms are purchased in gun and pawn shops in Mississippi. Despite the attempts to obliterate the serial numbers, Chicago police were able to trace the origins with good old-fashioned police work," said Hiram Grau, Deputy Police Superintendent.

"We've noticed in the last few years there's a definite trend to go with powerful were higher capacity, more lethal firearms," said Andrew L. Traver, ATF special-agent-in-charge.

The investigation was conducted by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives along with the Chicago Police Department and the Illinois State Police.

Police say they confiscated well over 10,000 guns in Chicago last year, which they said was a fairly typical year. Officials said that indicates that the guns recovered in the latest investigation are only a small part of the weapons being brought into Chicago, where individuals may not buy guns.

"Is it the tip of the iceberg?" asked Shapiro. "You'd have to say it is."

FBI Bust Up Mid-South "gunrunning Operation" (WMC)

WMC-TV, Memphis, March 1, 2007

It's a growing crime on which the Feds are focused.

"The movement of guns from the Mid-South to the streets of Chicago," says U.S. Attorney Jim Greenley of the Northern District of Mississippi.

Nineteen people were rounded up Wednesday and charged with running guns.

"In my 20 years of law enforcement with the ATF, this is the most successful arrest operation I've ever been a part of," says ATF agent Robert Browning.

In all, the Feds say 100 firearms went from North Mississippi to Chicago between 1999 and 2005.

Many of the weapons were distributed to gang members and used to commit serious crimes, including homicide.

"Some of these guns were involved with officers getting shot," says Coahoma County Sheriff Andrew Thompson.

Most of those charged in this latest round of arrests are from Jonestown, Mississippi in Coahoma County, but the weapons were purchased from pawn shops in Tunica and Clarksdale.

In most cases, the crooks are accused of paying people with clean records to fill out the required paperwork and buy the weapons for them.

"Often times, the people fill out the forms because they want crack cocaine or some other type of drug," says Browning.

Federal officials say without the cooperation of accomplices, these weapons would have never made it north.

"And to those who would consider buying guns for others--don't," says Greenley.

That's because it's a federal crime that could land you in the same place as these accused gunrunners.

By the way, they face 5 to 10 years in prison and up to a $250,000 fine.

Gun Trafficking Leads To Arrests (DMISS)

By Heather Berry

Daily Mississippian, March 1, 2007

Nineteen people were arrested Wednesday morning for allegedly illegally purchasing firearms in Mississippi that then were transported to Chicago for criminals and gang members to use.

"These guns found their way onto our cities' streets and were used to terrorize our citizens," said Jim Greenlee, U.S. attorney for North Mississippi.

The firearms were purchased in the Clarksdale and Tunica areas from federally licensed firearms dealers. The defendants purchased them for family members and friends, or for the exchange of money or drugs, according to Robert Browning, an agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

DOJ_NMG_0138815

"Our office will be relentless in pursuing these investigations," said Browning, who is with the New Orleans division of firearms for ATF.

The investigation began as a result of the recovery of firearms in Chicago, and the case has been impending for the past couple of years, Browning said.

"We're cracking down on it," he added. "Enough is enough."

"Today was one of the most successful operations I've seen in my 30 years (of work)," said Coahoma County Sheriff Andrew Thompson.

The investigation was conducted by ATF, the Chicago Police Department and the Illinois State Police. Agents from the Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics and Deputy U.S. Marshals also assisted ATF with the arrests.

Fourteen people in Illinois were charged with strong purchase, as were five people in northern Mississippi. Under the direction of U.S. attorney Jim Greenlee and ATF Special Agent in Charge David Harper, the five defendants in Mississippi were indicted by a federal grand jury in the Northern District of Mississippi.

If proven guilty charges, the people arrested will be given a sentence of anywhere from five to 10 years, Browning said.

"It's not worth it to buy guns for someone else," Greenlee said.

The firearms were purchased in Mississippi because the state is more lax on gun laws compared to Chicago's restrictive gun laws, Browning said. In Mississippi, residents are not required to have a permit in order to own a gun.

Browning said federal laws regarding firearms are sufficient enough for them to monitor illegal activity outside the municipal laws.

"In this country we have an idea of individual freedom and the ability to buy things," Greenlee said.

But Southerners "abhor the illegal practice" of purchasing firearms for other people who are prohibited to, he said.

The defendants were taken advantage of by criminals who did not have the rights to purchase firearms, Browning said.

Greenlee and others involved in the arrests want to warn people not to be involved in the illegal activity.

The five defendants charged in Mississippi are Clifford Moore, 26, Latoria Davis, 26, Jeannie Mae Bedford, 36, Veronica Gilliam, 27, and George Gilliam, 25. None of the defendants live in Oxford.

The others charged are Eddie Nesby, 25, Percy Strong, 54, Charles Cotton, 46, Julius Statham, 37, Roy Christopher Brunt, 29, Antonio Brunt, 30, Sylvester Rice, 29, James Jiles, 26. Arness Brunt, 26, Demetrius Burnett, 33, Percy Mattox, 33, McKinley Pitts, 29, Tammie Brown, 30, and Curtis Simmons, 25.

U.S. Marshals Official Accused Of Misspending Security Funds (USAT)

By Matt Kelley, Usa Today

USA Today, March 2, 2007

WASHINGTON — A U.S. Marshals Service official misspent $4.3 million meant for courthouse security and witness protection to pay for fitness centers and firing ranges at federal buildings, a Justice Department investigation found.

The Office of Management and Budget repeatedly told David Barnes not to use construction money on exercise and training facilities, citing agency policy and appropriations laws that restricted the money for improved prisoner security, the report said.

MARSHALS WARNED: Budget office specified where money was to go

Barnes, who oversees courthouse space for the agency, concealed the spending from his superiors and directed $2.6 million in construction money for fitness centers and firing ranges at 20 federal courthouses from 2000 to 2005, according to a copy of the 41-page report obtained by USA TODAY.

The agency has not acted on the report, which it received last April.

Barnes also used nearly $900,000 budgeted for witness protection to build a firing range in the Miami federal courthouse, and he used nearly $400,000 in construction money to hire fitness center staff and clerical workers at the Marshals Service headquarters, where Barnes works, the investigation found. Some workers were friends or relatives of Barnes and his subordinates and were unqualified for the jobs, the report said.

DOJ_NMG_0138816

Barnes' lawyer, Charles Printz, said his client had the authority to spend construction money on firing ranges and fitness centers. Printz said the investigation was spurred by disgruntled employees and he expected his client to be cleared.

"No monies were misappropriated," Printz said in an e-mail response.

Barnes remains on the job, pending an administrative review. He could be fired, suspended or cleared.

Marshals spokesman Michael Kulstad and Paul Martin of the Inspector General's office declined to comment.

Printz referred questions to Kevin Linskey, the former staff director of the Senate panel controlling Justice Department spending. Linskey said Congress gave the agency leeway to spend its construction money, including for fitness centers and firing ranges.

In the report, the Justice Department said construction money was supposed to be for "prisoner holding space" in courthouses. In 2001, a congressional committee warned security must be tightened "before a tragedy occurs."

The report also found Barnes:

•Wasted $440,000 by bypassing Marshals Service officials and paying for contractors and construction through the General Services Administration. Printz said those contracts were legal.

•Violated ethics rules by having subordinates do work for free around his home and by forming a vanpool company used by contractors he hired. Ethics rules ban managers from receiving gifts from their employees, the report said. It also found that the vanpool company, which he initially failed to disclose, was a conflict of interest. Printz said the workers are longtime friends of Barnes and that the vanpool arrangement did not violate ethics rules.

Office Specified Where Marshals Money Was To Go (USAT)

By Matt Kelley, Usa Today

USA Today, March 2, 2007

Ten years ago, the White House budget office warned the U.S. Marshals Service to get its priorities straight: Money designated to improve courthouse security was not to be used for fitness centers or firing ranges.

The agency's construction account should be spent on securing areas used by prisoners, such as elevators, holding cells and entrances, Kenneth Schwartz, an Office of Management and Budget (OMB) official, said in a letter to a top Justice Department administrator.

MARSHALS MISSPEND MONEY: $4.3M used inappropriately

"We are concerned with the oversight and priority setting within this program and request that the department continue to monitor USMS expenditures from this account closely," Schwartz wrote.

David Barnes, who oversees courthouse space for the Marshals Service, pressed the OMB to change the policy in several telephone conversations in 2001, Lisa Ward of the budget office told investigators. His arguments, repeated in letters, e-mails and statements to investigators: Marshals Service officers need to stay physically fit and practice their marksmanship, and facilities to do so were often expensive and far from their offices.

Eventually, the General Services Administration and the Justice Department agreed that the Marshals Service could request exemptions for the construction of firing ranges. The GSA is the independent agency responsible for construction and renovations of federal buildings.

Barnes' office asked for 14 waivers during 2003, but all were denied, records show.

In 20 cities, Barnes found ways without waivers to get the GSA to build or renovate firing ranges and fitness centers, an internal Justice Department investigation found.

The investigation by the department's inspector general found Barnes shifted money among various construction projects and bypassed his supervisors to spend nearly $3.9 million on firing ranges and fitness centers at courthouses from Alaska to Florida, and wasted $440,000 in fees by paying for contractors and construction through the GSA rather than his agency.

A Marshals Service disciplinary board will decide whether to fire, suspend or clear Barnes for what investigators found was a pattern of violating ethics rules and misspending money.

His lawyer, Charles Printz, said Barnes did nothing wrong, and the unauthorized release of the report shows a "clear and gross abuse of authority" by someone in the Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0138817

In the report, Justice Department investigators cited the Marshals Service's lax oversight as a reason why Barnes' spending sometimes went undetected. A 2003 report from the department's inspector general found that the service couldn't always show it was spending its money the way Congress directed, for example.

John May, the service's chief of budget execution, told investigators it was "impossible to track" the spending by Barnes' office.

Barnes told investigators he did not notify his superiors about many of his spending decisions. When investigators asked Barnes about the disputed expenses, he replied, "I don't think it's a problem," the report said.

Until fiscal year 2006, however, appropriations laws said the Marshals Service construction account was to be used for building and renovating "prisoner holding space" in courthouses and other federal buildings. Both the OMB and Justice Department said that language clearly excluded firing ranges and fitness centers — a central point Barnes' attorney disputes.

The largest amount of challenged spending, $881,500, went to build a firing range in the basement of the new federal courthouse in Miami, the investigation found.

After the OMB deleted the firing range from courthouse plans approved by Congress, Barnes began pressuring the GSA to build a firing range anyway, the report says.

GSA officials said no, but Barnes signed an order directing the GSA to build the range with money from a Marshals Service account used to pay for witnesses' security, the report's attachments show.

The probe also found Barnes used about $400,000 meant for a security fence at the federal courthouse in Anderson, S.C., to begin construction of a firing range in the Tallahassee, Fla., courthouse. The GSA built the fence with $68,000 of its funds, investigators found.

The GSA stopped construction of firing ranges in Tallahassee and Seattle after Justice Department investigators questioned the projects. The Marshals Service had spent nearly $300,000 on a ventilation system for the Seattle shooting range before the project was stopped, the report said.

Courthouse security remains a problem. OMB's latest report said the proportion of courthouses that meet requirements rose from 6% in 1999 to 19% in 2003, but has remained flat since.

Subject Of Explosives Probe Left Homeless, Lawyer Says (MINNST)

By Chao Xiong, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 2, 2007

A Bloomington man who was jailed then released after federal authorities confiscated several firearms and explosive materials from his house has been left homeless after the city condemned his house, according to his attorney.

Terry L. Dahlen, 60, and his wife are living with relatives after a city official said the couple have mice and too much clutter in their basement, garage and back yard, said attorney Joe Rymanowski.

"Normally they don't condemn for that," Rymanowski said. "They say, 'Clean it up.' " Rymanowski said the couple were given until March 8 to clean up the house.

Dahlen has not been charged with any crime and was released from jail Wednesday afternoon. He agreed to be named for this story.

The last few days have been rough, Rymanowski said.

Dahlen has "been reduced to tears," he said. "He's obviously terrified."

FBI agent Paul McCabe said only that the case is still under investigation. The state Bureau of Criminal of Apprehension and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms (ATF) are part of the joint investigation into Dahlen.

Speaking on Dahlen's behalf, Rymanowski said his client is a gun and pyrotechnics hobbyist who used to be a licensed weapons manufacturer in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The materials and firearms seized by authorities are left over from the days he made firearms for sale to other hobbyists, Rymanowski said.

"None of it was illegal," he said. "He wasn't building a bomb. He wasn't threatening anybody."

Rymanowski said he's puzzled as to why federal authorities searched Dahlen's house, but added that they have been cooperative and professional.

DOJ_NMG_0138818

"My question is: If he's such a menace to society, why didn't Hennepin County charge him?" his attorney said. "I think this is just another level of government harassment. People think gun collectors are nuts."

Federal authorities have not said why or for how long Dahlen has been investigated. The Bloomington and Minneapolis bomb squads were called out to his home Monday in the 1700 block of W. 84th Street. Authorities also searched a commercial retail building at 5200 47th Av. S. in Minneapolis on Tuesday that belongs to his wife, who runs a salon at the address. "Explosive materials" that required a bomb squad and the skills of military personnel also were found there.

Steve Bogdalek, assistant special agent in charge of the ATF, has said the materials found at both locations were not in danger of exploding.

Authorities have said they also found blasting caps and detonation cords at Dahlen's house. His attorney said he also had inert land mines that are sold as collectors' items and clocks in the shape of fake dynamite sticks.

Rymanowski said his client does not now have plans to take any legal action in response to the searches, condemnation of his house or arrest.

Task Force To Pursue Local Gangs (WT)

By Daniel Taylor, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 2, 2007

The head of the FBI's Washington Field Office yesterday said he has created a new task force to pursue federal gun and racketeering charges against gang members in Northern Virginia.

Joseph Persichini Jr., the assistant director in charge of the field office, said the task force began its work about a week ago and is made up of eight to 10 agents and representatives from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) and local law-enforcement agencies.

He said authorities hope to prosecute gang members using federal gun statutes and the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO).

"We're looking for RICO indictments of people," Mr. Persichini said during a wide-ranging interview with editors and reporters at The Washington Times. "The key here also is using ATF and all the gun charges [because] many of those crimes are committed with weapons."

Agents will "take a look at every gang or crew in Northern Virginia," he said.

Mr. Persichini, who was appointed head of the field office inNovember after serving as its acting director since January 2006, said the effort is part of an increased focus on dealing with local violent crime, which he called a "very serious concern."

He also pointed to a recent uptick in violence in parts of the District. Mr. Persichini said he has spoken extensively with Acting Metropolitan Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier about gathering and sharing intelligence and that he talked with Mayor Adrian M. Fenty as recently as Wednesday night about comprehensive plans to thwart violent crime.

Mr. Persichini said "organized opportunistic crime," including crew-related and robbery-related violence, was driving a spike in violent crime in the 3rd District, which encompasses much of the downtown core.

He said his office has been solidifying its ties to the city's business community and minority populations, to aid its efforts in fighting local crime.

"We can't do what we do without the faith and trust of the people we serve," he said.

Mr. Persichini also said his office has taken a greater role in the schools, expanding internships for teenagers and setting up "junior special agent" programs for sixth-grade students.

"Their first interaction with law enforcement should be positive," he said.

Despite the increased local focus, Mr. Persichini said the priorities of the field office remain unchanged.

"Counterterrorism will always be No. 1," he said, calling the District a "target-rich environment" that requires constant vigilance against terrorist threats from international groups and what he described as the "home-grown lone wolf."

Mr. Persichini, whose background is in public-corruption cases, said corruption would be the focus of the field office's criminal investigations.

"I'm a firm believer that the FBI is an agency that is ... suited for the investigation of public corruption," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0138819

Mr. Persichini declined to talk about the status of the ongoing investigation into the October 2001 anthrax attacks that killed five persons, including two D.C. postal workers. He said that about 20 agents are still working on the case, but would add only that it is a "continuing, pending investigation."

Meet The FBI's 'Best Undercover Agent' (NYSUN)

New York Sun, March 2, 2007

At 6-foot 4-inches and more than 300 pounds, veteran FBI agent Joaquin "Jack" Garcia is a small mountain of a man who is hard to miss. That's never stopped him from being a master of disguises. In recent years, the expert undercover agent's appointment calendar must have read a bit like the script for the 1960s screwball comedy "If It's Tuesday, This Must Be Belgium."

Mr. Garcia surfaced last year when he took the stand in a closed courtroom to describe how he had played the role of a Gambino associate for 27 months. At the same time, Mr. Garcia was also posing as a New York capo in a 36-month FBI sting against crooked Florida cops in which four police officers were nailed last week on corruption charges (thus the reason for the secret testimony).

That wasn't all: Sources tell Gang Land that Mr. Garcia worked undercover in three other successful organized crime and corruption cases during the same time frame.

In Boston, he posed as a drug lord, resulting in the indictment of three police officers last July on drug trafficking and money laundering charges. During the lengthy FBI sting operation, the cops were also implicated in steroid abuse, identity theft and other crimes. Five weeks ago, a fourth cop was charged with perjury, obstruction of justice, and trafficking in steroids.

During the same period, sources said, Mr. Garcia worked undercover in two separate cases in Atlantic City. In one involving Asian organized crime, he played the role of a wiseguy. In a political corruption probe that resulted last fall in guilty pleas by three city council members — two from Atlantic City and one from Camden — he posed as a Wall Street financier.

During the final stages of the Florida, Atlantic City, and Boston probes, Mr. Garcia, who was undercover all but two of his 26 years as an FBI agent, was retired and working as an independent contractor, according to his testimony at the trial of Gambino capo Gregory DePalma, one of 32 mobsters and associates who was convicted as a result of Mr. Garcia's undercover work in New York.

For the record, the DePalma investigation began in December 2002 and ended in March 2005. Mr. Garcia, who retired last March, testified against DePlama last May. The Sunshine State sting operation began in February 2004 and ended last week.

"Without question, Jack Garcia is the best undercover agent the Bureau has ever had," a veteran law enforcement official who worked with him on the DePalma case said. The family's acting boss, Arnold "Zeke" Squitieri, and underboss, Anthony "the Genius" Megale, were among those who copped plea deals rather than go to trial with DePalma.

At trial, Mr. Garcia, a Cuban-born émigré, said he posed as a "fourth- or fifth-generation" Italian American who traced his lineage to Sicily. "The ruse was that I was a knock-around guy, a guy who had access to everything," he testified.

Mr. Garcia's testimony at the DePalma trial was piped into another room to prevent his cover from being blown in the Florida case. In that investigation, the cops traveled to New York and Atlantic City, according to a federal complaint filed in Miami.

Two cops allegedly delivered $400,000 in "stolen" bearer bonds to an undercover agent in New York who was posing as an underling of "Big Jack" in 2005. Last June, a month after Mr. Garcia sunk DePalma from the witness stand, the cops allegedly transported "stolen artwork" to the same "underling" in Atlantic City.

On October 26, according to the complaint, police officer Kevin Companion, the leader of the alleged rogues, met Big Jack and two "underlings" at the Borgata Hotel in Atlantic City to discuss several schemes. Out of the presence Mr. of Garcia – who acted as a non-drug dealing wiseguy in the scam — Mr. Companion agreed to provide protection for a drug shipment, and enlist his colleagues for the job.

A month later, the four cops, who were warned against mentioning "heroin or drugs" in front of Big Jack, agreed to the drug caper with Big Jack's crew, and, after safely escorting a drug mule out of harm's way, were videotaped receiving a total of $32,000 for their services. All told, the four took in $92,000 for their outside work, much of which was done while armed and in uniform, according to the complaint.

Sources say other cops were implicated in crimes but may escape prosecution because Mr. Companion and police officer Jeffry Courtney learned of the probe after the FBI told Chief James Scarberry about it last month and he relayed the information to his top brass and city officials.

FBI officials, not to mention Mr. Garcia and 12 other agents who worked undercover in the investigation, are furious about the leak, and are likely to point to it the next time the agency gets accused of not sharing information with local police.

On the bright side, Messrs. Companion and Courtney called in sick and began to inquire about retirement benefits when they got wind of the probe. They didn't react the way New York's infamous Mafia Cops, Louis Eppolito and Steven Caracappa, often did during their careers. The dark side — that the lives of FBI agents were put at risk if the Hollywood cops had taken the same path as the murderous New York duo — doesn't sit too well with the FBI.

Out there in Gang Land, many people on both sides of the law probably assume that the feds always go the extra mile whenever one of their own has been harmed.

Don't try telling that to William Aronwald, a former federal prosecutor whose father was gunned down in 1987 by a trio of bumbling gangsters who mistook the father for the son in a mob hit.

This week, Mr. Aronwald ripped U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf of Brooklyn for what he called "unprofessional and irresponsible" conduct by her office in its dealings with former mob associate Frank Smith, one of the participants in the killing.

"Shame on the U.S. attorney's office," Mr. Aronwald said. "We're the victims here, my family."

In the past, Mr. Aronwald has criticized Ms. Mauskopf's office for not pushing for tough sanctions initially against Smith, whose cooperation led to the conviction of Colombo underboss Joseph "Joe Waverly" Cacace, now serving a 20-year sentence for ordering the murder of the former prosecutor's father.

More recently, Mr. Aronwald has condemned them for letting Smith off the hook when he was arrested in November for grand larceny, after a short, house arrest term. That arrest, for stealing a load of flat screen TVs, was a violation of the terms of the reduced sentence he received in the killing of Mr. Aronwald's father.

Yesterday, Mr. Aronwald said he was even more irate that he had been kept in the dark that Smith had finally been charged with violating the terms of his sentence, and now faces up to three years in prison. Smith testified about that Tuesday, when he appeared on behalf of an old buddy, Carmine Carini, stating he was wrongly convicted of a 1983 murder.

Ms. Mauskopf, he said, had personally assured him that her office would keep him "in the loop" about Smith's case.

But, the ex-prosecutor told Gang Land, he has been consistently been rebuked by the office, and only learned about Smith's testimony in the Carini case after he was off the stand Tuesday. And the information, he said, came not from Ms. Mauskopf, but from a New York Post reporter, Alex Ginsberg.

"I would expect that someone from the government would have the courtesy to call me," said an "extremely disappointed" Mr. Aronwald, who is now a defense attorney.

A Mauskopf spokesman said that "in light of pending court proceedings in this case," the office would not respond to Mr. Aronwald's remarks.
